
Labour is afraid of business—it always has been and business will never trust it. We know that Labour believes in more expenditure, more borrowing and more taxation. We have heard this afternoon about the social chapter, the minimum wage and new union rights. We have heard it all before, but we heard it again today. That is one reason why Labour Members will stay on the Opposition Benches and we will stay on the Government Benches.

In Erith and Crayford, people looked for action in four key areas, to which I shall confine my remarks: first, local businesses; secondly, reform of benefits, particularly the disability living allowance; thirdly, help for pensioners to meet the imposition of VAT on fuel and power; and, fourthly, tax increases that were perceived as fair.

Ms Eagle: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way on the point of fair tax increases. Does he agree that under the Conservative Government one third of the huge tax giveaways of the 1980s went to the top 1 per cent. and that the current tax increases are hitting the lower-paid and those who are least able to afford them? Is that his definition of fair?

Mr. Evennett: That is not only not fair but not true. I shall develop my argument on fairness subsequently. In the past 14 years, prosperity across all sections of society has increased. That has been very important.

Ms Glenda Jackson: Will the hon. Gentleman give way on that point?

Mr. Evennett: May I carry on a little? When I reach the part of my speech on fairness, I will give way to the hon. Lady.

In Erith and Crayford, there is a large number of small firms and businesses. In the past few years, they have suffered a two-pronged attack—an increase in bureaucracy and red tape and the worldwide economic recession. They have urged my right hon. and hon. Friends at the Treasury to understand their problems and plight and to take action.

Firms on my industrial estates of Thamesmead, Belvedere, Erith and Crayford, who employ many thousands of my constituents, wanted the Budget to deal with their real needs and issues. I know from conversations that I had yesterday with representatives of some of those firms that they are delighted with the outcome of the Budget. In particular, they welcomed the help for small businesses, with the raising of the VAT threshold, the abolition of compulsory audits for firms with a turnover of less than £90,000 and tax measures directed to help small businesses to get started and raise the necessary capital. Those are good news stories for businesses and small firms in Erith and Crayford.

Together with those measures, the deregulation legislation proposed in the Queen's Speech and the Chancellor's determination to tackle the problems of late payment of bills will go down well with my business men.

Cash flow is vital to smaller firms. Irrespective of how good a product is, if a firm does not get paid promptly on delivery, it can run into serious or perhaps terminal trouble through no fault of its own. Smaller firms therefore welcome my right hon. and learned Friend's comment in his Budget that he would reconsider this issue and try to deal with it for them. This year's Budget has been a Budget for business, a Budget for jobs and a Budget for training.

I welcome the speech that was made by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment this afternoon and applaud his new apprenticeship scheme for young people, which is innovative and will be good for young people. I also warmly support his three new initiatives for small firms to encourage training in the engine room of our economy, which is the small business.

The second subject which I wish to mention is the determination of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Secuirty to reform the social security system and the urgent need to reform the disability allowance. I know from my constituency casework that the number of people who draw that benefit has increased dramatically in my area. I also know that by no stretch of the imagination are all those claimants severely disabled.

All Conservative Members believe in helping people who are in genuine need. We believe that there should be a benefit to look after those people who are genuinely disabled to ensure that they are supported. However, quite a number of constituents have complained, at my surgery at Erith town hall on a Friday evening, that the present system is unfair and that disability allowance is given to too many people. We all know stories of people who can claim disability allowance who are not genuinely disabled. That was not what was intended when the benefit was introduced.

The new incapacity benefit which will take effect in April 1995—with a new objective medical test, which I believe has been long overdue—will allow the benefit to reach the people who are in genuine need. People who are genuinely disabled will not have a problem because we shall ensure that they obtain the benefit. It is those people who do not deserve or need it who need to be worried. The new benefit will remove arbitrariness and will be seen to be fair.

The hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Ms Jackson) asked about fairness. Many people in my constituency believe that the disability allowance is unfair.

Ms Glenda Jackson: I am the hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate; my hon. Friend the Member for Wallasey (Ms Eagle) asked questions regarding fairness. The question that I wished to ask the hon. Gentleman was, if the past 14 years have been so fair, why do a quarter of the poorest people in the European Community live in these islands?

Mr. Evennett: The hon. Lady wanted to intervene on the fairness issue and I said that I would allow her to intervene on the fairness issue later, so she is not correct even about that. I was referring to her, not to the hon. Member for Wallasey (Ms Eagle). It is important that measures are perceived as fair by the majority of people. During the past 14 years, there has been an increase in affluence in all sections of the community.

The third subject which I wish to mention is VAT. In spite of all the pundits, especially those on the Opposition Benches, there was no extension to the VAT fold in the Budget. We all welcome that. Opposition Members have not even been able to acknowledge it.

Pensioners and people in low-income groups were genuinely worried about what would happen when VAT was applied to fuel and power. In early October, I went to the local meeting of the British Pensioners and Trade Unions Action Association. Apart from the usual party political nonsense that one hears at some of those meetings, many people expressed genuine worry about how they would be able to afford the increased fuel bill. I received many letters and had many telephone calls and meetings with other individual pensioners about the problem that they perceived that they would have. Many of those people who had small private pensions did not want to find that they would be excluded from help that would obviously go to those on benefit or very low incomes. They wanted the tax situation to be perceived as fair to them, too.

The fact that my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has given an across-the-board benefit to all pensioners should reassure individual pensioners and pensioners' organisations that the Government have been fair to all pensioners in the Budget.

Many pensioners in my constituency have told me that, although they welcome the reductions in interest rates for people who have mortgages and for all people who are borrowing money, they have noticed that their own private investment incomes have been reduced accordingly and they have been concerned. They might have another 10 or 20 years to live off their capital and they are concerned about the diminishing return for them. I am sure that they will be delighted with the new pensioners' guaranteed income bond, which they will greet with considerable enthusiasm.

I believe that the extension of the home energy efficiency scheme, which was mentioned in the Budget, and the extension of eligibility to all pensioners and disabled people, will also be welcomed by pensioners' groups.

Mr. Alex Carlile: It is very expensive.

Mr. Evennett: I think that all the measures will be expensive, but they will be perceived as fair to all pensioners, not just those on very low incomes. A large number of pensioners work for many years to enter retirement with a small occupational pension or savings. The pensioners to whom I spoke were naturally concerned about the future. The Budget has helped them and will continue to do so.

I shall now discuss general perceptions of fairness. Whether the Budget is greeted favourably or unfavourably in our area depends on whether people perceive it to be fair to all sections of society and fair in dealing with everyone. I believe that the tax increases that my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor has proposed are fair—there is to be no increase in income tax, a limited increase in excise duty on drink, but more substantial increases in the price of tobacco and petrol. Those are welcome measures. I passionately believe in increasing the price of tobacco. I should have liked my right hon. and learned Friend to put more tax on tobacco, because smoking is a health risk. I welcome, however, the tax increase that has taken place this year.

I believe that the benefit reforms will be regarded as fair by the vast majority of people in the country. Business people think that it is a fair Budget and will have great support.

This year's Budget has been a no-nonsense Budget from a no-nonsense Chancellor of the Exchequer. It has been crafted and constructed to deal with the problems that confront the country and to help those in real need. Obviously, tax increases are never popular, but I believe that the vast majority of people will recognise that they are essential at this time and that cuts in public expenditure are also important.

However, the fact that my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor has managed to continue to increase expenditure in the vital sectors of health, education and law and order highlights the Government's priorities. Yes, we have to curtail expenditure in certain sectors, but we believe passionately in developing policies in other sectors and we are prepared to spend extra money in those sectors.

I believe that, in time, this year's Budget will be regarded as a great Budget from a great Chancellor of the Exchequer. I also feel that people appreciate his common-sense approach and plain speaking. This year, the people understand what he has to say and they like it.

7.18 pm

Mr. Alex Carlile (Montgomery): We have heard some interesting arguments during the debate and before I discuss broader issues I shall mention two. During the course of his contribution, with some of which I agreed, the hon. Member for Bedfordshire, South-West (Mr. Madel) referred to the venture capital trust and, I think, the enterprise investment scheme. Any scheme that encourages investment in industry, especially manufacturing and productive industry, is to be welcomed. I have read the detail, such as it is, that has been supplied so far about those schemes. I would urge on the Treasury the view that any such scheme is unlikely to succeed if it does not include front-loading of tax relief.

The business expansion scheme has been much condemned because of the way in which it was used to attract money into property-related investment. Some of that investment must have been beneficial for the building industry, which desperately needs help, and I make the specific point that the scheme attracted investment because those who invested could obtain tax relief as they put their money in. I urge the Government not to abandon that principle and to confirm that front-loaded tax relief will remain available, especially in the venture capital trusts, which should give a boost to the rather ailing venture capital industry in this country.

My second specific point is about something that the hon. Member for Erith and Crayford (Mr. Evennett) said concerning pensioners and their savings. He gave a broad welcome to the pensioners guaranteed income bond. I have read the press release describing what detail there is about the bond so far, which was issued by National Savings as the Chancellor sat down having delivered his Budget speech. I hope that the Government can avoid the accusation that seems justifiable thus far—that the bond is something of a confidence trick by the Chancellor.

We have been told that the bond will be introduced after the new year and, according to National Savings, its interest rates will reflect the market at the time of its introduction. We know that the Chancellor is likely to reduce interest rates between now and the new year, so it looks as if the bond will be introduced at an historically low interest rate. The Economic Secretary to the Treasury should tell us when he replies to the debate whether the bond will be linked in some way so that its interest rate rises if and when general interest rates rise. He shakes his head. That will be a great disappointment to pensioners all over the country, many of whom have small savings—£10,000 or £20,000, perhaps—which make a considerable difference to their standard of living. They have seen the return on their investments drop dramatically, and they too suspect, as we all do, that interest rates will rise.

Unless something is done to secure pensioners against losing because of future increases in interest rates, the bonds will prove unattractive, and financial advisers will rightly urge caution before investments are made in them. I ask the Economic Secretary to reflect on the effect of introducing the bond at an historically low interest rate.

The Chancellor delivered the Budget with his usual—and, to many hon. Members, enviable—self-confidence, but as a piece of economic thinking it was breathtaking, not so much because of what it told us but because of what it did not tell us. Like many right hon. and hon. Members, I have been examining the Red Book to see where the money will come from to fill the gap of £3 billion to £4 billion that was unexplained in the Budget speech. That is easily discovered on page 117 of the Red Book: it comes from the contingency reserves. The table on that page shows that the reserves are to contribute £3·5 billion in 1994-95, £7 billion in 1995-96 and £10·5 billion in 1996-97. The Chancellor did not tell us in his speech the effect that using the contingency reserves to that breathtaking extent will have on the economy and its future growth. It is about time that we were given an explanation, and I hope that we shall hear it later.

I shall now deal with employment policy, and unemployed people's view of the Budget. Five groups of people will have listened to the Chancellor's speech with bated breath. The first group is the young people who hope to be employed in future, and the second is people who are already on the employment market but who are unemployed. Then there are those who have worked but are now long-term unemployed, and those who have worked and want to work again but who are sick and therefore unemployed. The fifth group consists of those who are in work but who, because their jobs are so badly paid, are very poor and need help: they are entitled to help from the Government because they are doing exactly what the Government urge, and are working even though their wages are very low.

All those groups will have looked for the prescription that the Government gave them in the Budget to deal with the ills that they experience. But some found the milk of human kindness prescribed only in the special form dispensed by the Secretary of State for Social Security. He is the dalek of the unemployed, uttering the word, "exterminate"—meaning, exterminate people from the statistics. One of the results of the Budget will be that for about the 29th time since 1979—I may be one out; it may be only the 28th time—the Government will be able to massage the unemployment statistics because of changes in policy. In the months to come we can expect a possible reduction of 200,000 in the official number of people unemployed, but that will not be a genuine reduction. I shall return later to the Secretary of State for Social Security and his plan for the sick and unemployed.

The first category of people whom I mentioned—young people who hope to be employed—cannot have greeted the Budget with anything other than the deepest gloom and depression. All over the country we have a vast stock of brilliant and able young people who can learn skills, technology and knowledge, who have the capacity to soak up the skills needed to enable the economy to grow—many Members of Parliament can no longer do that, because we have passed that absorbent age for learning.

Yet what prospect do those young people face? Those who come from affluent homes will be all right, because their mums and dads will see them through university, will give them the money to live on and will probably encourage them to take out student loans because they represent a cheap form of credit, but will pay off the loans on their children's behalf. Those young people will come out at the end of their higher education with a reasonable prospect of employment, because they will not be worried, at least at the beginning of their graduate life, about taking jobs with relatively low pay, if the prospects are good.

Then there are the others—those who come from poorer homes whose parents will not be able to help them out, except at the cost of extreme sacrifice in some cases. If they go to university, they will be saddled with loans that now represent about one third of the cost of being at university. When they come out, they will face what is effectively a form of substantial additional taxation—the repayment of the loan.

Let me give an example. The Government seem to think that £14,000 a year is a sufficient salary from which to start paying back the loan. I hope that many young people who come out of university will feel that school teaching is an attractive profession. In the early years of teaching they may earn little more than £14,000 a year. Are they really to be regarded as sufficiently affluent to start paying the price of their loans immediately at the beginning of their working lives?

Salaries of people starting work in another category, in manufacturing industry, do not on the whole compare with the salaries paid by firms in the City. Are able young people to be driven out of manufacturing industry because they feel that they will be able to repay their student loan more successfully if they work for a firm of accountants or become lawyers? That does not seem to be a way to potentiate young people and to enable the country's economy to grow. It is a depressing picture that will drive many even into the choice of not going to university.

There is also the question whether people can get jobs when they graduate. I know of many examples of young graduates who have no chance of jobs related to the skills that they have acquired. I was told by a constituent a few weeks ago of his son and daughter-in-law. The son is a brilliant first class honours graduate in a scientific subject and the daughter-in-law is a brilliant first class honours in history. Both had been promised research funding, which was removed before they could begin research; so they set about looking for work and obtained jobs selling hamburgers in the constituency of the hon. Member for City of Chester (Mr. Brandreth), who is in his place. There is nothing wrong with selling hamburgers; it is an honourable occupation. Regrettably, there are rather more hamburger outlets in Chester than there used to be when I lived there as a young man and the fine, old shops were in greater abundance. People should not have to sell hamburgers if they have been trained in biotechnology or in microcomputer electronics or other subjects that are needed to enable the country to develop and grow.

The Secretary of State for Social Security has produced a test for those who are sick and unemployed that is more like a parlour game than a medical test. The consultation paper that was produced yesterday on the medical assessment for incapacity benefit contains items such as the following—a severity score of 17 points for those who cannot carry out simple mental arithmetic—that means that there will have to be a reshuffle in the Treasury. There will be 23·5 severity points awarded to those who are frequently muddled or confused—that will virtually wipe out the Government. There will be 4·5 severity points for those who cannot lift and push an unladen wheelbarrow—one of the tests that will be used to contradict the opinions of doctors as to whether people are able to work. Will doctors be expected to have an unladen wheelbarrow in their consulting rooms? With respect to those who sit in your Chair, Mr. Deputy Speaker, one test that may be especially apposite is the 11 severity points for regularly losing track of conversations.

That is the regime that the Government are seeking to impose to decide whether people are fit for work. Until now, doctors—perhaps some do need to be more careful, for there is always room to remind the professions to apply high standards—have been respected for being able to decide whether people are fit for work. By those absurd tests, the Secretary of State for Social Security is to introduce a standard whereby civil servants rather than doctors will decide whether people are fit for work. Yet again the Government are set on conflict with the medical profession.

What about the poor and employed? The wages councils have been abolished. The Government have pulled from under the poor and employed those very structures that at least fought for them, and on a statutory basis, to ensure that there was some kind of fairness even in poorly paid employment. There is nothing in the Budget that encourages people to take the jobs that the noble Lady Thatcher used to urge upon them; and that the present Secretary of State for Social Security, and others who have been given illegitimate titles at various times by the Prime Minister, encourage them to take to justify the feeling that they are doing something worthwhile in obtaining poorly paid employment. Why should people work as packers, assemblers or even hill farmers, who are no longer able to earn a decent income, if the Government cannot provide a minimum level of support to ensure a decent standard of living?

Even housing has been attacked in the Budget. In Wales, where there is a desperate shortage of housing to rent in rural areas, Tai Cymru—Housing for Wales—is being given less money to build. What on earth can be the justification for that?

In the Budget, we wanted to hear a strategy, not for the Conservative party or to call off the wreckers on the Tory Back Benches, but for the country for the years to come. If we had seen a real strategy for employment, our happiness would have been far greater than our regret at a Government success which might have deprived us of the opportunity of further by-election and election successes. The Liberal Democrats thought that the Government might have learned the lessons of their by-election defeats and the marvellous victories of my hon. Friends the Members for Newbury (Mr. Rendel) and for Christchurch (Mrs. Maddock). We would have willingly said to the Government "Well done" if they had produced a strategy that would have enabled unemployed and poor people to look to the future with greater confidence. Regrettably, they did not do so. In due course, the Chancellor will be judged on results and not on rhetoric.

Mr. Roy Thomason (Bromsgrove): I join others on the Conservative Benches in congratulating the Chancellor on his excellent Budget. I shall not repeat the words of praise that have emanated from others, but entirely support them.

The Chancellor was seeking to achieve twin targets of low inflation and growth. I listened with interest to the comments of the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott). As I understand his argument, he wanted to reduce unemployment but did not take too kindly to growth, and he did not accept that the Budget would lead to growth. I do not understand how he expects unemployment to be reduced other than by virtue of growth in the economy.

I listened to the hon. Gentleman attack the rising share prices in the City. He seemed to think that the confidence of City investors in Britain and from abroad showed that there was something wrong with the economy, instead of being, as it is, a declaration of support.

I also listened to the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) who followed the traditional course of Liberal Democrat spokesmen by being a manic depressive. That party gets incredibly excited for short periods, then goes into a deep decline. Today was a time of such decline. We heard doom and gloom, we were told that interest rates would rise substantially thus depriving people of the advantage of the new investments that they could make.

We were also told that the Government should not eat into contingency reserves. The whole point of having contingency reserves is to have money available to support public services at a time of high inflation, when it is necessary for Government to divert resources because of emergencies. When we have stability in the economy, there is no need for such high reserves.

If the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery had thought about the targets of the Budget and about the success on which it was building, he would have appreciated that my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor was correct to reduce the contingency reserve. But doom and gloom will not allow that.

The hon. and learned Member complained about reductions in house building. He should have told the House that the Government have pledged that the Housing Corporation will build 20,000 more houses than planned. As a result of lower prices, we are creating more house building; that is what he should have told us. But that is not good enough for hon. Members on the doom and gloom Benches.

I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment on his allocation of local government funds today, pursuant to the announcement in the Budget. He has said that there is to be more money available for local government. Although, clearly, there will be some pressure on general levels of council tax, my right hon. Friend has acknowledged in the distribution of grant the needs of particular areas, especially those with growth problems and on the urban fringes, of which my own authority is one.

I am delighted that Bromsgrove will be allowed to spend about £1 million more than it did last year, and that it will receive that same amount in extra grant, so that the council tax in my constituency can remain broadly the same, if the local authority chooses to spend at its new increased standard spending assessment level. That is welcome, and it is an acknowledgment of the needs of individuals and areas which is typical of this Government.

There have been complaints from local government that the level of increase is inadequate. Those who criticise fail to appreciate that 70 per cent. of local government expenditure is based on wages and salaries. It is for local government, as it has done on occasions in the past, to ensure that it gets maximum value for money and that it limits pay rises to a level which can be afforded by the nation as a whole. I see no reason why local government should not contain its wage expenses.

I pay tribute to the work of much of local government in delivering value for money; that drive must continue. We must look for extensions in competitive tendering and for more productivity in local government. Today's Audit Commission report points to fraud running at £25 million a year in local government. That is clearly one area in which action must be taken, and I hope that local government will note the Audit Commission's comments in seeking to deal with the problem.

I now turn to business investment. I welcome the help that my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor has given industry by creating a low-tax economy and by giving assistance to the self-employed in VAT limits——

Mr. Prescott: A low-tax economy?

Mr. Thomason: That comment comes ill from an hon. Member in a party that has consistently committed itself to increasing the level of taxation for business and for individuals.

Ms Eagle: Will the hon. Gentleman admit that his Government's Budget figures demonstrate that taxation collected this year, as a proportion of gross domestic product, is 34·5 per cent., and that it will go up by 1998, on the Government's own figures, to 38·5 per cent.? When the Labour Government left office, the figure was 34·25 per cent. The Tory Government are a Government of high taxation, and their claims of low taxation have been exposed for the scam they are.

Mr. Thomason: I take note of the fact that, under the terms announced by my right hon. and learned Friend, the proportion of public expenditure will be reduced from 45 per cent. to 41·5 per cent. We shall have less government and not more government. The Labour party consistently argues for more and more and more public expenditure, and for more taxation.

There is a need to increase productivity, and much has been achieved to date by British industry. Management has been transformed in the past 14 years; much was done in the Thatcher years. We now have industry that is competitive. We have a work force who identify with the objectives of the employer in ensuring common success, not just for the shareholder and the manager, but for the whole work force. That transformation has been achieved on the back of a series of legislative proposals, and will be continued in the spirit of the Budget.

We also see delivered in the Budget an opportunity to improve the skills of the work force. There is new training for apprenticeships, and there is education investment. Better standards will be attained so that the new generation will be fit for the workplace. However, in the international league, Britain's productivity levels still lag behind those of some countries.

We need high growth and high investment. The two go together, which the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East has difficulty in understanding. He complained about being likened to prehistoric animals. When I heard some of his comments, I understood the relevance of that criticism. High growth and high investment, running together, lead to improvements in productivity. We need to ensure that there are adequate margins to allow for investment. The call I hear again and again from British industry is that it wants to invest more so that it can then achieve a level of productivity second to none.

We have a problem with short-termism, as even Opposition Members may agree. I hope that future Chancellors will have the opportunity to address that problem as the economy moves forward. We need to ensure that pension funds do not look just for immediate, short-term gains. We want the banks to be more flexible. We want less constraint on venture funds. Against that, we need to ensure that London maintains its position as a leading international financial centre, and we should not do anything that interferes overtly with that.

Short-termism leads to the search for a quick return rather than to long-term planning, and there is not sufficient incentive for plant investment. We sometimes invest in the wrong sort of business asset—in land rather than in plant. A pressure that is especially important for smaller businesses is the need for high capital repayment on loans which can hinder their cash flow.

I welcome the steps that the Chancellor has taken to deal with some of those problems, but I hope that he will go further in the years ahead. I hope that he will look critically at opportunities, when he can afford them, for capital allowances to be given. I hope that he will consider whether it would be appropriate for United Kingdom pension funds to bear tax on short-term gains. I wonder whether he will consider the liquidity requirements of banks, which might encourage them to look at equity investments and longer-term loans.

Above all, what is needed for a long-term investment strategy for British industry is stability. The Budget is an important step in producing that stability that industry requires. Entrepreneurs need encouragement. Family businesses want equity partners. Business starters require long-term help and industry must have new plant to boost productivity. We are on the road to economic success, and we need to ensure that we achieve it through long-term investment.

Ms Angela Eagle (Wallasey): I listened carefully to the speech of the hon. Member for Bromsgrove (Mr. Thomason). He must be one of the few people to have visited Eurodisney, as he seems to have spent all his life in fantasyland. I do not recognise the society that he described.

I noted the lack of response on the prickly issue of tax rises when I questioned him on the overall tax burden. It is an untypical occasion in that it is our first ever unified Budget. Unfortunately, it is leading to a depressingly familiar mixture of wrongheaded ideological economic bigotry from the Government, and cynicism that is so glaring that only the British Conservative party seems to be capable of it.

The Budget is also revealing because Budgets are a time for choice. They reveal the Conservative philosophy behind what they do, their views on society, for which we shall soon call them to account in the run-up to the next election. The Budget is cynical because of the utter betrayal of all the Conservative party's election promises, none more so than on taxes. That is what this Budget represents.

We must go back to the Budget before the last general election in 1992 and see how the Conservative party then presented the economic state of the nation. First, there was a tax-cutting Budget. When we look at the Red Book from that time, we find that the deplorable state of the economy was either conveniently not noticed or wilfully covered up. I shall leave it to individuals to decide who caused the mistakes.

The £50 billion deficit on the PSBR, with which we are so concerned at this time, was absent from the figures and was much lower than those in the Red Book at that time. It was only after the general election that the small and conveniently underestimated deficit on the PSBR suddenly ballooned to £50 billion and became the centrepiece of the strategy for the two subsequent Budgets that we have had this year in the aftermath of the general election. We have a Chancellor who boasts about cutting the PSBR figure placed before the electorate in the Red Book by no less than £8 billion. That is £8 billion fewer for public services, schools, hospitals, investment in our crumbling infrastructure, welfare protection, transport, and so on. In the Budget, 3 per cent. of GDP was taken out of the economy. By any stretch of the imagination, that is a massively deflationary package.

The Howe Budget in 1981, which caused such a catastrophic depression, was openly described as a deflationary Budget for taking a mere £1·8 billion of expenditure out of the economy. Taken with its predecessor in March, there is no description for the Budget other than massively deflationary, and we must be worried about that.

The two Budgets must be taken together. Only then can one see the colossal switch in Government expenditure and values facing us now. It is a huge pincer movement. There has been a £23 billion overall increase in taxation. Who would have believed that from looking at the Conservative party election manifesto?

As I tried to explain to the hon. Member for Bromsgrove, the GDP share taken in taxes, based on the Government's figures, is forecast to go up from its present 34·25 per cent. to 38·5 per cent. by 1998. I must point out once more for the record that, in 1979, when the last Labour Government left office, the share of GDP taken in taxes—the overall tax level in the economy—was 34·75 per cent.

Income taxes are to be raised, albeit surreptitiously, by £5·2 billion, through the freezing of allowances, changes to the married couple's allowance and changes in national insurance contributions, all of which are the opposite of the pledges that were given during 1992 and will add the equivalent of 3p to basic income tax rates.

The Conservative Government do not raise income tax rates directly—they do not have the guts or the courage to do that. They raise them surreptitiously and try to claim that tax rises are not going on. But the facts are there. When people look at the deductions from their pay packets from next April, and as the tax increases begin to bite in the following years, they will understand, more than the Government believe, precisely what is involved in the Budget package.

It has been estimated that we have also taken back with the massive rises in taxes almost all the tax giveaways that were such a feature of Conservative Governments in the 1980s. But they have not been taken back from the people who received them in the first place. As I pointed out, almost a third of the money given away in tax increases in the 1980s—some £9 billion—went to the top 1 per cent., while only £4·5 billion went to the bottom 50 per cent.

That is why in the past 14 years of Conservative government there has been a reversal in income distribution, so that the difference between rich and poor, and the number of people who are now poor, is back to the level it was when General Booth first invented policy statistics and began to measure them in 1886. That is a deplorable record of which the Government should be ashamed.

As well as massive tax rises, we are seeing swingeing cuts in the welfare state. That is another way in which the Chancellor is trying to balance the books, which are so unbalanced by the Government's economic mismanagement. We have heard much in the debate about changes in the benefit system and the way that it will affect some of the worst-off people. That very much reflects the values of the Conservative Government: do not take back the massive tax giveaways that were given to those who are already rich, but instead tax those on invalidity benefit, and introduce VAT on fuel so that some of the poorest people in society can be taxed to pay for the economic mismanagement; but whatever one does, do not tax those who can afford to pay it.

We have heard announced in the Budget a vicious three-year squeeze on the public sector, which involves public sector pay and provision. I seriously doubt whether those spending targets can be kept. If they are kept, as a result of decisions taken in the Budget we shall have a public sector that is increasingly dilapidated and unable to replace essential goods, services and infrastructures.

We must also remember that the public sector has been grossly neglected over the past 14 years. It is already in a weakened state. The fairness of introducing a public sector pay freeze and expecting it to last for three years, on top of the annual freeze on the 1·5 per cent. increase for those who work in the public sector, beggars belief. It will be extremely difficult for the Government to make their pay policy stick.

Mr. Clifton-Brown: The hon. Lady argues that the Budget is deflationary. Therefore, I can only assume that she wishes to increase public expenditure. If that is the case, which of the many taxes aired by the Labour party would she increase?

Ms Eagle: I shall come to the deficit shortly and explain what I believe should be the principles for dealing with it. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will wait until I get to that part of my speech.

None of the massive increases in taxes and vicious cuts in public spending was mentioned in the Conservative party manifesto. The manifesto claimed that the Conservative party was the party of low taxation; a claim that has been exposed for the cynical farce that it is. The Conservative party boasted about increasing public expenditure, yet as soon as the Conservatives have their greedy hands on the reins of power, they do the opposite.

The Prime Minister's promises—they have been much quoted in the House, so I will not repeat them—have been exposed for the cynical sham that they are. Soothing pre-election noises about the welfare state have been replaced with fundamentalist new brutalism, which was rampant at the Tory party conference. It is fairly clear from looking at the position of the Conservative party at the moment that the right of the party is on the rampage, and it is led by those in the Cabinet whom the Prime Minister one accused of being of doubtful parentage. They are beginning to get their way. The lunatics have taken over the asylum and they are in the driving seat. The Prime Minister is either with them and agrees with them, or he is too weak to stop them. In the next few months, we shall be able to judge which of those conjectures is true.

There is nothing new about the Conservatives' ability to play fast and loose with their election pledges. At the last general election, there was a famous and effective Conservative party smear about Labour's so-called tax plans. Hon. Members will remember all those posters saying things like "Labour's tax bombshell" on all those free poster sites given by the tobacco advertisers so that the Tories could put their propaganda around the country. The Conservatives claimed that, under Labour, a car worker earning £12,000 a year would be £359 a year worse off and an electrician earning £30,500 would be £563 worse off. As a result of the Budget, by 1996, a car worker will be £520 worse off and an electrician £570 worse off. I hope that the electorate will bear those illustrative figures in mind when they next consider which way to vote at a general election. The electorate will never trust the Conservative party again.

The willingness to deceive the electorate is nothing new for the Tories. The Prime Minister and his Cabinet colleagues are just following a discredited tradition that has existed for a long time in the Tory party. Recently, I was shuffling through a book shop when I came across a book entitled "My Style of Government: The Thatcher Years" by Nicholas Ridley. It was the late Lord Ridley's memoirs, which I got for £2·99 off a discount rack, presumably because the market was working. I want to quote a couple of his pearls of wisdom. First, writing about the run-up to the 1979 election, he said:

"They"——

the British electorate——

"were not invited to switch to a Government with clearly spelt out superior alternative policies. Margaret Thatcher was careful not to articulate them too clearly in public for two very good reasons. First, she was not at all assured of her colleagues' support for what she wanted to do. Second, it is never wise for an opposition leader to expose his or her detailed policies to the possibility of ruthless dismemberment by the Government."

Later, he said:

"Thus, the full nature of Thatcherism was not known to the electorate in 1979. Nor was it fully understood within the Parliamentary Party."

The Prime Minister has carried on that tradition and taken it further. Rather than hiding what he aims to do, he has said that he will do the opposite. That is progress in the Conservative party.

There is general agreement that the £50 billion deficit in the PSBR must be tackled, but there is no Government analysis of where the deficit came from. It is almost as if it just descended from above and landed on the Government and they now have to think of a way to deal with it. In reality, it is here because of the failure of their farcically named economic miracle. It is descended directly from the failures of their 14 years in power.

There is also £100 billion worth of North sea oil revenue to be taken into consideration. They have given it away in tax cuts for their rich friends, leaving British industry unmodernised and in a weakened state. The OECD recently said that two thirds of the public sector borrowing requirement is cyclical—it is unemployment related. The figures show that £27 billion of the deficit goes on paying to keep people on the unemployment registers, where they are unproductive.

Typically for the Conservative Government, they have decided that if close to half their deficit is a result of unemployment, they should cut benefits. They attack the victims and the symptoms but never the causes. Given the structure of the deficit, a job strategy should have been at the heart of the Budget. Noticeably absent from this Budget, as it was from the March Budget, is any such strategy. Most of us would welcome the sprinkling of supply-side policies, but they are irrelevant given the size of the problem.

We have to cut the £27 billion cost of keeping people on the dole, not by cutting unemployment benefits but by creating jobs and getting people back to work. The fatal flaw in the job seeker's allowance—it is a revealing name for the benefit, which causes cynical, hollow laughs among unemployed people—is that it blames the victims of unemployment for their situation. It does nothing about demand in the economy and it almost blames people for being on the dole.

On average, 22 people chase every vacancy. When the Secretary of State for Employment went into the job market after leaving university, there was a job for every person looking for one. The situation has since deteriorated markedly. Nobody would disagree with supply-side measures that make it easier for people to look for jobs, but behind the unwritten strategy is the assumption that jobs are there for them to take. Twenty-two people chasing every vacancy shows that the jobs are not there. Therefore, we must do something to stimulate demand.

The Budget is predicated on several dubious assumptions. The first is that the rather modest growth rates that the Budget predicts will be unaffected by its deflationary aspects. After the Howe Budget, which was less deflationary than this, growth plummeted. This time, there is no credit boom to fuel economic recovery, as there is a mountain of debt caused by the deregulation of the financial institutions that the Government introduced in the early 1980s.

Secondly, the Budget assumes that world trade will recover rapidly and grow, and possibly also that there will be a deal on the general agreement on tariffs and trade. Both those assumptions are dubious and not a predictable enough basis for an entire Budget strategy.

Thirdly, the Budget assumes that the public sector squeeze will stick, but there will be real troubles with that, and rightly so.

The Budget punishes victims and makes the wrong choices. It has the wrong economic and political philosophies behind it. We shall condemn it and vote against it for those reasons.

8.7 pm

Mr. David Lidington (Aylesbury): I listened with care to the hon. Member for Wallasey (Ms Eagle). She thought that the public sector deficit was far too high, but she did not want to put up taxes or cut public expenditure. She glided gently over public borrowing. Whatever his critics would say about the late Lord Ridley, they would never accuse him of intellectual incoherence, and the hon. Lady and her hon. Friends might do well to learn the lesson of intellectual coherence from the life and politics of Lord Ridley, rather than taking up one or two of his tactical hints, which they seem to have done successfully over the past few weeks.

I wanted to begin my speech on a non-partisan note. One of the fruitful disciplines of having a unified Budget is that it provides an institutional discipline for Whitehall Departments to think carefully about priorities within the context of the Government's overall programme and to consider how the policies of each Department relate one to another. The example that I had in mind was transport.

I was pleased that at the margins of the announcements of my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor was the decision to ring-fence money so that the crossrail project could proceed on its next stage. As my right hon. Friends know, I hope that that means that the Government are backing the project whole-heartedly and I look forward to the next stage and its eventual completion.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor announced measures that will affect transport policy. I welcome the decision to make it easier for the private sector to become involved in the planning and financing of infrastructure projects. That may have the beneficial side effect of making it more transparent to judge the cost and benefit of road schemes compared with rail schemes, which traditionally have been calculated using different analyses.

[Mr. David Lidington]

I also welcome my right hon. and learned Friend's decisions on petrol duty and an experimental road-pricing scheme. Those decisions raise difficult questions. My hon. Friend the Member for Bedfordshire, South-West (Mr. Madel) said that A roads or minor local roads might be swamped with traffic if a motorway toll charge were so high as to force traffic off that motorway. The road-pricing and petrol duty measures will reduce congestion and pollution, but they would have the inevitable effect of biting hardest on poorer drivers, the ones most likely to be forced off the road.

The Budget provides us with a very welcome opportunity to develop a transport policy that is in line with the Government's environmental objectives. I was glad that my right hon. and learned Friend, in announcing his measures for the financing of transport and taxes on transport, referred to the United Kingdom's international obligations to reduce emissions. I hope that the debate that has been initiated by the Budget statement will be fruitfully taken further, both in the House and in the country at large.

I am aware from the controversy over the proposed A418 in my constituency of the difficulty that policy makers inevitably face in reconciling the competing demands of economic growth, the need for good communications, including good road communications, and the need to maintain a civilised environment in towns and cities and in the countryside, the beauties of which people can continue to enjoy.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth (Surrey, East): Given that we accept a degree of hypothecation in the road tolling proposals, does my hon. Friend agree that it would be helpful if the money raised by road tolls was not ploughed straight back into the motorway system but applied to transport infrastructure projects generally—with, of course, the assistance of the private sector?

Mr. Lidington: My hon. Friend has made a characteristically constructive proposal which I hope our right hon. Friends will take seriously.

I was interested in the fact that my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, East (Mr. Ainsworth) raised the question of hypothecation, because my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor also referred to it in his announcement. Another unintended consequence of a unified Budget, from the Treasury's point of view, is that Ministers collectively will be bound in future to consider the Government's priorities, not only on spending but on what is the best means of raising the revenue with which to finance those expenditure priorities. I know that to speak in such a way is to challenge one of the most hallowed doctrines of Treasury theology, but I confess to being a fully paid-up member of the heretics and blasphemers tendency when it comes to that belief. I have already referred to the tension that inevitably exists between the priority to be given to economic growth and environmental needs.

Hon. Members have rightly spoken about the problem of unemployment. I welcome the Chancellor's Budget and agree with the plaudits given to my right hon. and learned Friend by Conservative Members by the business community and by observers in the media. When people look back on the Budget of autumn 1993, they will judge its effectiveness in terms of how far it was seen to promote the chances of more British men and women moving into productive employment in the medium term.

In my constituency, unemployment is still way below the national average—for which my constituents and I are grateful—but it is still high by Aylesbury's historic experience. Although I welcome the fact that unemployment has fallen in recent months, it is still too high and needs to be further reduced.

I welcome the initiatives in the Budget to foster and develop businesses, particularly small businesses. If every small family business could be enabled to take on one additional employee, that would make an enormous dent in the national unemployment level. My right hon. and learned Friend's announcement about late payments and statutory audit requirements will be warmly greeted by business men and women in my constituency.

The tax changes to encourage investment and reinvestment in family enterprises are also welcome, particularly the tax concessions for investment in the proposed business link schemes announced by my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade.

One lesson which we have learnt as a country during the past few years is that it is all well and good to encourage businesses to start up—it is healthy that we should do so—but a number of people go into business without equipping and training themselves for the difficulties and challenges that that will bring. The business link scheme promoted by the Department of Trade and Industry is an important way in which the Government will be able to focus support and advice on small businesses during the crucial early years and months of their development.

I hope that the Department of Trade and Industry will soon give approval to Thames Valley Enterprise's bid to set up business link offices in Aylesbury and in two other towns in the Thames Valley area.

I welcome the measures that have been announced to improve the quality of the British work force and the priority to be given in the Government's public spending plans to education and training and to the apprenticeship scheme announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment. As that scheme develops, he will be able to draw on the good practices of the many Government, voluntary and business initiatives up and down the country, including the scheme run by the Aylesbury industrial training group, which is an active client of Thames Valley Enterprise.

Despite the predictable criticism from the Opposition, there is everything to applaud about the principle of the job seeker's agreement. It is surely common sense that when an unemployed person presents himself or herself at a jobcentre, he or she should not only sign on and obtain a list of potential job vacancies or employers to approach but discuss a plan, tailored to individual experience and expectations, which he or she will be able to follow in his or her search for work.

There are measures that can be taken to improve the effectiveness of the job seeker's agreement and to ensure that, when it is introduced, it will be positively welcomed by unemployed people. It is important to ensure that Employment Service staff are adequately trained in developing such agreements with their clients. I know that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, like every other Minister, has a finite kitty from which to draw, but I urge him to look again at the time that we allow to elapse before such measures as job clubs are available to those who are unemployed.

Constituents of mine who have been unemployed for a long period tell me that they were at their most enthusiastic, determined and creative about finding new work in the weeks and months immediately after they were made redundant. By the time unemployed people qualify for extra help of the kind that we have understandably targeted on the long-term unemployed, much of that initial drive, commitment and self-confidence has dissipated. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Minister will consider whether there are ways of giving people some of that assistance at an earlier stage in their unemployment.

Finally, I want to refer to the international scene. Despite what Opposition Members have said, the fact that the United Kingdom expects 2 per cent. growth at a time when our main continental markets are stuck deep in recession is something of which the Government and, more particularly, British industry, should be very proud. We should be looking not merely for a cyclical upturn in our main European markets but to long-term competitiveness in British industry and in industry throughout the European Community. We are talking about competing not just with Germany, America and France but with the fast-developing economies of the far east and, behind them, south Asia and Latin America.

Too often, the rise of the far east tiger economies is seen simply as a challenge to our way of life. That challenge certainly exists and increases the need for a flexible labour market and for an economy in Britain and Europe that fosters innovation and efficiency. The rise of Asian prosperity also presents a tremendous opportunity because it means that hundreds of millions of people in the world are now beginning to have the opportunity, for the first time ever, to buy consumer goods and services that people in western Europe have generally taken for granted for many years. It would be an act of madness for the European Community to connive at policies of protection that would cut us off from those millions of customers precisely at a time when we should be able to sell them the goods and services that we produce.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister referred in a celebrated recent article to some of the current preoccupations of the European Community as having all the quaintness and degree of efficacy of a tribal rain dance. The image that comes to my mind when I look at some of the goings-on in Brussels is one drawn from Galsworthy. It is of a group of elderly Forsyte aunts with a rather complacent view of past success and present wealth punctuated by the occasional querulous and disapproving comment about all those uncouth, self-made men in the new neighbourhood down the road who are rather getting ideas above their station. That is too often the reaction of EC civil servants and political leaders in some of our partners countries to the challenge and opportunity in the far east.

The Budget will be of great benefit to Britain's recovery from recession. Clearly, too, the continued prosperity of the British people does not rest alone on the Budget and the measures that will follow it. It rests perhaps above all else on the success of my right hon. Friends in fighting a battle of economic ideas both in the United Kingdom, against the forces of reaction on the Opposition Benches, and on a European scale—a battle for deregulation, for free markets and for free trade. I wish them well and I wish them every success in that task, for the prosperity of our nation and of the entire European continent depends crucially on their success.

Ms Glenda Jackson (Hampstead and Highgate): It is with some pleasure that I follow the hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington)—not because of the logical cohesion of his speech, but because of his disingenuousness in asking the Secretary of State for Employment to ensure that job seekers will welcome an agreement that will be imposed upon them, knowing that, if they refuse to sign it, they will not have their benefit reduced by six months but will receive no benefit at all.

As a Member who represents a London constituency, I awaited this year's Budget with some anticipation, not least—despite initial difficulties in obtaining a copy—because of the consultation document produced by the Secretary of State for the Environment earlier this month, entitled "London, Making the Best Better". I had read with interest how the Government would deal with crime in our capital, raise standards in education, improve housing and the transport system and, in the words of the Secretary of State,

"ensure a fair and open society for people of all backgrounds."

It was therefore with some regret that I noted the difference between that document and the words uttered by the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

In my constituency—unlike that of the hon. Member for Aylesbury—unemployment is at heights that have never before been recorded. In some parts of London, unemployment is above not only the national but the European average, with 22, 26 and, in some parts of London, as many as 37 job seekers pursuing the same job.

Earlier this afternoon, the Secretary of State for Employment stated that the whole purpose behind the job seeker's agreement was to ensure that the job seeker pursued a job with all possible effort. As we are now a full member of the European Community, that presumably means that British job seekers will be expected to seek jobs on the continent of Europe. I wish that I had had the opportunity to ask the Secretary of State whether the financial provision that would make that possible will be furnished even though unemployment benefit is to be reduced.

Getting to the continent—indeed, getting around our capital city and these islands—is becoming increasingly difficult if one depends on public transport. The Chancellor pledged that British Rail and London Transport investment would be maintained at levels substantially higher than in the 1980s.

I am sure that no hon. Member will need to be reminded of which Government were responsible for the scandalously low levels of investment to which the Chancellor referred; nor that investment in our rail network is lower than it was in the 1970s, the 1960s or the 1950s; nor of the response of London Underground to the Chancellor's announcement about their forthcoming levels of investment. London Underground stated:

"There is not a limitless seam of self improvements to be mined and only so much can be achieved with an aged system, where many assets are way beyond their design life."

Compare that with the words of the Secretary of State's glossy brochure:

"London is developing to meet the challenges of the next century. Next year, Parisians will be able to get to London in around three hours using the Channel Tunnel."

[Ms Glenda Jackson]

What fantasy world is it that the Secretary of State is thinking of in which chic Parisians are whisked to and around a modern vibrant London on a modern state-of-the-art transport system?

Suppose that Parisians wished to visit London—and, following the kind and welcoming words that the Secretary of State for Social Security uttered at his party conference, what foreign national would not wish to visit this sceptred isle—what sight would greet them? Air that one can chew on, doorways that double as bedrooms and a transport system parts of which were designed not for the 21st century but in the 19th century.

Were Ministers out of the country last Thursday and Friday? Did not they witness or were not they told of the chaos which was caused when a fault in a 70-year-old cable —a cable laid before most of the Government were even born—shorted out and plunged half the underground system of our capital city into chaos and darkness?

Following that incident, I contacted officials of the Northern line, which serves my constituency. The officials informed me that that line has cables of a similar age and condition across their network. The officials added that, earlier in the previous month, a train had derailed near Balham, when more than 1,000 yd of track disintegrated. They added that, due to a lack of resources, the modernisation of a line that first opened in the 1890s would have to be shelved.

Today, the British Tourist Authority stated in the Evening Standard that investment in the Northern line—because of its link with the new Waterloo terminus—was vital for tourism in the capital. What has been the response of the Government to those derailments, power failures and continously shelved projects? The response has been to underfund London's transport budget in 1994-95 by £400 million.

How on earth can that be regarded as making the best better? Sixty per cent. of the signalling on Network SouthEast must be replaced within the next 10 years, and 2,000 miles of track must be renewed to avoid increased journey times. Over one quarter of the network's 6,000 coaches need to be replaced by 2002.

What was the Chancellor's response to those requirements? He cut investment in the rail industry by £247 million. Yesterday, the Chancellor was referred to in a number of media broadcasts as "the magician". That is clearly because he has completed the feat of sawing in half Britain's railway investment. Unfortunately, this feat is no illusion, and the pieces do not come back together again.

We heard a great deal yesterday about the burden that the nation is shouldering as a result of the public sector borrowing requirement. The Chancellor said that his overriding task was to place public finances on a sound footing. We heard nothing about the costs to the economy and to the Exchequer of allowing our transport system to decline to rack and ruin.

Perhaps, when the Minister winds up, he will outline how much revenue the City of London loses every year as a result of traffic congestion. Perhaps he would like to outline how much it would cost London Underground if all those who were trapped during last week's failure claimed compensation under the citizens charter.

Perhaps the Minister could estimate the attractiveness of the Central line to a foreign investor who is weighing up whether to sight his business in this country or in another European capital. Perhaps he could explain the environmental benefits of a road-building programme which will cost the taxpayer more than total expenditure on the railway industry, London Transport and the Civil Aviation Authority.

On Tuesday, the Chancellor claimed that any critic of the Government's car tax who claimed also to support the international agreement to curb carbon dioxide emissions would be sailing dangerously near to hypocrisy. I would respectfully suggest that any Chancellor who claims to support both public transport and the environment, and who then embarks on a £2 billion road programme, has sailed so far beyond hypocrisy as to be now watching it vanish below the horizon.

The brochure "Making the best better" is littered with the phrase, "What is going on?" Probably that is the only phrase that is applicable both to that document and to the Budget. What indeed is going on in relation to the Government's transport strategy and their policy, such as it is, towards unemployment? I think that hon. Members and the people of this country have a right to be told.

8.35 pm

Mr. Geoffrey Clifton-Brown (Cirencester and Tewkesbury): I am grateful to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I know that other hon. Members want to speak, so I will attempt to be brief. It is good to follow the erudite speech of the hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Ms Jackson), but I suspect that in my remarks we shall part company.

Any prudent Chancellor should set himself realistic objectives, and then expect to be judged by them. The present Chancellor set three key objectives—sustainable recovery, a climate for jobs and for growth, and low inflation. He said that the Budget would achive those, and would ensure sound public finances to secure a lasting recovery and rising living standards.

The Chancellor is to be congratulated on delivering a Budget that is capable of delivering all of those objectives. The previous Chancellor, my right hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Thames (Mr. Lamont), left two important legacies. The first was the unified Budget, which combined spending and tax raising, and the second was the separation of revenue and capital expenditure. The first of those is important, because it has ensured that economic management is now more efficient.

My right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Treasury is to be greatly congratulated on holding public expenditure at the level he has simply by tightening the use of the contingency reserve, which is normally available as a surplus to Departments at the end of each year. The second is important because for far too long this country has spent too much of its wealth on consumption and not enough on capital projects.

In that connection, I warmly welcome the maintenance of the capital programme at £22 billion over the next three years. Unlike the Labour party, our Chancellor decides what is prudent to spend and then decides how to raise the funds. Labour does exactly the opposite. It thinks what it might like to spend, and then decides which taxes to raise to pay for that.

I warmly welcome the fact that the PSBR will shrink as a proportion of GDP from 7·5 per cent. this year to almost zero by the end of the century. That will be a remarkable turnaround in the economy, which, when it is achieved, will take us to a situation similar to that which pertained in 1989-90. That can only be achieved by the fiscal responsibility shown by the Chancellor in the Budget and by holding public expenditure at a tight level.

To the dismay of the Labour party, and contrary to all the speculation before the Budget, we have not increased or widened the scope of VAT, with the small exception of putting VAT on insurance premiums. At the same time, there is a generous package of measures to help those who are less fortunate than ourselves—the sick, disabled and unemployed. I did not notice the Opposition giving one cheer of welcome for any of the measures. I have not noticed one shred of welcome for the fact that the Government have managed to fully uprate all benefits for inflation.

I was particularly pleased that the Chancellor announced a package of granny bonds, for which I have called for some time. I have constituents who have worked hard in fairly lowly jobs all their lives and who have saved a small amount which puts them above every benefit. They will take up these bonds with alacrity.

My constituents will also welcome the environmental fiscal measures which the Chancellor introduced in the Budget. The doubling of the home energy efficiency scheme is particularly welcome. The hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Raynsford) is present. He and I, along with other hon. Members, have taken part in an energy efficiency inquiry by the Environment Select Committee. Our report said that, if we do not improve our housing stock, and particularly the energy efficiency of the stock, it will be like pouring carbon through a sieve. We must continue to ensure that our housing stock is more energy-efficient.

The human element in this is more important. The fuel bills of people on low incomes will be cut, so they will have much more of their income from benefits, or wherever else they get their income, to spend on other things.

I wished to concentrate my remarks on the measures for small and medium businesses. There are 1 million more small businesses today than in 1979. They have been the main contributor to the 1·3 million extra jobs to which the Secretary of State for Employment referred. Those businesses will continue to be the engine for growth in the economy.

I warmly welcome the package of measures for small businesses. I particularly welcome the fiscal measures—the raising of the VAT thresholds, the exemption of small firms from corporation tax, enterprise investment schemes, venture capital trusts and the new apprenticeship scheme which was announced this afternoon by the Secretary of State.

Businesses will be helped by the involvement of the private sector in large-scale public infrastructure projects. My constituents will particularly welcome the upgrading of the west coast main line, in which many firms in my constituency will hope to participate.

Even more than the fiscal measures, I welcome the deregulation measures for small businesses. In that respect, my right hon. and learned Friend announced four major measures. First, he said that he will look carefully at harmonising the tax and national insurance arrangements for employers. I would go further than that, and have a Government agent as a link man between all Departments and businesses.

When the VAT man came to inspect my books the other day, I told him of that idea, but he said that I could not expect a VAT man to be an expert on income tax, employment law and everything else. To which I replied that I was expected to be an expert on VAT as well as many other things. The costs to businesses could be cut by such an arrangement.

Secondly, I warmly welcome the limited audit requirements. As my right hon. and learned Friend has already announced, they mean that, with turnover between £90,000 and £300,000, companies will require an independent accountant's report, and below £90,000 none at all.

I have just one caveat which I hope my hon. Friend the Economic Secretary will bear in mind this evening—that creditors could be at risk. When the measure is introduced, I hope that those businesses will be required to add a caveat on their invoices, letterheads and quotations so that all their creditors and customers know precisely with what type of businesses they are dealing.

Thirdly, and most importantly, I warmly welcome the proposals on the late payment of debts. That will be difficult to achieve, but if a workable solution can be found, it will enormously improve the cash flow of many small and medium-sized businesses.

Fourthly and finally on these deregulation measures, I welcome the self-declaration and assessment measures for paying income tax. I particularly ask my right hon. and learned Friend to study other models in the world. I fear that there is a danger of the new system becoming even more complicated than the present system. In particular, I ask him to look at the American model, which is relatively simple and which I believe collects most of the tax due, which is surely the test that the measure will have to pass.

My right hon. and learned Friend has delivered a Budget to restore public finances and enterprise, which drove this economy during the 1980s to such success, and that against a background of low inflation, low interest rates and low unit wage costs. No wonder the markets have reacted so well during the past few days.

Under this Government, the economy will go from strength to strength as it is the only growth economy predicted this year and next year in Europe.

8.42 pm

Mr. Alan Simpson (Nottingham, South): I was particularly fortunate in having been given a sneak preview of the Chancellor's Budget speech about a week before it was delivered. I happened to be on a tour of a pools company at the time and we had reached the point where it kept its records of the major cock-ups in the industry.

I was shown a picture of a spot-the-ball competition which was run in a regional newspaper where, inadvertently, the ball had not been deleted. Fortunately, some eagle-eyed person on the paper had spotted that and alerted the company. Right next to the advertisement was a huge disclaimer telling the readership and the punters that the promoters had made that cock-up, that they were terribly sorry, that they would not be running the competition that week and that they hoped that people would understand.

In the following week's edition of the paper there was a story pointing out that, despite the disclaimer, 10,000 coupons had been returned—all missing the ball. I realised that I was being given a preview of the Chancellor's Budget statement, one week later.

The Chancellor was presented with a picture on which the ball was firmly planted. Not only that, but in large letters across the ball was written the word "jobs". In case the Chancellor missed that, one could see, hanging on the lips of the crowd behind the word "jobs". But he faced a dilemma because his party had already submitted its coupon and the crosses were all clustered on another part of the picture, so what was he to do? The Chancellor knew that those crosses would be the crosses that were cast in the future leadership election of the Conservative party. But the ball was somewhere else. It did not matter that his party was as disconnected from the game as they are from the real world outside; he had another agenda. So, like the magician that he is reputed to be, he put another ball in. He put it in the middle of the crosses that mattered, the crosses that belong on the Conservative Benches, and ignored the crosses that his Budget statement will impose on the backs of the British people.

I wondered, if the Chancellor had had the vision or the courage to see where the ball was, what he would have said. What would he have said if he had really been prepared to deliver a Budget statement that addressed the issue of jobs?

Well, today he would probably have insisted that we began the proceedings not with a debate which outlined how local authorities would face cuts and capping, but he would have been telling those local authorities, "Look, we are in a mess. I want you to go out and build and improve houses. I want you to go out and take the jobless off the dole so that we can take the homeless off the streets. That's what this country needs you to do. That's what I need you to do. We are going to build our way out of the recovery." That is what a Chancellor who was committed to jobs would have said.

The Chancellor would then have told engineers and designers in manufacturing, "Do us a favour, will you? Build us some buses. I am fed up with these milk floats rattling round our cities, congesting the roads where we used to have decent integrated public transport systems, with buses that we used to build ourselves. We are a Government who are in the business of buying buses and we want a manufacturing industry in Britain that is in the business of building them." The Chancellor would then have gone to the mills and said, "We need some steel. We need rolling stock for the railways. We need rail investment to match that in France, Germany and Japan. That is what the future of a manufacturing base of a Britain fit for the 21st century must be built on."

The Chancellor would have gone to the pensioners and said, not on a token basis but on a comprehensive basis, "We will come up with a plan to insulate your homes. It must be energy efficiency for all or none at all. We need such energy efficiency work because it is labour intensive. We can take people off the dole and give them skills and jobs as well as saving pensioners' lives. And while we are at it, you can forget about VAT on domestic fuel: it was a cock-up of our own, so let us ignore it if we can—least said, soonest mended."

The Chancellor would have gone to parents around the country and said, "You were absolutely right to demand a nursery place for every child that wants one, because they found in America that juvenile crime was best deterred in those areas where they invested in pre-school nursery care and education for all children. That is what we know we need to be doing here". The Chancellor would have said, "I can guarantee a Budget that will put books in the classrooms, in schools with roofs that do not leak any more".

As for the national health service, the Chancellor would have said, "We shall not be conducting this argument between the trusts or local hospitals and the district health authority, where they are left making decisions about shoving patients in critical states of health into the back of ambulances and sending them careering round local roads trying to find a bed that has a nurse to go with it. We shall be providing you with additional funding for the nursing staff that is needed to run our intensive care units properly within a properly staffed and resourced NHS."

If the Chancellor had wanted to be an environmentalist and an internationalist, he would have gone to the miners and said, "Look, we are really worried in Britain. Only a month ago the Government of the Ukraine reversed a decision to close down the remaining three parts of the Chernobyl reactor. Why? Not because they thought that it had suddenly become safe, but because they knew that they could not survive the winter without energy from those reactors. They know that they face a major environmental catastrophe. We know that they face a major environmental catastrophe." Three or four more Chernobyls would come across national boundaries and show no respect for Governments who have said, "It's nothing to do with us." The Government should be saying to the miners, "For God's sake lads, get down the mines and dig them some coal." We can afford to give them the coal. We need to give it to them because the choices in relation to environmental catastrophe are also our choices. The Government should also say to the miners, "While you're digging that coal, if there's any left over, pass it out among the pensioners until we get round to insulating their houses."

We did not get any of that in the Budget—instead, it took money out of the economy. Clearly, that will be deflationary and the problems of deflation will be borne by those who have least. It is a Budget under which the majority of people will pay for the recuperation of the rich. The period of unemployment benefit is to be halved, with no jobs at the end of it. The sick are to be taxed because they happen to be sick. Those with home insurance are to be taxed because they happen to have been burgled. Car owners will be taxed because they happen to have had their cars stolen. A Government who purport to be tough on crime will say "Tough" to an electorate who claim that the taxes are manifestly unfair. There is to be no strengthening of the position of the victims of household or car crime. Instead, they are to be punished for being the victims of the very crimes about which the Government wax lyrical when they talk of being tough and cracking down on crime.

The Chancellor tried to pretend a sense of even-handedness in the freezing of tax allowances, as though that was somehow neutral and there was no inflation in the economy. Life goes on and, unfortunately, such hidden taxes also go on. The idea of standing still and being neutral is absurd. It is a little like presuming that if we stood still on the deck of the Titanic we would all be fine. Sooner rather than later, someone would say to the person next to them, "It's still going down." That is precisely what is happening in the British economy—it is still going down.

This part of the Budget amounts to little more than a series of windfall taxes for the Treasury. It would have been better if the Chancellor had said that. He will soon find himself the recipient of the deferred taxes that were provided for last year. They will soon start to roll into his coffers. The stand-still taxes will magically appear and fall in his lap. It is not magical, it is not divine and it is not an act of God; it is the act of a Chancellor who is not being honest about where and how he is raising his taxes. If nothing else, the right hon. and learned Gentleman has come close to resorting to the notion of immaculate taxation as a way of raising money.

I want to be sure that the House is clear about the proposed public spending cuts. There is no fat left on the bone of local government spending. There will be service cuts, which will mean job cuts which will result in rising unemployment and further calls on the Exchequer to pay for that. Goods will be in the shops but there will be no money in people's pockets to purchase them. Even by Tory standards, this threatens to be the shortest so-called recovery on record.

In response to criticism, many Conservative Members have asked, "What would Labour do?" It is not for me to offer a Labour manifesto, but I want to offer some ideas that this House and the Labour party should consider. We should not be apologetic about mentioning them. First, we should thank the Chancellor for the unified statement. It helps us to move forward and to deal with the areas on which we propose to spend money while identifying the areas from which to raise that money. It is not just about clearing deficits; it is about what we could do constructively with the wealth that the Government raise and use on behalf of the people.

However, we must point out that the Government have been forced into that position because after 14 years of their being in power the country is in deep economic trouble. The main conclusion to be reached is that reliance on the free market has been a catastrophe. Inasmuch as it is about putting Britain back to work, it has not worked at all. The Labour party should not collude with the myth; it should not endorse it as a notion worth considering. Instead, it should point in a quite different direction.

Labour should say quite simply that as a party it is unashamedly committed to progressive taxation. We should ask people to contribute on the basis that the more that they earn, the more they are able to pay. We should ask least from those who are least able to contribute. The progressive tax hand-outs to the wealthiest in society during the 1980s should be first among the targets of an incoming Labour Government. That source of revenue could be better deployed than being given to those at the top end of the income scale who have taken the money and done a runner.

We should begin with the notion of a 50:50 tax. All those earning more than £50,000 a year should be asked to pay at least a 50 per cent. rate of tax. That would raise about £4 billion a year. We should also think about what to do with empty properties. The Government like to say that they forced local councils to use empty properties, but we never hear any mention of the empty offices that litter our cities. Their owners get away with writing off money that should be going to the public purse. They should pay 100 per cent. of the unified business rate in the first year. In the second, that would be multiplied by itself. In the third year, it would be multiplied to the power of three. There should be a premium on putting the office space in our cities into productive use. Those who are happy to sit on those empty properties and leave them unused while people are scratching around to find premises from which to operate businesses are acting against the public interest.

Whenever the Government are in difficulty, they do not tackle the problem—they simply move the goalposts. A future Labour Government should study how the public sector borrowing requirement is defined. Rather than using local authorities as regulators of the economy, it is time that Britain embraced a different relationship between central and local government—something that is far better understood on the continent. Local government should have a degree of autonomy. Its borrowing should be based on its capital assets, with the requirement only that it balances its revenue accounts. It should function as a municipal enterprise. We should separate local and central Government borrowing and take those figures out of the PSBR.

We should also recognise the commitments of our party conference and commit this country to a level of defence spending equivalent to the European average. That would mean a PSBR recycling of £8 billion. Germany, despite its reunification problems, is still the strongest economy within the European Community. Its defence spending is 1·9 per cent. of its gross domestic product. If this country recycled its defence spending in the way that Germany has done, that would release funds equivalent to the entirety of manufacturing investment in the United Kingdom. A sum of £13 billion would be freed for productive investment in our manufacturing base. If Germany can do that from a position of strength, why cannot this country do it from the position of weakness?

I thought that the Chancellor's tax on flights was a novel idea. Bill and Betty on their way to Benidorm will pay an extra fiver, or about 3 per cent. of the cost of their return flight. I thought that the idea had something to commend it. If flights by passengers can be taxed, why not also tax the flight of capital? I asked the Library how much a 3 per cent. tax on that would produce. I was told that it would produce a massive sum, so I scaled down my original figure.

No less than £40,000 billion of speculative capital moves through the London foreign exchange market each year. If a tax of one eighth of 1 per cent. were levied on that amount, it would bring the Chancellor revenue of £50 billion. Even a Conservative Government would be hard-pressed to lose all that in one year. Why spoil the summer holidays of ordinary people but be terrified of spoiling the speculative holidays of the City of London?

An incoming Labour Government would need to know that the biggest threat facing planned recovery is the permanently deregulated financial markets—markets which have the power to undermine any serious, sensible investment programme aimed at delivering economic recovery based on full employment. An incoming Labour Government would need to examine the ways in which capital has restructured itself on a European scale over the past 15 years, and to understand why a Conservative Government no longer needs to rely on finance from manufacturing. Their source of revenue and political support is international capital, which does not give two hoots about jobs in this country.

[Mr. Alan Simpson]

The Secretary of State mentioned the concept of jobless growth. At best, that is what faces us now. So long as we rely on the financial markets in the City to determine the pace and direction of economic policy, there will be no jobs in any growth package that emerges from this Chamber.

When the dust settles on this Budget, the British public will realise that the poor will be poorer, the homeless will still be homeless and this country will still be importing goods and exporting jobs. Far from having a Chancellor who is a magician, a one-in-a-million person and a visionary, we have a Chancellor who merely is one of the 10,000—a Chancellor who could not see the ball when it stared him in the face.

Mr. Peter Ainsworth (Surrey, East): The hon. Member for Nottingham, South (Mr. Simpson) made a number of points that I would have mentioned, had I more time. The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) was referred to earlier as neanderthal man. He seemed to take pride in that and was right to do so. By comparison with the hon. Gentleman, neanderthal man was advanced. The hon. Member for Nottingham, South, if not neanderthal man, was certainly homo erectus.

The failure of Oppposition Members to present any constructive ideas is the most distinguishing feature of the debate. We are used to them opposing Government policy, but they owe it to themselves and to their supporters to present a constructive view of their economic policies. We all have the message that they do not like the Budget—that is abundantly plain—but neither we nor the country know what are the Opposition's economic policies and how they would tackle the nation's deficit.

We heard many complaints from Opposition Members about the deficit, but have they ever asked themselves how it was created? It is the result of Government spending in areas that matter deeply to millions of people, including substantially increased health spending and increased expenditure in real terms on education in recent years. The Opposition must come clean: would they rather that money had not been spent? If they wanted that money spent, how can they oppose the Budget? That poses the Opposition with a real problem, and that is why we have not been given their answer.

I hope that in a moment we shall hear some constructive points from the Opposition, but the truth is that in their reaction to the Budget they have shown that they are bankrupt of any ideas for dealing with the deficit.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor has approached the problem in a balanced and sensible way. If there is a deficit, it is because the Government are spending too much money and therefore it is right that the burden of the Budget should fall on that Government spending. That is appropriate. It is also necessary to raise taxes in order to create a balance and to sustain increased spending on important things such as health, education, and so on. I am sure that Opposition Members would agree with that. So why are we suddenly seeing the most massive volte face of modern political times with Opposition Members failing to approve the Chancellor's tax plans?

I shall continue to live in hope that some Labour or Liberal Democrat Member will propose a positive plan for dealing with the economic situation in this country. They owe it to us, their supporters and to the country at large to do that. Conservative Members are the only politicians who have answers to the problems that Britain faces today, and the country understands that fact more and more as time goes by.

9.5 pm

Mr. Frank Dobson (Holborn and St. Pancras): I am glad that the Chancellor of the Exchequer is present. The Budget, as with every Tory Budget, was greeted with glee by Tory Back Benchers. It always reminds me of Walpole's statement that today they may be ringing the bells, but tomorrow they will be wringing their hands.

This Budget, as with every preceding Tory Budget, unravels day by day and week by week. It is becoming increasingly clear that this Budget will force people to pay more and receive less in return. It certainly breaks yet more Tory election promises. Nowhere is that more true than in London. From April this year, London's 1 million pensioners will have to pay VAT on fuel and the Chancellor's compensation will not make up for that—50p is not enough. The cuts in funds for housing associations will mean that fewer houses are built in London so that more families will be left homeless or, almost as bad, left living with their in-laws. The cuts in Government funding for local councils announced today will mean that services will be reduced and council tax bills will rise. Many of London's 500,000 people who are out of work will face having their unemployment benefit stopped after six months having paid in for years on the understanding that they would be covered for a year. That is a case of the Government doing a Maxwell.

Children in London's schools face losing teachers, books, equipment and school dinners as a result of the Government's reduced funding for London's desperate schools. The rents of tenants of councils and housing associations will be forced up. Londoners will pay more insurance tax than people in other parts of the country because the premiums for household insurance are so much higher in London.

Those are all examples of people having to pay more and receiving less. It would appear that short changing the public is becoming official Tory policy.

London Underground is becoming a sick joke. Every day passengers experience delays and disruption. Every day they climb emergency stairs because lifts and escalators are not working. Every day somewhere on the underground system the signalling goes on the blink and millions of gallons of water seep into the tunnels. Deep down, tube travellers fear that one day that water will gush in rather than seep in. Last week a cable failed and closed down a substantial part of the system. Parts of the cable were said to be 70 years old. The younger parts, if that is they way to describe a cable, had been there for at least half a century. The average London Transport train is 24 years old. A quarter of the signalling equipment was installed 40 years ago; and, if people want to put that into perspective, 40 years ago England had never lost to a foreign team at Wembley.

The whole system is falling apart. Many passengers get a poor service. Staff are sick to death of taking the blame for all the inadequacies. With maintenance problems rising, fewer staff are being employed on vital maintenance work.

Things are going from bad to worse, but what do we get in the Chancellor of the Exchequer's Budget statement? The Sir Humphreys worked on it carefully. It was worded thus:

"London Transport's investment programmes will be maintained at levels substantially higher than in the 1980s."—[Official Report, 30 November 1993; Vol. 233 c. 25.]

My only response to that is, "I should hope so," but that is a cut in what was most recently promised. It is also a cut in what was promised in the Conservative party election manifesto, which said that £3,500 million would be invested in the Underground over the next three years. The Chancellor has broken that promise.

The most recent promise was to make £964 million available for investment in the tube system. The new figure is down to £900 million, but the real position is worse than that. Most of the money we have heard about will go on new projects. The money that is left to be invested in the existing system—the one that passengers have to use, which is falling apart—has been cut from about £525 million to £325 million. That represents a cut of £200 million, or 38 per cent.

I emphasise that that is a cut in spending on the shambolic system that is in existence. Every pound that is removed from that total results in more misery on the misery line, more breakdowns, more delays and more people stuck in tunnels and labouring up emergency stairs. That is what tube travellers face, even if it is not experienced by Ministers going round in their chauffeur-driven cars.

It may have been the fear that their chauffeur-driven cars might be delayed that caused even this Government to defer their proposal to deregulate London's buses. Bitter experience in other cities apparently revealed to them that bus deregulation could result in gridlock from Hackney to Hounslow, and would be unpopular with voters. Instead of fully abandoning that crackpot scheme, however, the Government say that they have just postponed it. Instead, they are to force London Transport to sell off its bus operations.

Until now, London Buses has had to compete with private would-be franchisers for franchises on various routes, but apparently it has been too successful. In open competiton, it has been winning too many franchises for the routes. That public sector competitor is to be closed and forced to sell its assets. When that happens, assets are always sold off at knock-down prices. I remind the Chancellor that takings for the Treasury from privatisation have been roughly half the book value of the assets of each nationalised industry.

It is worth reminding the Government, who say that they are promoting tourism, that today the British Tourist Authority has expressed concern about the possible disappearance of the red bus from London. It says that "it is a symbol of London, which is recognised all over the world and an immensely valuable promotional tool."

Presumably, in future, brochures sent out by the authority to get people from around the world to come to London will contain photographs of buses of many colours instead of the red bus. Have the Chancellor and the Secretary of State for Transport considered the impact on tourism and tourism promotion of getting rid of the red London bus?

One thing does not come at a knock-down price—the cost of travelling, not only in London but throughout the country. From January, passengers on London Underground, London Buses and Network SouthEast face average fare increases of 6 per cent.—three times the rate of inflation. That is another example of people having to pay more in but getting less back. The same increases will apply to many other railway passengers.

Will those other passengers get a better service? It seems unlikely. On some lines there has been a deliberate deterioration in the service following the introduction of the passengers charter. The journey times in some timetables have been lengthened so that a train that takes one hour 20 minutes for a journey is arriving on time; under the previous timetable, if it took one hour 20 minutes on that route, it would have meant that it was arriving 10 minutes late. It now meets the charter's requirement, so apparently everything is well.

Somewhere in the Budget figures, the Government will have hidden away the cost to the taxpayer of rail privatisation. They have managed to hide it until now, but it will come out eventually, and it will be money from the taxpayer and passenger, not a penny of which will be spent on improving services. Instead, it will be diverted into the pockets of merchant bankers and motley crews of City consultants.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) said, this is yet another Budget for the City. People in the City have been the principal beneficiaries of the Government's privatisation programme, and they have also done rather well out of our usually abortive efforts to involve private sector finance in railway projects.

All those projects have several things in common. They are announced with a fanfare of trumpets, and then they are re-announced time and again, by press conference, press briefings or official leaks. That is intended to achieve the impression that something is happening, and that Tory Ministers are skilled in negotiations. It would be hard to get further from the truth.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Secretary of State for Transport were at it again yesterday and the day before, about the west coast main line. When the Tories came to power, that line, which links London to the major industrial and commercial centres in the west midlands, the north-west and the west of Scotland, was the most modern electrified railway in Britain. Today it is a national disgrace. It needs to be upgraded, but nothing has been done.

In his Budget speech, the Chancellor said:

"the Government are today giving the go ahead to three substantial new transport projects . . . the refurbishment of the west coast main line . . . linking some of the biggest cities in the country—London, Birmingham, Manchester, Liverpool and Glasgow."—[Official Report, 30 November 1993; Vol. 233, c. 930.]

He carefully did not mention that not a penny piece of public money is going into the scheme, or that the improvements might well be confined to the line south of Crewe, or that nothing has been decided, no commitments have been entered into and no contracts have been let.

The Secretary of State for Transport announced yesterday that Railtrack would be "inviting expressions of interest" and that, in late 1994, a competition would be held to select a private sector outfit to modernise the west coast main line, but from Euston to Crewe only. Even if it all goes ahead, therefore, it will be another two years before the work starts on the ground. It will probably be the 21st century before any passengers see any improvements, and the Transport Minister warned yesterday that it will lead to higher fares.

[Mr. Frank Dobson]

All that was announced, with the usual fanfare of trumpets, as good news for the passengers, the railway supply industry and the taxpayer. There was the usual talk of its having top priority, competition's doing the work and a great commitment to driving it forward. Everyone who uses the line hopes that the project will succeed, but all this circus has happened before, and people will believe it when they see it.

It really has happened before. Five years ago, in late 1988, the Government and British Rail announced what they called "first steps towards private sector investment in the Channel Tunnel rail link".

They were "inviting expressions of interest" and they proposed to hold a competition, so that someone from the private sector would build the line.

A year later, the then Transport Secretary, Cecil Parkinson, said that a preferred partner had been chosen —Eurorail, made up of Trafalgar House and BICC. It still needed the Government's final agreement, but Mr. Parkinson said that he was "encouraged by the clear indications that the link could be financed commercially and brought into operation by 1998."

As everyone knows, that scheme fell through. Nothing has been done, and the completion of the channel tunnel link will be delayed to the year 2003.

When, two weeks ago, the Secretary of State announced that he was having another go at getting private investment in the channel tunnel link, we were back to expressions of interest and the idea that the Government might hold a competition.

Five years ago, when Cecil Parkinson made that prediction, the development of the channel tunnel scheme was at exactly the same stage as that of the west coast main line yesterday. Five years later, not a damn thing has been done. To say the least, the Government's track record is poor. They may make that approach work this time, but they may not.

The people, the industry and the commerce that depend on the west coast main line deserve better than that. That line is a major economic artery, and its future should not be decided by a private sector lottery. Strategic decisions are matters for Government. The work is needed and it must be done. How it is financed is secondary—just as the finance for the improvements in the east coast main line was secondary.

Why should people who rely on the west coast line not get the same treatment as those who rely on the east coast line? Clearly a commitment is needed from the Government; the absence of their unswerving commitment adds the sort of uncertainty that private investors are desperate to avoid.

Then there is the crossrail project for London. That is announced and reannounced with such regularity that it is rumoured that some Transport Ministers now believe that it has been built. But it has not, despite all the Budget promises to the contrary. The project is falling behind, not getting ahead.

Next there is—hallelujah—the Jubilee line extension, which has been on and off for years. Its construction apparently depended on whether the property speculators at Canary Wharf came up with the £400 million that they had promised. That may have sounded generous of them, but we must bear in mind the fact that their speculative development at Canary Wharf had already received more than £350 million in subsidies from the pocket of the taxpayer.

In the end, after long negotiations, the Government announced that the developers could manage to come up with a contribution of £300 million. However, that was not as good as it looked, because Ministers had not allowed for inflation. I am a simple soul, and I asked whether inflation had been allowed for.

I found out that the figure of £300 million that the Government had trumpeted—the Chancellor ought to pay attention to this, because it could affect his calculations—is to be paid over a 20-year period, starting on the day that the Jubilee line extension comes into operation, whenever that may be.

Its value will not be uprated for inflation, so if inflation averages 4 per cent.—the top of the Government's target range—over that 20-year period, the real value of the private sector contribution will have halved, to £150 million. If inflation averages what it has averaged over the past 20 years—9·7 per cent.—the private sector contribution will be worth about £70 million.

If that inflation rate of 9·7 per cent. were to prevail for 20 years and, because of stupid negotiations by the Government, the money were to be paid in the final year of the 20-year period, the private sector contribution would be worth precisely £20 million of the £400 million originally promised. With that sort of track record, one would not want the Secretary of State for Transport even to sell one's used car.

That is not the end of the story. One of the principal merits of the Jubilee line extension, in all the cost benefit analyses—[Interruption.] The Chancellor of the Exchequer says that I am being ridiculous. Apparently he believes that it is right for the taxpayer to have to pay for the project at current values when the money is invested, but does not believe that the private sector should have to match that. In that case, he is not fit to be Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The Jubilee line extension is, of course, the first major investment in the tube since the Victoria line was built some years ago. We shall invest more than £1 billion in the core London Transport underground over the next three years, and another £1 billion-plus in the Jubilee line.

That is about half as much again as we used to invest in the 1980s, and about seven or eight times as much as used to be spent by that ridiculous body, the Greater London council, which allowed the Underground to decay, and presided over the old wiring, the overmanning and the declining service. Supported by the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson), the GLC preferred to spend its money on buying votes by keeping down bus fares. That was Labour's contribution to transport infrastructure in London.

Mr. Dobson: The Chancellor of the Exchequer in his present role ought to know that the Greater London council asked to invest more money, but was prevented from doing so by the Ministry of Transport and the Treasury. Indeed, the Chancellor may have been one of the Ministers who refused to give the GLC the permission.

One of the principal merits of the extension of the Jubilee line was to be a station at north Greenwich that would have allowed people from south-east London the access to the tube system that they are presently denied. Although the north Greenwich station was listed in the Secretary of State's press release, as one would imagine, and featured on the map published with the press release, there was no commitment to build the station. The line will go through north Greenwich, but the station will not be built because it is dependent on raising some other private sector money and the Government have not quite got round to it yet.

There was another attempted con about transport in London in the Budget. The Chancellor said:

"the Government are today giving the go ahead to . . . the extension of the docklands light railway to Lewisham".—[Official Report, 30 November 1993; Vol. 233, c. 930.]

That was partly true, but not the whole truth, because it is not the scheme that was originally announced. It is minus two important stations, which were left out for the most compelling of Tory reasons—they cannot get private sector help to build them. That brings the cost down, but reduces the usefulness of the line.

Rail schemes are not the only example of the incompetence of the Department of Transport. Its biggest spending programme is the roads programme and thus where its greatest incompetence is to be found.

The recent National Audit Office report shows that money from the roads programme that was spent on motorway widening has been squandered. Since 1989, the cost of motorway widening schemes has shot up by 46 per cent., and the National Audit Office estimates that it is likely to increase by over 78 per cent. by the time that the schemes are completed. Of the 18 schemes completed so far, 10 were investigated in detail by the National Audit Office and, on average, those 10 had cost double the original estimated cost. That is a disgrace.

We welcome the belated decision to reduce spending on the road programme, but call for some changes in its priorities. There is an opportunity for Ministers to be both right and popular—a novelty on both counts at the moment—but they are still insisting that roads schemes go ahead all over the country in the face of desperate opposition from local people, and are not going ahead with some schemes that are vital for economic development, the safety of passengers and would be clearly welcomed by local people.

Those vital schemes include converting the A1 north of the Tyne into a dual carriageway and ending the constant deaths that occur there, and to make the final few miles of the road to Dover docks into a dual carriageway. That would be welcomed by virtually everybody concerned, it would be good for the economy of both places and it would be popular. I hope that the Ministers will not use the Budget reduction as an excuse for further delays in those vital road-building schemes.

The Secretary of State for Transport announced today that he will be researching electronic road pricing for motorways. He has been seeing too many re-runs of "Doctor Who". That proposal has nothing to do with transport: it is just another Tory tax racket. I would not be surprised if they came up with a system that exempted Rolls-Royce drivers from having to pay. After all, the Chancellor's new airport tax exempts executive jets, as I am sure he will confirm.

If the Chancellor's little friend introduces motorway tolls on the road network, it is worth noting the list of the advantages of coming to Britain that was issued today by the British Tourist Authority. Item four of the 15 strengths is the high-quality, toll-free road network. That proposal will not do a lot of good. Did the Department of Transport or the Treasury consult the tourist industry or anyone before they went ahead with these propositions?

There is another aspect which the Chancellor did not mention in his Budget statement. He has raised tax on bus transport. Operators will have to pay the insurance tax, which will be passed on to the passengers. It does not stop there. The Chancellor put 3p a litre on road fuel duties and said that the duties would rise by 5 per cent. each year. What he did not mention—I cannot imagine why—was that the fuel duty rebate to local bus operators is not to be uprated, this year or any other year.

Perhaps he did not consult the Bus and Coach Council on the likely effect of this scam. The council has been in touch with me to say that its members are up in arms. The operators will pay more and more duty. They say that that will hit disabled and elderly passengers, because work to install wheelchair lifts and low floors will become more expensive relative to takings. Services in rural areas will suffer, orders for new vehicles are likely to be put back or cancelled, and fares will rise. It is like putting 2 or 3 per cent. VAT on public transport by the back door. It is entirely typical of the way in which this Government behave.

There is another transport aspect to the insurance tax. It is believed that about 1 million people do not insure their cars. A tax will be added to premiums that people do not want to pay in the first place. I freely acknowledge that such people are law breakers, but I know that we try to discourage and not to encourage law breaking. There is a danger that the imposition of that tax——

Mr. David Hunt: This is feeble stuff.

Mr. Dobson: The Secretary of State says that this is feeble stuff. If he thinks that it is feeble to say that we are in danger of increasing rather than decreasing the number of people driving uninsured vehicles around Britain's roads, there is something wrong with his own feeble mind. But he is only a lawyer, so I suppose that he can be excused. That also excuses the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

The Budget has done nothing for anybody in its impact on transport. It will increase the fares on trains, boats, aeroplanes and buses; I recognise that that does not rhyme, which is why the words were not used by Burt Bacharach.

The Budget will increase the cost of moving round the country and, as ever, the bulk of the increase will fall on the people who are worst placed to meet that cost. Well-off people will not suffer from those increases. Badly-off people will suffer from the increases, and many very badly-off people will suffer from the transport aspects of the Budget, just as they have been singled out by the Chancellor to bear the brunt of the Government's incompetence to date.

One of the most famous Tory Prime Ministers of all time, Benjamin Disraeli, was born in my constituency. He recognised—and convinced the 19th-century Tory party of this—that there was a danger of having a wholly alienated class of people who felt that they had no stake in the country. He said that it was vital that everyone was given a stake in the country.

The present Tory party is increasingly creating an alienated group, especially an alienated group of young people who feel that they have no stake in the country and that the Government have no commitment to their future. We allow that group to grow at our peril, and at the peril of our democracy.

9.33 pm

The Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Anthony Nelson): I reject entirely the vision of despair for this country described by the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson). His speech, which was a rumbustious conclusion to a debate that started with jobs and ended with tubes, was nevertheless an important contribution. I am the first to acknowledge the importance of railway services and transport services more generally to the people of London.

Anyone who heard the hon. Gentleman talk would not have thought that we have a planned expenditure on transport of some £17 billion over the next three years; that we had a planned investment programme of £15½ billion; that there was a core London Transport investment of £1¾ billion; plus £1·3 billion on the Jubilee line, plus the docklands extension, plus the Heathrow express. One would not have thought that £3 billion was being spent on the railway, of which £2 billion was public money.

What seems to besot the hon. Gentleman is the matter of who pays: if it is public money, it is good investment; if it is private investment, it is not on. What matters to rail users is the delivery of the services and the infrastructure. That is happening.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Echequer opened his Budget statement by saying that his priority was to develop and sustain the recovery and generate a climate in which investment, jobs and growth were sustained and increased. That is at the heart of what all Conservative Members have reiterated in their speeches on the Budget. The fact that he put up front the priority of jobs along with growth was a significant signal on a day that started with a speech by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment.

We all acknowledge the importance of getting people back to work and the unacceptability of the present high level of unemployment. Little mention was made, other than by my right hon. Friend, of the more positive effect —that there are 1·3 million more people in employment than there were 10 years ago. Nevertheless, it is important that we strive to create more job opportunities for those currently unemployed.

That is what many of the programmes and changes proposed by my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor should bring about. It was therefore appropriate in the debate that the first Conservative contributor was my hon. Friend the Member for Bedfordshire, South-West (Mr. Madel), who has taken such a long and abiding interest in employment issues. He raised several points during his speech, particularly with regard to the new heating arrangements, the new subsidies and grants that will be available to help people with insulation.

My hon. Friend asked about windows, and we shall certainly take on board his point. As I understand it, the scheme was not intended to apply to that, but it should, because it may cover the whole cost and leave people with more resources to pay for other insulation methods. The importance of the scheme is that it will benefit half a million households and will be available not just to means-tested pensioners but to pensioners generally. That is a significant allocation of public money.

My hon. Friend also raised the issue of Maxwell, and as the Minister with responsibility for financial services, I shall take careful note of what he said. We are all extremely concerned with the plight of those who have lost money. That is why the Government allocated moneys on a short-term temporary basis as bridging finance until the restitution of assets can be made available. I appreciate all that my hon. Friend has said today, as I did his comments on fuel duty, the apprenticeship scheme and venture capital trusts.

The hon. Member for Motherwell, South (Dr. Bray), who has written to me a number of times, raised the interesting question of the Treasury model. He put forward, as on previous occasions, the need for policy optimisation and the need for the formulaic approach of the model to be changed to take account of the policy maximisation theories and approaches that he has expounded.

We have reviewed many of the behavioural formulae that comprise the Treasury model and we have completed that process. As the hon. Gentleman will know, there is a regular process for re-examining that. We are open to suggestions. I have asked my officials to look carefully at his representations and I have offered him the opportunity to talk directly to Treasury officials. I hope that he will avail himself of that opportunity. I suspect that he and I may be in the minority of hon. Members who have taken the opportunity to use the Treasury model that was, and I hope still is, open to Members of Parliament. I agree with the hon. Gentleman about the importance of providing a service and a way to deliver indicators and statistics that can provide a firm foundation not just for Government economic policy but for Opposition parties, allowing them to attack and question the Government at any time.

The hon. Gentleman asked why we did not have an exchange rate policy and why there was no monetary policy. My right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor spoke of monetary matters during his statement, but foreign exchange currency rates are not a prime objective of policy. They are undoubtedly an assumption that we have to build into the mechanism, and we do that.

Dr. Bray: My central point was that if the Chancellor wants an efficient exchange rate and monetary policy—I was not questioning whether he has one—he needs to define it. That point was made by Sam Brittan in the Financial Times today. The Chancellor will find that if he does not deal with that issue now, he will have to do so at a later date, and I was offering him a way forward.

Mr. Nelson: I am grateful, but, for the reasons which I have given, that is not our approach.

My hon. Friend the Member for Erith and Crayford (Mr. Evennett) gave a warm welcome to the Budget. That he is very much in touch with his constituents was shown by the examples and representations that he quoted. I am grateful for his firm support of most of Tuesday's Budget statement. I particularly noted what he said about small businesses and about the package of benefits available, especially to elderly people. Like other hon. Friends, he mentioned the pensioner's guaranteed income bond. That is an important new facility available to those who want a regular monthly income.

The hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile) spoke about the enterprise investment scheme and the venture capital scheme. I regret the fact that he called it a confidence trick——

Mr. Alex Carlile: No, I did not.

Mr. Nelson: I immediately withdraw that accusation if that is not what the hon. Gentleman said.

Mr. Carlile: I was speaking about the pensioner's bond.

Mr. Nelson: I shall be dealing with the pensioner's bond in more detail in a moment.

The two vehicles for investment should be important contributors to the liquidity of new businesses and we shall provide front-end tax relief for the enterprise investment scheme, but it will be at 20 per cent. instead of 40 per cent. One of the problems with offering the higher marginal rate for the EIS was that it would have facilitated round-tripping for business angels—those who take an interest in the business of the company and pay themselves a salary out of it. We hope that by instead allowing relief against losses, the lower rate of relief on capital will prove to be extremely attractive.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bromsgrove (Mr. Thomason) raised an interesting but much wider issue—the short-termism of our financial institutions, of Government and of investors generally. My right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor has asked me to conduct an inquiry into that issue over the next seven months. The industrial finance initiative is two months under way, and the objective is to look at the financing of industry by all institutions and at the liability side of the balance sheet to see whether there is the short-termism to which my hon. Friend referred and whether supply changes can be made to increase the liquidity of capital to the manufacturing base, to help to start up companies and to ensure the reinvestment of capital.

I suspect that part of the answer will be that when one has a plateau of much lower levels of inflation and interest rates, there will be much more longer-term investment and one of the key components of the extent of overdraft finance and short-term investment interest has been the seeking of quick returns against rising and high levels of inflation. If we can deliver what the Government are determined to deliver—not just lower interest rates and lower inflation but a sustaining of those low levels—there is a real prospect of behavioural changes in the attitude of investors as well as of many others.

The hon. Member for Wallasey (Ms Eagle) spoke about massive tax rises. She got very excited and referred to Treasury Ministers as rampant lunatics at the driving wheel of the economy. We in the Treasury are modest men, cautious and conservative, and I did not recognise her description of us. However, when she picked up the autobiography of my late noble Friend Lord Ridley, I realised that she had been reading too many autobiographies, which perhaps accounted for her rather colourful description of us and of others.

My right hon. and learned Friend the Chief Secretary acknowledged yesterday that the Budget announced some tax increases above those that were announced earlier this year.

Mr. Prescott: Shock, horror.

Mr. Nelson: It is a matter of fact. There is no revelation in that. It is a serious Budget to address a serious situation. As my right hon. and learned Friend has said to the people of the country, unless we face up to our prime responsibility of addressing the state of the public finances, there is little prospect of sustaining the same level of personal prosperity or public services in the future. It is because of our desire to do both that we are determined to address the state of our public finances now.

My hon. Friend the Member for Aylesbury (Mr. Lidington) spoke about transport policy—about the A418 in his constituency and about many other local and national issues that affect it. I particularly appreciate what he said about publicly financed projects such as the west coast project, the air traffic control project in Scotland and the docklands light railway. Those will be important projects, not recycled ones, and together with many other projects will bring real jobs, massive investment and lasting improvements to infrastructure.

My hon. Friend the Member for Aylesbury also welcomed the small business package of measures. He made telling points about the issue of free trade and about the importance of Europe's adopting a free trade stance and not becoming protectionist against the free trade occurring in the Pacific basin and elsewhere in the world.

The hon. Member for Hampstead and Highgate (Ms Jackson)—who cannot be with us this evening—raised some points about London transport. I have already touched on those matters.

My hon. Friend the Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury (Mr. Clifton-Brown) made important suggestions, particularly with regard to small businesses. I am grateful for the welcome that he gave to the package of measures that my right hon. and learned Friend announced. We will look carefully at the detailed points that he made and I will write to him about those matters.

It was left to the hon. Member for Nottingham, South (Mr. Simpson) to do what no one else on the Opposition Benches has done. Despite our pleadings and challenges to come clean, not once has any Labour Member given the true alternative Budget strategy of the Labour party, other than the hon. Gentleman. I am grateful to him, and I appreciate his honesty and his coming forward with some ideas. Are those ideas the official Labour party policy?

The hon. Member for Nottingham, South said that he was in favour of a 50 per cent. tax rate for those earning more than £50,000 a year, and that that would raise some £4 billion. He was in favour of the top whack of rates and taxes on empty commercial properties, which would raise an indeterminate amount. He said that he was in favour of slashing the defence budget—not down to the European average, which would slash £8 billion off that budget, but down to the German level, which would slash £13 billion off our defence budget. It is at least honest. The hon. Gentleman at least made a suggestion, which is more than can be said for any Opposition Front-Bench spokesman. I want to know whether that policy is more widely held.

The hon. Member for Nottingham, South said that there should be a tax not only on the flights of people on holiday but on the flight of capital. That sounds as though he is urging the reintroduction of exchange controls. Is that the official stance of the Opposition? If so, we want to know. We want to know what the Opposition estimate the effect of that would be on inward investment and the creation of jobs, for which they so often call.

[Mr. Nelson]

My hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, East (Mr. Ainsworth) said that the deficit had built up because the Government had accepted their responsibility to the most vulnerable in our community. Goodness knows, there have been enough calls for that from the Opposition. We have delivered it to those who voted for it and have stood by them in difficult times. We are not ashamed of having fulfilled that commitment, any more than we are of saying, in improving times, that we have to address these problems.

In response to that, the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) made an interesting but derisive speech about the Government's motives behind the Budget. He said that the Budget would do nothing for jobs. He described it as a Budget for the City casino. He derided it, holding up announcements about the success with which my right hon. and learned Friend's strategy has been received outside the House. It is good news if my right hon. and learned Friend's Budget enjoys the confidence of international and domestic investors. The fact that the stock market has risen by 150-odd points in the last week and that long-term bond yields have come down is very good news indeed. The hon. Gentleman should welcome that, and I entirely reject his approach to the City and business, which usually comes out of the closet when he is pressed.

Opposition Members' true colours shine through in the deep prejudice that they bear towards business and enterprise and the financial services institutions. A recent remark by the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras went to the heart of the matter. This is what he said about business and company directors:

"Yes, it's the politics of envy. We're envious of their wealth. These people are stinking, lousy, thieving incompetent scum."

That is the attitude of one of the Opposition spokesman——

Mr. Dobson: As a man who generally pursues the truth, may I put the record straight? In the newspaper piece, of which that was a snippet, I was referring to people who were very rich, had very large houses and very big cars and went on fancy holidays, but who paid their staff poverty level wages and supported the abolition of wages councils. I still regard those people as thieving scumbags.

Mr. Nelson: The hon. Gentleman must take up his argument with The Sun rather than with me, but the words are typical and descriptive.

The theme running through much of the debate has been the importance of business as the generator of jobs and employment. I hope that hon. Members on both sides of the House will acknowledge that, if we are to create greater prosperity through employment and through business, three things are essential: first, we need that elusive ephemeral trait of confidence and stability that has been lacking; secondly, we need low inflation and low interest rates, both of which have now been delivered; and, thirdly, we need as little taxation and as little regulation as possible on the income and employment-generating sector of the economy. The Budget delivers all three.

What of the Opposition's response to the Budget? What was the response of the hon. Member for Dunfermline, East (Mr. Brown) on television last night? The hon. Gentleman went, as usual, as the disciple of despair—an ambassador for Armageddon. He stood up bleakly in front of the British people and trotted out figures that brought the country down again. He brought out a colourful bar chart showing selective dates and figures. [HON. MEMBERS: "Come on!"] Oh, yes, they were very selective figures to show manufacturing output in Britain over 14 years. What the hon. Gentleman did not tell us was that had he taken figures from a comparable period from 1982 to 1992—from trough to trough—the picture would have been entirely different. Over that period, this country has had much higher manufacturing output than Germany, France or Italy. But the Opposition do not want to know the good news. They want to run British industry and British manufacturing down.

The business package announced in the Budget was an essential generator of prosperity and hope for the small and medium-sized enterprises at this stage of recovery. Let me reiterate some parts of that package: the increase in the corporation tax thresholds of the smallest companies will benefit some 30,000 companies and the foreign income dividends scheme, depending upon the behavioural habits of income retained in companies, will be worth some £100 million.

Mr. Prescott: What about jobs?

Mr. Nelson: I will come to jobs—the profitability and cash flow of British industry are important for jobs. The uniform business rate concession will be worth some £105 million. National insurance contributions will bring a net benefit, even after the additional cost of statutory sick pay changes. The late payment proposals will have a significant impact on the cash flow of industry.

The importance of the changes is that they will add to the liquidity of, and the investment in, British industry and business. That will create jobs in large and in small companies.

Mr. Prescott: How many jobs?

Mr. Nelson: I can tell the hon. Gentleman that there are 2·7 million businesses, two thirds of which are small businesses. Three quarters of the employment in this country is in small to medium-sized enterprises. The combination of a reduction in interest rates and that package of measures will feed directly through to cash flow and give employment opportunities. There is no point in the hon. Gentleman going on about it—it is good news for British business. If he does not think so, British business does.

The Budget will not only promote enterprise and encourage investment but seek to reduce the red tape on business.

Mr. Prescott: That is waffle.

Mr. Nelson: The hon. Gentleman may think that it is waffle. I tell him to ask business men, who welcome the changes which will make a big difference to them. The changes with regard to audit requirements will benefit about 500,000 companies and will significantly reduce costs and provide employment-creating resources.

The increase in the VAT threshold to £45,000 will benefit 75,000 businesses. In addition—this has not received much comment—there is the change in arrangements for assessing national insurance contributions and income tax, which companies and businesses now have to work out laboriously; those arrangements will be streamlined to make that work easier. I have referred to those costs to industry that prevent jobs. Our measures will release resources that will help employment.

In the final two or three minutes available, I will return to the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery, who spoke for the Liberal Democrat party. At least his party came up with an alternative Budget in November, but it seems that the Liberal Democrats have got away unscathed from a lot of the criticism which has been rightly heaped on the Labour party.

The Liberal Democrats seem to face all ways. They will promise the earth to whatever audience they speak to, and they are a soft touch for every lobby. The party will not come clean on the fact that its alternative Budget proposes 1p extra on the standard rate of income tax and 4p extra on the upper rate. The party would impose a payroll tax which would be levied at 2 per cent. There would be increases in national insurance contributions. The Liberal Democrats promise higher taxes—we know where we stand and what impact that would have on businesses. Certainly, we know that that would not help employment.

We know that, as well as being a higher-taxing party, the Liberal Democrats are also a higher spending party. One issue that party totally forgets is the amount of the deficit. It simply will not face up to the responsibility of tackling the deficit. Perhaps that is not wholly surprising in view of a speech by the right hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) in Torquay in September. He said that there was no point in being mesmerised by debt, and that there was a strong case for limiting and targeting additional borrowing. If the right hon. Gentleman thinks that, he is financially and economically illiterate. He is also irresponsible with regard to the affairs of the nation.

Like his party, the right hon. Gentleman does not have a clue about how to run the finances of the country. The party has no prudence and no responsibility when it comes to face up to the high and rising deficit. It is not prepared to announce how to deal with it.

Mr. Alex Carlile rose——

Mr. Nelson: I am not giving way. The hon. and learned Gentleman had his innings earlier.

The Liberal Democrats go up and down the country promulgating every policy which the party thinks will appeal to whichever audience it is speaking to at any one time. It would have us believe that, on the one hand, it will face up to the responsibility of sound husbandry of public finances and, on the other hand, it will not put up taxes. In addition, it has a magic way of increasing Government spending.

The Liberal Democrats have a fraudulent policy, a confidence trick and a stance which is wholy untenable. The electorate will look at them and examine the paucity of their proposals. The electorate will look at the black hole of the Liberal Democrats' economic policy and will understand that the party does not offer an alternative. Far from it—it offers the prospect of further job losses and a much higher tax burden. The party's preferences for second-guessing on public expenditure do not offer a way forward.

The Budget addresses the state of public finances. It does not take an easy or opportunist way out by seeking to please all opinions with money which the country cannot afford.

My right hon. and learned Friend knew when he framed the Budget judgment that, unless we were prepared to face up to tackling that deficit, we would run into the problems of a credit crunch at some stage in the future, when markets simply would not be prepared to finance a rate of borrowing of £1,000 for every man, woman and child in this country. He knew that unless we faced up to that, our public sector borrowing requirement would be an increasing proportion of our gross national product.

The vote of confidence, the money that has flowed into Britain and the jobs that will come from it come from people who recognise that we are on the right track, that we are addressing the issues and that we are living up to the necessity of reducing the amount of loans as a proportion of GNP. That is the responsible way forward. That is the way in which the Conservative party will ensure not only that we have electoral support——

It being Ten o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed tomorrow.

ESTIMATES

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 131 (Liaison Committee),

That this House agrees with the Report [25th November] of the Liaison Committee.—[Mr. Arbuthnot.]

Question agreed to.

SITTINGS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at the sitting on Friday 17th December, this House shall not adjourn until the Speaker shall have reported the Royal Assent to any Acts agreed upon by both Houses.—[Mr. Arbuthnot.]

EUROPEAN STANDING COMMITTEES

Ordered,

That European Community Documents Nos. 7665/93 and 8012/93, and the unnumbered Explanatory Memoranda submitted by HM Treasury on 18th October, 5th and 22nd November 1993, relating to the draft general budget for 1994, the unnumbered Explanatory Memorandum submitted by HM Treasury on 2nd November 1993, relating to a revision of the financial perspective, and European Community Document No. 7194/93, relating to the internal market, shall not stand referred to European Standing Committee B.—[Mr. Arbuthnot.]

Child Support Agency

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Arbuthnot.]

10 pm

Mr. John Spellar (Warley, West): This debate is about massive injustice being inflicted on families throughout Britain. Members of Parliament on both sides of the House are being deluged with complaints about the Child Support Agency. That is clear from business questions and questions to Ministers, and many of the cases are extremely disturbing, with havoc being created in the lives of thousands of ordinary families, more than 200 of whom were here today in the Grand Committee Room. It was unfortunate that the Department could not send along even one representative to address their grievances.

The national and local press have been active in campaigning on the issue and I pay tribute to the way in which they have highlighted the impact of the agency on families. I shall give examples of some of the worrying cases, but the important thing tonight is to concentrate on the principles involved.

The first thing to establish is that the agency is designed primarily to help not children, but the Exchequer. Parliamentary answers show that only about 10 per cent. of the money collected will go to the children. The other 90 per cent. will go to the Exchequer. Therefore, CSA does not stand for Child Support Agency but for Chancellor Support Agency.

We shall probably be told, rightly, by the Minister that with a £50 billion deficit the Government must be more careful than usual with public money. But in that case they must be honest with the public and describe the charge for what it is—a tax. It is a tax that is dramatically falling on certain groups of people in society and in the majority of cases it is, in effect, a divorce tax. Furthermore, the tax is retrospective, tearing up previous agreements and even court orders. It is interesting that, in the past, retrospective legislation has been looked on doubtfully by the House. But in this case we have retrospective legislation with a vengeance.

The tax will have immediate effect. When the Chancellor, who has just departed, introduced the increase in wine duty he left it until the beginning of next year before it came into effect, and similarly with other Budget measures. When the Government introduced the unified business rate, the ill-fated poll tax or the council tax, they built in transitional arrangements for individuals and local authorities. But there is no such transition for parents under this scheme. The full weight of it falls on them at once, often with dramatic increases in their obligations and often with a considerable debt arising from the delay between initial notification and the final assessment that comes through from the agency.

Nor does the agency seem to take account of payments made to the spouse during that period, so payment can be made twice over. Stopping payments in that period naturally causes enormous hardship and friction with the ex-spouse. Yet such debts can run into hundreds, even thousands of pounds in some cases, and impose a major burden on the individual and his second family. Even those who believe in the fundamental objectives of the Child Support Agency would, I am sure, accept the need for phasing in the increase because decent hard-working families, who have carefully worked out their budgets and been prudent in taking account of their obligations, find themselves faced with a dramatic change in their circumstance which threatens to plunge them into debt.

One of the arguments, or rather alibis, put forward by the Government and some of their apologists is that the Child Support Act 1991 supposedly received general support when it was introduced and that unforeseen problems arose only later. That mythology has formed the basis of a number of articles in the quality press.

The reality is rather different. It is true that there was general support for the principle of parents supporting their children. I am sure that that view is shared by all hon. Members here tonight. However, on Second Reading of the Bill the Opposition moved an amendment declining to give it a Second Reading. More important were the perceptive reasons given for that view. The amendment was moved by my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher), who said that the Bill

"leaves lone parents on Income Support not one penny better off, makes lone parents worse off where they receive maintenance just above Income Support levels and thus lose access to passported benefits, allows maintenance payments to be disrupted if the absent parent defaults, does not take account of property settlements which could lead to an increase in orders for the home to be sold"—[Official Report, 4 June 1991; Vol. 192, c. 194.]

and so on. Many of those problems have come back to haunt us.

Those points were reinforced by my hon. Friend the Member for Eccles (Miss Lestor). In winding up the debate, she said:

"Many separated or divorced women have negotiated with their former partners, without rancour, an arrangement whereby they forgo any maintenance but are allowed to keep the family home for themselves and their children. We must bear that in mind when we consider figures on the number of people who do not receive maintenance. The Bill could undermine that principle."

My hon. Friend referred to the question of shared access, saying:

"The child may spend weekends and school holidays with its father . . . In such cases that is seen as the father's contributon to the child's maintenance, although no formal handing over of money is involved. Are we saying that that arrangement must change—that a formal maintenance order must be made, disrupting and undermining the understanding way in which the couple may have dealt with separation or divorce?"

My hon. Friend also said, perceptively:

"I fear that we are in danger of impoverishing the second family to provide for the first."—[Official Report, 4 June 1991; Vol. 192, c. 236.]

That last point has been made to me time and again, in letters and at meetings, by second wives from across the country.

It was not just the Opposition who pointed out the flaws in the Bill. The Law Society—the body for England and Wales and that for Scotland—warned against a formula that it said was too rigid and would produce harsh and arbitrary results. It also argued for the need for a transitional phase and a more flexible system. It also said that the agency was inconsistent with the principles of the Children Act 1989, which was designed to ensure that all proceedings relating to one family could be heard in the same court. The point about that is that the court can look at the wide range of different individual circumstances that do not fit into the straitjacket of a national formula administered by a faceless bureaucracy. Unfortunately, the Government did not listen and the current chaos is the result of that.

I would argue that the agency is also misdirected in its priorities. The Second Reading debate included a number of references to targeting those fathers who had abandoned partners and children and were paying nothing. However, it appears that those are not the first priority of the agency —that is for new cases. They are not the second priority —that seems to be where the mother is on benefit and the father is already paying maintenance. In other words, he is in a job, is fulfilling his obligations and is easily traceable. Such fathers are the soft, easily identifiable targets where the agency can show some quick and easy results and possibly earn bonuses. Those fathers evading payment appear to be only the third priority and there is already anecdotal evidence that a number of them are finding ways to get round the system.

What about the actual operation of the rigid formula, especially the way that old, clean-break orders are being ignored? As I said, that is where retrospection really comes in with a vengeance. It has caused enormous problems because no account is being taken of the transfer of the matrimonial home and, in particular, the payment of the mortgage on it. In those instances, the parent is faced with an appalling dilemma. He could pay maintenance, default on the mortgage and risk making his children homeless. One person who came to see me could not even default on his mortgage because it was with his employer and he would have lost his job. Alternatively, the father could pay the mortgage but not the maintenance and risk imprisonment. Of course, if he were a police officer, he would not have even those options as he would lose his job for being in breach of his conditions of service. That is the stark prospect facing many serving officers, a number of whom were at the meeting today and have been at other meetings around the country.

The formula does not take account of debts, many of which could have arisen as a result of the divorce, or the cost of contact—particularly when the ex-partners live some distance from each other. If for financial reasons parents will see less of their children, how will that benefit the children or the country? How will that help to produce the better citizens of the next generation? The formula also does not allow for the cost of travelling to work. One couple was told that the husband did not need a car, but the wife rightly pointed out that her husband, who would have to pay the support, had to be at work by 4 o'clock in the morning because he was a long-distance lorry driver.

The agency takes account of only 50 per cent. of pension contributions. A number of categories of workers, such as those in the emergency services, make mandatory contributions, but only 50 per cent. of their value can be taken into account.

All of that shows that the agency does not live in the real world. Its monthly-paid bureaucrats have difficulty understanding that overtime is often an erratic element in a worker's pay packet. An individual may be assessed during a period when his employer is doing well and has a number of orders. When that period has ended, the worker goes back on ordinary pay but still has to contribute a substantial sum at the higher assessment.

There seems to be no understanding of the effect of assessments on second families, especially when they are caught out by the transitional provisions. A father will have to pay for the children by his first marriage, but the children that he looks after in his second marriage may not be the subject of any support. That wife, because her new husband is employed and not on benefit, is not considered a priority case for support from her first husband. Real presure and crisis is forced on such families. The phrase used in hundreds of letters to me is, "Our world has been turned upside down". That is a real cry of misery.

In the past, courts could examine individual cases and circumstances and make judgments accordingly. They did not always reach the right decisions and there were often variations across the country. The Government would have done better, however, to set broader national priorities and categories subject to the broader wisdom of the courts—rather than have that overridden and be replaced by the CSA's rigid national formula, which is a dramatic assertion of the doctrine that the man or women in Whitehall always knows best.

There is special resentment at the £78 charge made for the agency's unwanted intrusion into family affairs. It is probably a precedent for future Government fund raising, and is about as insensitive as the policy of the Chinese who, after shooting a person, charges his or her family the price of the bullet.

Families throughout the country are facing a bleak Christmas as a result of the agency's activities. Only 56,000 families have been assessed; a further 500,000 are in the pipeline. We are seeing only the tip of the iceberg, but we already know the anguish that the agency is causing among thousands of families throughout the country. The CSA threatens second families and places them under enormous financial pressure. It reopens old wounds between divorced couples, in respect not only of financial arrangements but of access and the disposal of the former matrimonial home. The agency's activities run counter to the law on clean-break divorce and penalise those in work who are trying to build a new family life. It is unfair, and the problems are growing by the day.

The Government acknowledged public concern about the agency by establishing their own review. The Minister must accept that the CSA needs a fundamental rethink. The Government should suspend the agency's operations until it can be given fairer and better guidelines or the work returned to properly resourced courts which can deal with the problems in one go. That way we could bring hope before Christmas to thousands of despairing families not only in my constituency but throughout the country.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. Alistair Burt): I congratulate the hon. Member for Warley, West (Mr. Speller) on securing the debate and providing the House with an opportunity to debate this important issue. I know that it is an area in which he has great interest and I look forward to further dialogue with him on the subject on Monday.

The hon. Gentleman made a number of valuable comments with which I shall deal shortly. I am aware of the lobby this afternoon. It is not always possible for Ministers to attend, but the hon. Gentleman was kind enough in his letter to me to suggest that we sent someone along. I should like to pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Broxbourne (Mrs. Roe) who went along to that meeting and put a case. It was slightly churlish of him not to mention her contribution to the proceedings.

Mr. Spellar: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Burt: I am sorry, but no. Before I deal with the detailed matter, I should like to say a few words about some of the fundamental issues that are at stake. It might be helpful if I were to remind the House of the purpose of the child support scheme and its provisions.

The purpose of the Child Support Agency and the Child Support Act 1991 is to obtain maintenance for children and to improve on a discretionary court-based system, which had failed to stem a decline in the payment of maintenance. The scheme is designed to ensure that, wherever possible, parents pay for the maintenance of their own children, rather than making other people, including other parents, do so through their taxes. This principle was widely welcomed, as was the move away from the courts, by hon. Members from all parties and by the relevant lobby groups when the Child Support Act was introduced in 1991, and is unchanged.

The principle is not a new one. Parental responsibility for children has long been enshrined in the law of this country. However, before 1991 fewer than one third of lone parents received maintenance from the child's other parent. By 1997 our aim is to have raised that proportion to half. Maintenance payments are a valuable income which lone parents can take with them when they return to work—which many wish to do. It will ensure that many will no longer have to rely on income support as their main source of income.

The Child Support Agency has figured prominently in the media in recent weeks. However, much of the coverage has been misleading and one-sided. The majority of comments have centred around the amounts of maintenance that absent parents are being asked to pay. Little attention has been paid to the substantial benefits for children to be derived from regular payments of maintenance.

We said in the White Paper, "Children Come First", that the new scheme was expected to increase the amounts of maintenance paid by absent parents. We repeated this in debates on the Child Support Bill and the regulations and continued to make the point on numerous other occasions. We recognised that there would be concerns expressed by absent parents, which we are now seeing as the measures begin to bite. We must, however, remember that there are two sides to every coin: yes, absent parents are being asked to pay more, but parents with care are now receiving realistic amounts of maintenance for the first time.

It is understandable that absent parents, some of whom have previously paid little or nothing towards the maintenance of their children, and others who may have paid less than the formula now requires, would not welcome being made to pay more—I understand that—but many of those absent parents, wittingly or unwittingly, made settlements which involved any maintenance that they paid being supplemented by the taxpayer. It is clearly reasonable that those absent parents who can afford to do so should make a more realistic contribution towards the cost of maintaining their children, without such taxpayers' interest.

Contrary to some media reports, the amount of maintenance to be paid is determined not on an arbitrary basis by the Child Support Agency or by faceless bureaucrats, but by a formula which was extensively discussed both inside and outside Parliament and put into legislation. It ensures that both parents, where they can afford to do so, contribute to the maintenance of their child. It produces predictable and realistic levels of maintenance for children, taking account of the fact that they do not look after themselves, and at the same time ensuring the children share in their parents' increasing income. This important principle has not been brought out in media stories.

Another crucial factor rarely mentioned is that the vast majority of absent parents will be left with 70 to 85 per cent. of net income after paying maintenance, and those with low incomes will usually be left with an even higher percentage. In fact, it has to be said that some of the media coverage has been unbalanced, with journalists being selective, to say the least, with their presentation of the facts, very rarely taking the trouble to research fully the true circumstances of the parents with care and their children.

In the vast majority of cases in the papers, such research would reveal a parent with care and a child on benefit. One particular documentary, ITV's "World in Action", presented a series of cases, subsequently researched by The Sunday Times, which was heavily critical of the programme. The Sunday Times reporter who spoke to the ex-wives said that "World in Action" had made little effort to examine the full circumstances of the absent parents interviewed. The producer admitted to the newspaper that he had not contacted former partners.

In sensitive matters such as these—I appreciate the sensitivities on both sides—a greater willingness to present both sides of a difficult case would be better for everyone than merely putting a partial case. It would please me immensely if other sections of the media were to follow the lead of The Sunday Times so that the public could see some of the true benefits to children that are being derived from the scheme.

I recognise that people have genuine concerns about how the detail of the scheme has affected them, and I do not minimise the effect that this must have, but I have undertaken, as have my right hon. Friends the Secretary of State and the Prime Minister, to examine those concerns and we are continuing to do so. I remain convinced, however, that the basic principles of the new scheme are sound and stand up to scrutiny and are supported by the vast majority of people in the country. If it is apparent that the scheme can be improved further, I will obviously ensure that that is done.

The hon. Gentleman made some specific points and I shall do my best to cover as many as possible. He said a lot, however, and I may not be able to cover it all.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the take-on strategy. Given the number of families involved and the need to ensure that each case is handled fairly and accurately, it was not possible to implement the new arrangements for all families overnight—but it was never our intention to do so. The agency aims to take on its full work load by the end of March 1997, but until then we have to prioritise the cases that it handles.

This year, the agency is giving the highest priority to all new cases, which have nowhere else to go. Newly divorced or separated parents who have care but do not have a court order or written maintenance agreement and who are not on benefits are no longer able to seek maintenance through the courts.

The second priority is parents with care who make a new claim to income support, family credit or disability working allowance. After these cases, the agency will cover, over the next three years of operation, cases where the parent with care was already getting income support in April. Less than a quarter of such cases are receiving maintenance. The agency has always made it clear that, within this group, priority would be given to the parents with care receiving maintenance, and this strategy was set out in the leaflet, "Parents Who Live Apart", which was published in January 1993 and sent to all hon. Members.

The agency will also consider sympathetically, in the light of individual circumstances, any existing benefit client who seeks to be taken on early, including those where the absent parent has been avoiding paying maintenance.

The hon. Member for Warley, West mentioned targeting, which has caused much concern. It is simply not true that the agency is concentrating solely on absent parents who are already paying maintenance. We have always made it clear that all types of cases would be dealt with. The agency expects to deal with just over 1 million cases during the year, almost 640,000 of which will involve absent parents who do not currently pay any maintenance.

In the seven months up to 31 October, the agency took on 616,000 cases and estimates that more than 50 per cent. —some 330,000—were not receiving maintenance. This proportion will increase as the year progresses. I advise the hon. Gentleman that in nearly a third of assessments the absent parent has been assessed as either not liable to pay maintenance or to pay a nominal amount. That is hardly commensurate with targeting payers.

The agency has had considerable early success, which has not received the publicity that it should have, in finding missing absent parents—those parents who, unlike many others, have shirked their responsibilities and, in many cases, disappeared without trace. In the cases completed so far, it has managed to trace more than 9,000 absent parents where the parent with care did not know their whereabouts—a success rate of more than 90 per cent., which was unmatched by the previous court system.

The hon. Gentleman raised the issue of clean-break settlements. Much attention has been paid to what are widely known as clean breaks. There can be no clean break between parents and children, and there never has been under the court system. It has always been possible for the parent with care to return to the court to reopen the need for child maintenance if circumstances changed.

Where a parent with care has gained sizeable equity in a property, the true effect in most cases being dealt with has been that she has acquired a material asset while the taxpayer has supported her children's basic living costs. It must be remembered that for many parents with care this transfer of property is not one of a free-standing asset but one with an associated level of debt through the mortgage. In those cases where the parent with care is reliant on income support, the interest on this debt falls to be paid by the taxpayer.

Advocates of that approach overlook a real problem. In the vast majority of such cases, there is insufficient information to determine what proportion of any settlement was attributable to spousal maintenance, which is not dealt with by the agency, and what is attributable to child maintenance, which is dealt with by the agency.

It should be emphasised that the child support formula provides for the practical consequences of a clean break settlement because it allows for the absent parent's housing costs. For example, in not taking any equity from the family home the absent parent may well incur greater expenses in re-establishing himself in a new home. The formula allows for those costs, and the amount of maintenance that he will be asked to pay will thus be reduced.

The hon. Gentleman made the allegation that the Child Support Agency only benefits the Treasury. That is not the case. I emphasise, first, that the services of the agency are available to parents who are not in receipt of any benefit, so it is wrong to suggest that the scheme is purely a money-saving measure. The question which should be asked is not, "Should we have introduced an Act to save the taxpayer money?" but rather, "Should the taxpayer have been involved in the first place?" Where the absent parent can afford to pay, I think that the answer should be no.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the subject of second families and the difficulties caused to them. I understand his worries. The formula includes, as he is aware, a protected income calculation, which is designed to ensure that absent parents are not asked to pay maintenance at a rate which would take them down to income support levels. That is an especially important safeguard for absent parents with second families. The calculation takes account of the expenses, not only of the absent parent, but of his new partner and any stepchildren. It is in that part of the calculation that the absent parent's new partner's income is taken into account, because the entire household's income and expenses are compared to ensure that they keep a margin of income above income support levels. That calculation can only reduce the amount of maintenance that an absent parent is required to pay. Absent parents will never be required to pay full maintenance to the first family if it would reduce the living standards of the second family below the protected level. To that extent the second family takes precedence over the first.

The hon. Gentleman has mentioned the issue of phasing. As he is aware, some absent parents will have the formula amount introduced in two steps to help them adjust. He is aware of the provisions. It has been said that that matter could be reconsidered and that is one of the subjects that the current Select Committee is considering.

The hon. Gentleman mentioned the important issue of policemen, service men and others and I am anxious to make a comment about that. We have spoken to the Home Office and the Minstry of Defence about that issue. They are quite categorical. Policemen and service men will not lose their jobs because of increased liability for child maintenance. Counselling will be available for individuals who experience difficulty in managing debts and help will be given in dealing with creditors. The police force and the services are well aware of the problems that can arise from an unexpected debt and it is not fair to suggest that in all those cases, or in any of those cases necessarily, people will lose their jobs solely because of the matter that the hon. Gentleman has mentioned.

The hon. Gentleman also mentioned expenses. It has been suggested that the assessment formula should take account of the absent parent's expenses, such as the costs of travel to work, contact with children and debts. The formula does make provision for essential living expenses and, additionally, absent parents are left with a significant proportion of their net income after paying maintenance. That ensures that they have choices about how to spend their disposable income.

However, as I put as strongly as I could to the Select Committee, we do not think it right to allow for other expenses in the formula, as that gives them precedence over the basic needs of their children. To do so would create pressure for more and more expenses to be defined as essential and for child maintenance to be pushed further and further down the list of priorities. The ultimate result would be a return to the unrealistically low sums which were common under the previous system and indeed the conditions that inspired the House to make a change from the previous system, because it did not adequately deal with the situation affecting the children.

The hon. Member has again called for the suspension of the operations of the Child Support Agency, as he did last week. Even if it were warranted—which it is not—to suspend the operations of the Child Support Agency, it completely ignores the impact of such action on many thousands of children, often in situations in which no maintenance had previously been paid. If the hon. Gentleman thought through the consequences of such a suggestion, he would realise that it would result in great hardship. Many parents with care would find that established maintenance payments would suddenly cease, and many would, therefore, be forced back to benefits. I am afraid that only a failure to understand both sides of the issue could have led the hon. Gentleman to make such a call.

I shall briefly make two or three final points. First, as to shared access, where an absent parent looks after a child for a period, the hon. Gentleman knows that that is catered for in the formula. Secondly, in relation to the question of overtime, the agency well understands that earnings can fluctuate and it can take account of that. Indeed, one of the benefits of the previous system was that it was difficult to go back to court to deal with variation orders. Under the new system, that can be done and it can be done without any increase in fees. If one went near a court in the past and one was charged new fees by a lawyer, it would turn out an awful lot more expensive than the fees charged by the agency.

Lastly, the hon. Gentleman made arguments about the support offered by his party, in one way or another, for the principle of the Child Support Act 1991. As far as I am aware, the Third Reading of the Act was not opposed by the Opposition. The Labour party conference of 1992 urged repeal; the Labour party conference of 1993 did not urge repeal. I am still not quite sure whether the Labour party has now changed its view in any way.

The hon. Gentleman has advocated a return to a court-based system in what he said at the end of his speech. If that is now the view of Opposition Front Benchers, I would be very interested to hear it.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at half-past Ten o'clock.

House of Commons

Friday 3 December 1993

The House met at half-past Nine o'clock

PRAYERS

[MADAM SPEAKER in the Chair]

Adjournment (Christmas)

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That this House, at its rising on Friday 17th December, do adjourn until Tuesday 11th January.—[Mr. Patnick.]

Madam Speaker: I have to inform the House that I have not selected either of the amendments. Of course, hon. Members are free to vote against the substantive motion if they are opposed to it.

9.35 am

Sir Fergus Montgomery (Altrincham and Sale): I am grateful to be called this morning, Madam Speaker, and I am particularly grateful to be called so early. There were times in the old days when the House had Adjournment debates which were not restricted to three hours, and which went on and on. It was a good idea to change the format, because a three-hour limit on the debate means that we have quite short speeches.

Mr. Terry Dicks (Hayes and Harlington): Get on with it.

Sir Fergus Montgomery: Get on with what?

I want to raise a subject that I have raised before, and my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House will not be surprised to hear it. It is not an airport or a hospital, but the question of affordable housing. I think that housing is a vital concern.

I fear that, if we are not careful, tenants in low-cost housing will increasingly depend on housing benefit. Any reduction in the housing association grant is likely to increase the numbers of tenants who are dependent on housing benefit, and more tenants would be trapped in the poverty trap.

I remind my right hon. Friend that the Select Committee on the Environment looked at the matter some time ago, and it fired a warning shot across the bows of the Government about the serious consequences if the rate of the housing association grant should fall below 67 per cent. The rate has fallen already to 62 per cent.

The Government must also bear in mind the effects, not just on people who need housing, but on the construction industry. I am told that around 500,000 construction workers have lost their jobs during the past three years. It has been said over and over again that the cost to the Government of every unemployed person is around £9,000 a year because of the cost of providing benefit, added to which is the amount lost in income tax and national insurance contributions.

The diminishing of the housing programme is bound to inflame that situation. We desperately need more low-cost housing. By building more, we will lower the unemployment figures, and also rehouse people who are in urgent need. I think particularly of the homeless, of people who are leaving institutions for care in the community, and of the increasing number of elderly people who require specialist housing.

I worry about people who want to help themselves and who go out to work, often for low wages. They sometimes find that they would have been better off if they had not gone to work but had sat back and relied on benefit. I do not want to see the growth of a benefit-dependency culture. I want more to be done to help people who try to help themselves. That particularly applies to younger people, but the elderly are also disadvantaged.

All hon. Members will have elderly constituents who, during their working lives, scrimped and scraped to put something aside for the proverbial rainy day. Those people find when they retire that their savings do not help them at all when it comes to getting assistance. As the rules apply at the moment, people with capital of between £3,000 and £16,000 find that interest is assumed—that is the all-important word—at the rate of £1 a week for every £250 of capital. I wish that somebody would offer me those terms for my savings—I would put my money with them immediately.

That gives the elderly no encouragement to save; I believe that it gives them a disincentive. I asked the Government earlier this year urgently to re-examine the situation, so far without a response.

I am currently concerned about the annual development programme. In the immediate future, the rented programme will be protected, but I am worried about what will happen in a few years' time. The 12 October edition of The Financial Times correctly forecast a £300 million cut in the annual development programme.

Working on that basis, the Oxford Economic Forecasting Unit predicted the loss of a further 8,000 jobs in the construction industry. However, the increased benefit payments and the loss of income tax and national insurance contributions will mean that the net saving will be only £200 million in the public sector borrowing requirement, not the £300 million that the Government are apparently aiming for. The net effect will be more unemployment in the construction industry and more misery for homeless and overcrowded families. On social and economic grounds, therefore, I plead for careful consideration to be given to the housing association programme.

I must admit that I get very depressed when I see people sleeping rough on the streets of our cities. I realise that it is happening all over the world, and I know the reason for it—there are more broken marriages than there used to be, and young people perhaps have more independence and leave the nest earlier—but that does not alter the fact that it is a blot on everything that we British stand for.

Secondly, I want to refer to a subject that is of great concern to my constituency. In August this year, the Department of Trade and Industry asked local authorities to bid for designation as objective 2 areas. The key criteria for description as a declining industrial area under objective 2 are, first, the average rate of unemployment over the past three years must have been above the European Community average; secondly, the percentage share of industrial employment in total employment must have equalled or exceeded the Community average in any reference year from 1975 onwards; thirdly, there must have been an observable fall in industrial employment as compared with the reference year chosen.

[Sir Fergus Montgomery]

Trafford—the council area in which my constituency is located—is one of 10 districts that comprise Greater Manchester, and Trafford council has been working with the other nine councils to formulate a Greater Manchester operational programme for objective 2 status for European funding.

On 11 October, my right hon. Friend the Minister for Industry announced with a great fanfare that the Government were including more of north-west England in the bid for European funds. He said:

"This is good news for the region. All current Objective 2 areas are on the list, plus new areas which face job losses, such as Barrow. The new candidates from the North West include Central Lancashire, Fleetwood and Lancaster and Morecambe. All the existing Objective 2 areas of East Lancashire, West Cumbria, West Cheshire, West Lancashire and much of Greater Manchester stay in the list the Government has proposed."

The parts of Greater Manchester that have been excluded are certain wards in Stockport and Trafford. I want my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House to find out why. I remind him that the west midlands areas included both deprived areas and areas of structural decline, and affluent areas on the fringes of the conurbation.

I want to know why there is one rule for the west midlands and an entirely different one for Greater Manchester. The whole of the Altrincham and Sale constituency has been overlooked. It is impossible to understand what sort of objective criteria formed the basis of the decision.

The exclusion of certain wards in Trafford is damaging. Without objective 2 status, European regional development fund money, which aids capital projects, cannot be claimed. The exclusion will have significant effects on proposed economic and environmental initiatives in the Broadheath and Altrincham wards. The loss of objective 2 will also have a serious effect on the borough. It will undoubtedly mean a substantial reduction in European social fund money for the South Trafford college.

I draw my right hon. Friend's attention in particular to the Broadheath area in my constituency. That area contains an industrial estate—not as large as Trafford park, which is world famous—that was once noted for the part it played in the machine tool industry. In 1975, there were more than 6,500 jobs on that estate; now there are about 2,000.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): Terrible, isn't it?

Sir Fergus Montgomery: Yes it is, and the terrible thing is that the decline started when the last Labour Government were in power.

Mr. Cryer: Nonsense.

Sir Fergus Montgomery: Oh, yes it did.

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South): When the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) was a Minister.

Sir Fergus Montgomery: Yes, when the hon. Gentleman was a Minister. There is no point in trying to put the blame on a particular Government.

Mr. Cryer: Do you remember?

Sir Fergus Montgomery: Yes. We remember some of the hardships that occurred during that time; some of us have long memories. [Interruption.] If the hon. Gentleman has something to say, I wish he would stand up and say it.

Unemployment locally is above the Community average. Major companies such as Churchill Machine Tools, Kearns Richards, Linotype, Luke and Spencer and Record Electrical have all been casualties of the structural decline and economic recession.

Mr. Cryer: Under the Tories.

Sir Fergus Montgomery: Under successive Governments since the end of the war.

For the life of me, I cannot understand the exclusion of Broadheath. In my view, it should have been a prime contender for European funding, because it seems to fit the objective 2 criteria like a glove. European funding would have meant new infrastructure investment to help business with better communications and improvements in public transport, and the local community could have continued to enjoy vital training initiatives organised by the local further education college using European social fund finance.

Broadheath is a prime example of the unfairness of the Department of Trade and Industry ruling, but there are other examples in Trafford, such as parts of Altrincham, where we have redundant British Rail sidings right in the centre of town and other evidence of decline.

I have a horrible feeling that someone in the Department of Trade and Industry thinks that my constituency is an area of leafy suburbs. It is true that we have good residential areas—I do not deny that—but we also have areas that have problems, where there is an industrial base, and I believe that we have been unjustly penalised.

My right hon. Friend knows that I never lose my temper and never raise my voice. I am glad to see that the Whip agrees with me. Similarly, I never repeat gossip. I am staking my claim to go upstairs—I do not mean to the House of Lords but in the hereafter.

Mr. Dicks: You mean downstairs.

Sir Fergus Montgomery: If I go downstairs, I know who I will see there.

Mr. John Marshall: Those two below the Gangway —the hon. Members for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) and for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner).

Sir Fergus Montgomery: Yes, I will see lots of old friends.

I want to tell my right hon. Friend that all those virtues that I possess will disappear overnight unless something is done about this matter. I hope that he will go to whoever made the decision in the Department of Trade and Industry and say how angry I am. I am sorry that my right hon. Friend is being subjected to all my rage, but if nothing is done, whoever made the decision will be subjected to it, too.

I hope that, before we rise for Christmas, my right hon. Friend will ensure that the relevant Ministers at the Department are aware of the anger in our area at the fact that Altrincham and Sale and other parts of Trafford have been excluded. I hope that my right hon. Friend will have some good news for me before I go home for Christmas.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): I agree with the hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale (Sir F. Montgomery) about the need to build houses in Britain. For many years following the end of the second world war, we built more than 200,000 houses a year, but in the past 14 years there has been hardly any local authority building.

As for unemployment, I would merely comment that it stood at 1·25 million when the Labour Government left office. I voted against that Government 150-odd times; I was not altogether happy with what they were doing. But I can tell the House that most of my constituents would settle for 1·25 million unemployed now, given half a chance [HON. MEMBERS: "And the inflation?"] And the inflation, caused largely by the previous Tory Government, who left a right old mess, and by the quadrupling of oil prices and the rest. I am not here to talk about that: I just mention it en passant.

From the top of the hill where Bolsover castle is, near New Station road and High street, there is a beautiful view over the edge of the Pennines across from the industrial side straight over to the edge of the Peak district. About two years ago, some of my constituents in High street and New Station road asked me to see them regarding what was referred to as a landslip at Backhills.

The local newspaper reports talked about gardens that were disappearing down the side of a hill. Greenhouses were demolished, then garages. I immediately raised the matter with various Ministers, because I could foresee the possibility, given that we were talking about the side of a hill, that eventually some houses might go. That is what happened.

Having watched the television and seen the hotel at Scarborough disappear down the cliff face, and knowing that the Government had given more than £1 million in grant on that occasion, I thought that it would be feasible for the Government to assist people in the landslip area by allocating similar sums.

I was told by the Minister concerned that the Scarborough hotel received money from the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food under the Coast Protection Act 1949. We could not apply under that Act, but landslips that occur on the coast and landslips that occur inland should not be treated differently; we should not hand out grants on one hand and, on the other, tell people that they will have to grin and bear it.

I hope that the Leader of the House will pass a message on to the relevant Ministers that some way should be found to ensure that the people in the Bolsover area—four have seen their houses demolished, and another two houses are likely to be demolished in the next few months—are compensated in some way.

Derbyshire county council immediately tried to find out the cause of the problem. At first it was difficult because, very cleverly, British Coal, which had mined underneath the area, had ordered what it called a Mott Macdonald study to find out the reason for the landslip from its point of view. British Coal was very quick to get the study into operation, and it came up with findings that the landslip was nothing to do with coal mining—even though British Coal had been mining under the area as recently as 1973.

I believe that British Coal has some responsibility in the matter. I asked British Coal to compensate these people for the loss of their houses and other assets. British Coal said that, according to the Mott Macdonald study, it was not its responsibility. The study did not include, however, the fact that British Coal had been pumping out millions of tonnes of water in the area. Many local people consider that the dams of water that had built up were part of the reason for the landslip and the houses falling away.

It is significant that a few yards from the landslip stands the church, which is approximately 40 or 50 yd from the escarpment face. Several years ago, I raised in the House the subject of subsidence in Bolsover church, because of the problems that had been created. Arising out of my questions, a settlement was eventually made by British Coal. If it can pay for subsidence in the church, which is a few yards away from the escarpment face, there is surely an argument that the same should apply to the owners of the houses on High street and New Station road that have been demolished. British Coal still refuses to pay, and that is why the Department of the Environment and/or the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food should find some way of assisting the residents of that area.

As I have said, the Scarborough hotel came under the Coast Protection Act 1949, but perhaps the houses in Bolsover could come under another heading. In the mid-1960s, there was a disaster in Wales at Aberfan, where 200-odd kids were killed in a school. I was a member of my local authority at that time. The Government of the day decided to send an inspector to every area in Britain where there were pit tips and said, "If these tips are dangerous, shift them—the Government will find the money." At Clay Cross, we managed to get rid of a pit tip during that period. The money was provided by the Government.

If it was possible in the aftermath of that awful Aberfan disaster for the Government to find the money to get rid of all those dangerous tips—not only in coalfields but in many other areas around Britain—it should be possible to draw the same parallel for the people in the Bolsover area.

Probably more than 80 houses are blighted. The house owners cannot get their homes insured—certainly not for the same price that they paid before—because the insurers have said that it is a bit dodgy. Those house owners have suffered in many ways over the past two years.

British Coal says that it is not its responsibility. I believe that it is, but let us assume that British Coal can sustain its argument that it is not. We then come to the question whether it is a natural occurrence that the people in the area could not have foreseen. It that is the case, it could be argued that Ministers should take a fresh look at the matter, and study the reports sent in by people in the area and the local authorities, to see whether they can assist.

Bolsover district council and Derbyshire county council have set up an assessment to find out what is causing the problem and what the cost of draining the area of the escarpment would be. There is a lot of water in the area, which we contend has built up from pit workings in the past. It is estimated that to find out what the problem is and how to eliminate it will cost £50,000, and that to elimimate it will cost more than £1 million.

The people who live on the side of that hill should not be expected to find £1 million to resolve the problem. The Department of the Environment should take the problem into account when making grants available to the Derbyshire county council, which is taking part in the study, and to the Bolsover district council, which is helping to pay for it.

The massive amount of money that it will cost to drain the whole area should also be taken into account. I hope that the Leader of the House will inform the relevant Ministers of the need to look at ways in which this problem can be settled. I have discussed it with the various local authorities of the area during the past few days.

Will the relevant Ministers in the Department of the Environment and-or the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food meet Bolsover district council, Derbyshire county council and other local representatives of the tenants—the house owners have formed an action group—with a view to considering the possibility of building into the grant settlement, if nothing else, a sum of money to enable the local authorities to eliminate the problem once the assessment has been made?

The Department of the Environment should meet British Coal and ask all the relevant questions that I have sent to it from D. C. Carter Associates, which is acting on behalf of the residents. It is contended that the dams of water that built up in the area as a result of coal mine workings are part of the problem.

Will the Leader of the House pass those messages to the relevant Departments, so that a meeting can be arranged with the local authorities concerned? Those authorities will be pleased to come down to discuss the matter.

I do not believe that the settlements made yesterday took into account the amount of money that will be needed by that area. If British Coal refuses to accept responsibility, that money can come only from the people who live in the area and the local authorities responsible for its administration.

I hope that the Leader of the House will pass on those messages, and that he will be able to impress on the relevant Ministers the need for them to meet the local area representatives and the residents as soon as possible, so that we can get to the bottom of the problem and ensure that the matter is dealt with as speedily as possible.

9.59 am

Mr. Gary Streeter (Plymouth, Sutton): I am delighted to be called to take part in the Adjournment debate. My subject is the family—at this time of year, as we approach Christmas, that topic is perhaps more important than ever.

Tuesday's Budget represents a turning point in the economic fortunes of the nation. All the economic indicators point to a period of sustainable growth and a gradual return to sound finance. It might be said that some of the social indicators are less favourable. The numbers of young people involved in criminal activities continue to cause concern. Our divorce rate—at four out of 10 marriages—remains at a high level. In fact, it is the highest in the European Community. The number of children born outside wedlock has soared in the past few years.

Teachers up and down the land pull their hair out over the unacceptable behaviour of a rising number of five-year-olds who are encountering school and authority for the first time. Policemen express concern at the number of teenagers who take their names and numbers and threaten to report them for assault or wrongful arrest. The nation wrings its hands and searches its soul over the James Bulger case.

What can be done to stop the apparent rise in the number of young people growing up with no respect for others or for authority, and no apparent knowledge of right and wrong? I wish to make my contribution to the debate on the social issues facing society today. I welcome the initiative of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister in raising the priority of social issues in today's political agenda.

I strongly support the range of measures to be introduced by my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary. Certainly, the balance of the criminal justice system needs to be restored—away from the criminal and towards the innocent. I also welcome the wide-ranging debate now under way about the size and shape of the welfare state. Those who oppose such a debate have obviously never read some of the speeches of Beveridge and the other founding fathers of the welfare state.

I wish to explore one aspect of our social fabric that remains undervalued in modern society. I feel strongly that the role of the family in the past 30 years has been sidelined in a way that has become a significant factor in many of our social problems today. I am delighted that 1994 is to be the United Nations International Year of the Family, providing an opportunity to promote the importance of family relationships.

As I draw on my own experience of 38 years, as I read report after report and article after article, and as I talk to those involved with law enforcement, I increasingly take the view that children who grow up in a balanced and stable home, where they receive care and affirmation, are much less likely to become involved in crime or to seek financial support from the state, and more likely to achieve well at school. Those factors are becoming as plain as a pikestaff.

A recent article in The Guardian written by Paul Webster stated:

"A French study of violent adolescent crime puts most of the blame for aggression on the failure of parents to provide role models . . . Psychiatrists Bernard Zeiller and Tony Lainé examined 600 files on violent juvenile crime in Paris for the national institute of health and medical research. These included seven murders, one by a child under 13.

Sixteen children aged 13 to 18 took part in a study aimed at drawing up a portrait of juveniles likely to become criminals. All had an image of a failed father who had not protected them from criminal impulses as they were themselves delinquent, or alcoholic.

Mothers had failed to provide an environment in which the child's personality could develop. The offenders suffered from narcissism and a constant feeling of insecurity and the fear of abandonment."

A recent article by Janet Daley which appeared in The Times on 25 November 1993 stated, about two thirds of the way through:

"Scientific rationalists that we are, we cannot accept the central mystery of the human condition: that we are all born with a capacity for evil and a readiness to be good. How most of us learn to be good rather than evil is a secondary mystery, but there is little doubt that it requires the presence of other people.

Good behaviour is taught and measured by others, whereas bad behaviour may grow in perverse isolation, feeding on its own introversion. Instructing the young to suppress their innate evil impulses is the individual and collective responsibility of adults. Without constant supervision (and the kind of moral instruction now regarded as authoritarian) the young can and will run amok into amoral, sadistic egoism."

Surely she hits the nail on the head.

Can we any longer doubt that each child is born with a potential for good and for bad? Each young life, if properly nurtured with love and consistent discipline, is able to learn from a responsible role model, and is much more likely to develop into a predominantly law-abiding citizen.

Of course I recognise that some children will have psychological difficulties whatever their parents do. There are also those well-raised children who are derailed by incidents of circumstances later in life. However, as a general rule, children raised in stable and secure homes are overwhelmingly more likely to make a positive contribution to society, and are also more likely to pass on that capability to the next generation. As we debate the Christmas Adjournment, it is an appropriate time to consider the implications of the family in this nation.

An article in The Evening Standard on 4 March 1993 states:

"Mrs. Roberts, chief probation officer for Hereford and Worcester, told the association's annual conference in London: 'Tackling shortcomings and equipping young people with basic social skills are the components of the successful reduction of offending behaviour.

'These skills include dealing with people in authority, learning how not to lose your temper, getting what you need by legitimate and acceptable means and finding positive opportunities for creativity and achievement.'

In a reasonably stable and supportive home environment, young people were tremendously responsive, Mrs. Roberts said.

'But sadly, in some of the more desperate urban settings, motivation is less easily tapped,' she added.

'What is needed to reduce persistent offending is what most people acquire during childhood through stable family life, education, the learning of skills and the availability of opportunity.'"

Mr. Michael Connarty (Falkirk, East): We all agree about what we wish to see in society. I am concerned that the hon. Gentleman does not appear to be willing to define the family. Much has been written about the family as a nuclear family, with male and female parents and a number of children. However, does the hon. Gentleman accept that many studies have shown that, although the trauma of divorce greatly disturbs children, if they come through the divorce and are left with one caring, loving parent who teaches them as the hon. Gentleman has suggested, that parent can be just as successful in bringing up the child in a balanced way and keeping him or her on what the hon. Gentleman would call the right path?

Mr. Streeter: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, and I accept what he says. If he is patient, I shall come to that issue.

Sadly, it is also true that children raised in a setting in which mother or father or both do not care, do not love and do not discipline consistently, are much more likely to develop into adolescents and adults who live in conflict with others and end up in trouble with the law. Importantly, there is also a tendency to pass those problems on to the next generation.

I realise that I am making generalisations, but I trust that the House will not condemn me for that. I recognise that exceptions to general principles can always be found, but I believe that the evidence in support of my general premise is overwhelming.

The way in which a child is raised does not involve simply financial circumstances. Children from rich homes who are deprived of love and consistent discipline are also likely to develop into irresponsible adults. Children from the poorest home, where a mother and father valiantly try to bring them up well, are likely to grow into citizens who make a positive contribution.

My argument is that whether each child born in this nation develops into a predominantly law-abiding citizen, or someone likely to slide into crime or lean on the state, depends largely on the forces that shape and nurture that life in its early years in the home and then in school. Care and affirmation produce children who are at peace with themselves and others. A strong and stable family unit is the best vehicle—perhaps the only vehicle—for delivering children who make a positive contribution, because a stable family offers the best context for parenting and a role model for children.

If we are to find long-term solutions to rising crime or welfare dependency, we must find ways of encouraging and strengthening stable relationships between parents and their children. So many things that we now seek to do as a Government, or as local authorities or other statutory agencies—whether it be seeking to prevent crime or caring for elderly people—should and can be done better by the family. Many of our social problems would gradually disappear if we established family relationships as the cornerstone on which our society is based.

For that reason, I believe that Government should actively seek new ways to support and encourage the family. That would have long-standing and far-reaching benefits to our nation. If we strengthen family relationships, that will also strengthen individual responsibility and responsible citizenship. If we strengthen family relationships, that will foster a great sense of community and neighbourhood. The healthy future for our nation lies in the proper balance of individual responsibility, the stable family and active community, not in ever-increasing state provision.

Many will shake their heads and say that it cannot be done, that it is not the role of Government to tell people how to live their lives. I agree that freedom of choice is paramount, but surely it is the job of Government to set the direction and create the environment in which those choices can be made. When better to consider those matters than now, as we approach Chistmas?

It is also right to give a lead in social policy, and not merely follow behind people's choices, picking up the pieces no matter how high the cost. We must be prepared to make value judgments. If it is right that the personal, social and financial costs of family breakdown are so damaging to our nation, should we be reticent about saying so? If we believe that family relationships are important, we should say so and seek to give a lead.

We have allowed the fear of upsetting minority groups to undermine our moral leadership and social policy for far too long. It is now considered discriminatory to say that we wish to encourage the family. We fear a critical backlash from those who choose an alternative life style, so we remain silent. We must now move the agenda forward. The family is better because it is better for society as a whole. It is sound common sense. People who chose an alternative life style are free to do so, but we must not let the tail wag the dog.

The stable family unit should be our goal, not because of some fancy moral argument, but because it delivers maximum social benefits. It is a practical matter. We have the right to make that call. I do not hark back to a golden age of perfect family life, for it never existed. My call is to learn the lessons of yesterday and today to make tomorrow better.

It is important to stress that, in promoting the family, I am attacking not lone parents but neglectful parents. Research appears to support the view that two parents are better than one. The presence of mother and father enables the burdensome responsibilities of child care and breadwinning to be shared. Let me make my view clear: thousands of single parents up and down the land are doing a magnificent job in raising their children in difficult circumstances. They deserve our support, not our condemnation.

The challenge is to find ways to prevent so much family breakdown in the future, to produce better parents and reduce the number of children who grow up outside a framework of security and discipline. I hope that, as we approach Christmas, we can debate those issues.

Our divorce statistics are truly horrifying, yet when I speak to young people about their aspirations for the future, I find that they aspire to long-term commitment. Most people are looking for a partner to whom they can commit and with whom they can share their life. They want a secure home in which to raise their children. That is their dream, but sadly today, too many lack the skills, the understanding or the benefit of a role model to make that dream a reality for them.

In seeking to support and encourage the family, we are not cutting across the grain of people's aspirations; we are cutting with the grain, seeking ways to help people to achieve their goal in life. We have helped people to own their homes. Let us help them to achieve the personal security that we all seek.

What can be done? We need to reach a consensus that family is important, that family is better and that family can deliver the social benefits that we rightly seek. I suspect that we are much closer to that consensus now than we were even three years ago. What we lack is any clear view on how to take the debate forward and convert it into practical action.

In closing, I shall make some brief suggestions. First, it is clear that too many young people grow up without learning the skills of being a parent or a spouse. We must commit ourselves to educating young people about their relationships and the complexities of partnership and parenthood. A great deal more can be done in our schools to educate young people in those areas. Of course there is no magic formula to being a good spouse or partner and a good parent, but there are timeless principles involved that can be taught and passed on.

Secondly, there is value in more proactive counselling, and teaching young couples before marriage is entered into —and during it. For several years, my wife helped run a pre-marriage counselling course in our church in Plymouth. In some cases, it was amazing how little some young couples on the threshold of marriage knew about each other.

In every case, the course proved of benefit to those taking it. Approximately one in five young couples decided not to get married, or deferred their marriage, as a result of being confronted by important issues that they had not previously considered. Surely that should be seen as a success, not a failure.

We also know from our own experience and with being involved with other couples that expert and wise counselling at the right time for all couples going through a bad patch can mean the difference between reconciliation and separation. We need to explore ways of reaching couples before marital problems become marital crises.

Thirdly, having taught people the skills, and having given them the counselling and backup necessary, parents must be made to face up to their responsibilities. The Child Support Agency has made a valuable start in addressing financial responsibility. Although there is some concern about the way in which the Child Support Act 1991 is being implemented, no one appears to dispute that the principle is right.

We need to extend that parental responsibility to areas of conduct of children for which parents must be responsible. There should be few exceptions to that. There is no doubt in my mind that if parents knew that they would be increasingly responsible for the actions of their children, they would be more careful in how they sought to raise their children in the first place.

Fourthly, our primary school teachers can spot the extreme potential troublemakers and lawbreakers at an early stage of their time at school. Often, such a child is simply reflecting its background, and is unlikely to change its ways without special attention. We can do more in directing resources at that point in a child's life to seek to place that person on the straight and narrow, rather than waiting until he or she has broken into our homes or stolen our car. I should like to see more active thought given to how direct intervention into that child's life might take place in a way that would make a real difference.

Fifthly, we need a gradual increase in the penalties for crime. Having given the help and the skills to encourage people to develop as law-abiding citizens, we must then punish severely those who choose to offend. The absence of a realistic deterrent is one of the biggest issues facing us today. I commend my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary for his excellent attempts to redress that imbalance.

Finally, it has long been my view that we should encourage responsible behaviour and discourage irresponsible behaviour through our tax and financial systems. More thought needs to be given to how our tax system can be designed to enable people to come together in long-term relationships and to stay together. Having recognised the importance of stable families, we should be ready to defend that institution through our tax and benefit structure. That would represent the investment in excellence that we need to see in our nation.

Not for a moment would I suggest that that is a matter for Government alone. I call upon the Church and all opinion formers to recognise the importance of strong family relationships and to redouble their efforts to promote the right message. Let us all work together on that vital task.

There are no short-term, quick-fix solutions, but we can do positive things to build for the future quality relationships in the home. It is a mighty mountain to move, but the lessons learned from some of the more extreme incidents of the past few years compel us to start that task. The tragic James Bulger case is but one.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has given an important lead in his call to get back to basics and to espouse traditional values. It is for all of us to respond. As we approach Christmas, let us trust that the strong and stable family unit will once again become the foundation on which our nation is built.

Mr. David Rendel (Newbury): I shall raise a rather more parochial issue—although one that is of concern in other constituencies apart from mine—than that addressed by the hon. Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Mr. Streeter). It is that of the A34, the Euro-route that passes from Southampton up towards the midlands and is the main trade route from our south coast ports to the midlands. The road has been improved year after year in its various different parts, until now the only remaining section that is not at least dual carriageway is that just to the south, and through parts, of Newbury.

Hon. Members will no doubt remember that in March this year the Government made a dramatic announcement that the route for the Newbury bypass had finally been agreed, and it would therefore go ahead. Interestingly, that announcement was made only a short while after it became clear that there would be a by-election for the parliamentary seat of Newbury. I am sure that the Government would not wish it to be felt that that announcement had been made purely because the by-election was about to take place and that they would not wish the electorate to believe that any such announcement could be made before a by-election and then not fulfilled after it.

Therefore, it is disappointing, to say the least, that since May this year, there has been no firm guarantee that the money for that bypass will be forthcoming. Indeed, we have heard from the Minister that he is conducting a review of the full roads programme, and it seems likely, in view of the Budget announcement, that at least some of the roads that we had believed would go ahead will not be built—or, at the very least, will be deferred.

I spoke to the Minister the other day about other problems on the A34, when I and those with me suggested that the traffic could only get heavier once the bypass had been built and the road was dual carriageway from Southampton to Birmingham. He said that we could not make the assumption that the bypass would be built in the near future. That was a great disappointment to me and the people of Newbury.

The problems on the A34 are many and numerous. There is the immediate problem that the traffic through the centre of Newbury is extremely heavy and there are long queues, particularly during the rush hours in the morning and the evening. Those are a cause of great annoyance not only to those trying to get across the country from Southampton to Birmingham and vice versa but to the inhabitants of Newbury trying to go about their daily lives.

There is also the problem of blight along the route of the A34 bypass. A number of people live in houses that are not close enough to the route to be subject to compulsory purchase but are close enough to be severely affected once the bypass is built. Those people cannot sell their houses on the open market, and the Minister, sadly, is being slow to use his discretionary power to purchase them.

Thirdly, there is danger on the route itself. The section of the A34 immediately to the south of Newbury is a notorious accident black spot, with accidents every month, if not every week, frequently causing damage not just to vehicles but to people. If all those problems are to be solved, we badly need the money to be firmly allocated to that project.

Another problem with the A34 is the noise it creates. I am speaking here particularly on behalf of the two communities of Chieveley and East Ilsley, just to the north of where the A34 crosses the M4. New road surfaces, some of which are still being researched but some of which have been proven, can reduce the noise on trunk roads. Sadly, they are more expensive and harder to maintain than the normal surfaces.

There is a major noise pollution problem near trunk roads, and the A34 is a case in point. I urge the Minister to ensure that we take note of the need to introduce one of the new surfaces wherever there is a significant noise problem, even if that means a greater expense.

The Government have often made it known that they wish to do something about pollution, and I suggest that they do something about noise pollution, just as they are aiming to do something about atmospheric and water pollution. Apart from the new noise reduction surfaces, a number of other measures, such as noise reduction fencing or banking, can be used. I urge the Minister to consider those solutions as well in our case.

Perhaps the most significant change that could be made would be to legislation on noise pollution. It is ridiculuous that some people are eligible for grants to install noise insulation and others are not.

Let us take a hypothetical case of two towns joined by a major road, which passes through two villages, which constitute two bottlenecks. The Government decide to improve the road on the route, and remove one bottleneck through one village. Unfortunately, the other bottleneck still exists, so the increased traffic on the road will not reach the level at which grants for noise insulation are triggered.

The Government go ahead with the futher improvement in the other village at that point, and because both bottlenecks have been removed, the traffic up that route suddenly increases considerably. The grant level is therefore triggered, and the second village becomes eligible for grants for noise insulation. Unfortunately, although the traffic has risen by exactly the same amount in both villages, only the village where the work is being done is eligible for grants. That does not seem to be either logical or fair. As I said, it must apply not only to Newbury, but to other parts of the country.

If a route is improved and traffic levels increase, all affected houses on the route should be eligible for noise insulation grants—as in Chieveley and East Ilsley—not merely those immediately adjacent to the final work.

In the case of those two villages, the main reason why they are not eligible for grants is that the road running through was improved in advance of the new grant mechanism coming into play. Nevertheless, they suffer, because the road has since been improved in many other places and has gone from being a small, rural route to a major Euro-route that carries all the freight traffic that passes between the south coast and the midlands. That has led to considerable noise pollution in the villages, and so far Government have refused to do anything about it, either through noise reduction methods or by allocating grants for insulation.

Those problems on the A34 deserve urgent attention. I urge the Minister to ensure that something is done to address the problems with the bypass, which will solve some of the traffic problems in central Newbury, and the problems of noise pollution along the line of the A34 as it passes through Berkshire, and I ask that the necessary legislation is introduced before Christmas.

10.32 am

Mrs. Jacqui Lait (Hastings and Rye): It is somewhat ironic to follow the hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. Rendel) when I, too, wish to discuss roads in my constituency and would not wish the House to adjourn until I have had some response to the special issues that I wish to raise. The hon. Gentleman's complaint is that there is too much traffic on the A34; my complaint concerns the need to upgrade the roads to make Hastings prosperous. I make no apology for once again returning to the subject —one which my predecessor raised regularly as, I suspect, shall I. I hope that hon. Members will bear with me.

The economy of Hastings is exceedingly fragile and, as if in recognition of that, while unemployment fell across the country in the past month, it rose in Hastings. I know exactly where that unemployment arose. Some of it related to what I consider to be a welcome decline in the need for such an extensive defence industry. However, I have enormous sympathy for the people who are consequently on the unemployment register. This shows how large decisions can have a dramatic impact on a small town such as Hastings.

Because our problems in Hastings were recognised, it was granted assisted area status, which is exceedingly welcome, especially as the Department of Trade and Industry has received well over 100 grant applications for assisted area status grants. However, the Department of Trade and Industry was clearly not prepared for the sheer volume of applications. Hastings is perilously close to losing potential business because the Department is not responding as quickly as it originally thought it could and it is even extending the revised period in which grants will be awarded to people in Hastings.

The key reason that Hastings has assisted area status is the appalling state of our roads. One local business man in my constituency recently wrote to the Secretary of State for Transport and he has gone even further in his condemnation of the roads than my usual argument that they would be recognised by 18th-century smugglers. His view is that if the current state of our roads had pertained in 1066, King Harold would not have been killed at the battle of Hastings as nobody would have been able to get in and out of town.

The A21 is a single-track country lane—the main road through which 40-tonne trucks carry goods and services in and out of Hastings and it is almost blocked because of resurfacing work. The A259, the main south coast route, is undergoing significant remedial work to the west, and the eastern part has been totally closed for what has become seven weeks, but was allegedly to be 10 days. That has caused enormous problems not just for business but for residents trying to do what little shopping they can in Hastings in the run-up to the Christmas period. Clearly, local business men and women are exceedingly upset. Our problem is not just that the roads are worn out, hence the remedial work, but that they are not of good enough quality to create the stable economy that Hastings needs.

I was struck with terror during the Budget speech when I heard that there were to be reductions in, and a slowing down of, the roads programme. It is ironic that almost every roads proposal produces instant and aggressive reaction but few hon. Members do little other than recommend more roads for their constituents. There must not be any further delay in the upgrading of the A21 and the A259 in Hastings. I understand that the Department of Transport is actively considering a number of bypass proposals, any one of which should improve our roads. However, they are all at different stages of development and none is linked. The A21 ceases to be a dual carriageway south of Tonbridge. There are at least six different proposals—all at different stages—for draft orders and public inquiries, but none has been given the go-ahead. None of the proposals for the A259 has yet reached public inquiry stage.

The problem is not only that delays are being built into the schemes and that the Minister for Roads and Traffic promised draft orders for the Hastings bypass in spring, but that he is now promising the orders in late autumn. As I reminded him in a recent letter, there are only four weeks before the end of the year. How is late autumn defined?

The links between the various proposals are out of phase and are not logical, resulting in excess costs. Each time a bypass is proposed, and because it is not logically linked to a subsequent portion, we dodge backwards and forwards across the A589 and it becomes a zig-zag instead of a straight line. That costs extra money, when the road is eventually built, and takes extra time. I am not surprised that the Department of Transport has come up with ideas to reduce from 11 years the time taken to get a road from the original proposal stage through to final planning permission stage.

When I was first selected for Hastings and Rye, a venerable gentleman metaphorically patted me on the head and said, "Don't worry about roads. We have been trying to improve them since before the first world war." I should hate to think that there would be another world war or that we could not get our roads improved. We must ensure that we link many of the bypasses and that we use the speeded-up process so that we get a logical road. We must move quickly so that my constituents can benefit from logical and sensible roads which will help them to build up the economy of Hastings, which we all wish to see.

It is dispiriting to talk to people wishing to invest in Hastings who say that it is only half a town and that the other half is the fish in the channel. It is hard enough to attract business to a small town on the south coast without penalising ourselves and without the Department of Transport penalising us by slowing down the roads programme, which is so crucial to ensure that our unemployment goes down and that our average wage, which is one third of the national average wage, becomes a competitive wage so that we can ensure that we have prosperity in a town that desperately needs it. I should hate us to go into the Christmas recess without some comment from the Department of Transport about its proposals for the A21 and the A259 to benefit my constituents.

Mr. Michael Connarty (Falkirk, East): Having heard several pleas for roads, it comes to my mind that everyone has a road in which he or she wishes to see some investment. I put on record my disappointment that the Scottish Office is unwilling to fund the bypass that would avoid the Avon gorge between Lothian and Central regions. There have been a number of serious accidents there, although, thank goodness, no deaths, over the past 20 years. However, that is not the reason why I stayed in the Chamber to speak today.

I was interested that the hon. Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Mr. Streeter) let us know that he was involved in church work and I was interested by his definition of the concept "saved". He spoke about pre-marriage counselling for some of the people in his church and said that he saved one fifth of them from taking the step of getting married. That is a new definition of "saved" for me. I refer him and other hon. Members who listened and nodded sagely to a new book by my hon. Friend the Member for Peckham (Ms Harman), the second-in-command on our Front-Bench Treasury team, called "The Century Gap". Males especially should read the book. Her thesis is that whereas men are living in the 20th century, women have advanced into the 21st century, and that it is about time that men joined them before they find themselves out of step. We would achieve better results for our children if we regarded their upbringing not as a family matter, but as a parenting matter. It is not only the structure, but the quality of relationships that is important for the future.

I stayed to speak today because I was informed that there would be a debate on agriculture on the motion for the Adjournment. Scottish agriculture is suffering badly at the hands of the European Community. I feel some debt to the National Farmers Union of the Forth valley and I wanted to speak on their behalf. It is a pity that we are not having such a debate and I hope that we shall have it at some time. I recall the change to the sheep meat regime causing consternation among the hill sheep farmers. We had a debate here about that. People in Scotland are suffering.

Another problem is the milk quotas. When I was leader of the council in Stirling district, it was predicted that one tenth of farmers would be out of business, and would have to sell their farms or give up their tenancies by the end of the decade as a result of the quotas because they had invested heavily in new milk parlours. That has come to pass in the Forth valley and it is a great shame. There is a deficit in the milk supply in Europe, yet we do not transfer quotas across boundaries to this country. As a result, many of the companies that process milk have gone to other European countries, taking manufacturing jobs with them. That was verified when we met the Food and Drink Manufacturers Association just before the Budget statement. We have been remiss in a number of areas.

In cereal production, set-aside is being forced on Scotland next year because of the quality and productivity of Scottish farming. I deprecate the fact that Scottish farmers will be punished when cereal production quotas could be transferred to Scotland to allow them to continue to produce cereals. It is a pity that we did not have an agriculture debate today. I would have been happy to take part in it and to speak on behalf of farmers, although there are few in my constituency. It is a national problem in Scotland and it is probably also a United Kingdom problem.

I intend to speak about a matter that is not as specific as the roads pleas earlier. I shall speak about the orange badge scheme—the disabled sticker scheme. I do not know whether the scheme works in the same way in England and Wales. In Scotland, it is becoming a regime that takes away a small benefit which gives disabled people a quality of life that they could not otherwise have.

I hope that the House will think about the scheme. It is not a great financial gift and it is not a licence for people to park wherever they like. Many road traffic schemes, especially double yellow line schemes, mean that people cannot park on certain roads even with an orange badge. Last Christmas, Strathclyde clamped down heavily on parking. A person with an orange badge who did not know the regulations well enough parked near the shopping centre. When he came back to find his car, he saw that it had been towed away by a private security firm hired for the purpose. He had to pay more than £50, and he was lucky enough to have money and a credit card with him so that he could get his car out of the pound. However, he had to walk and to take a taxi for almost a mile and a half.

People cannot use the scheme to park wherever they like, and that is correct. However, I wrote to Strathclyde council saying that it was being rather harsh and that there should be some zoned parking on roads that had double yellow lines near the shopping centre at Christmas for people with orange badges. The incident was a great shock to my constituent, and there has been great hardship for many orange badge users who have had to park far away from the shopping centre.

The scheme has been amended by regulation, not by debate in the House. The purpose of the regulation was to stop abuses, and I applaud that. There were many abuses. When the Labour Government were in power, my good friend Lord Ewing of Kirkford, from whom I took over, was a Scottish Office Minister. He spoke to some of my pupils when I was a teacher of children with learning difficulties. He told them about the orange badge schemes and he pointed out the many abuses. The problem became greater as the 1980s went on. It is right that the regulations should be used to stop abuses, but they have now gone too far and the scheme is far too rigid.

The regulations seem to make it practically impossible for people to get a new orange badge unless they can prove that they have had a double amputation and that they cannot even wheel themselves along. They are asked whether they can travel 200 yds by any means. Let us consider the case of my constituent Mr. Andrews of Grangemouth which illustrates the point well. He had had an orange badge for more than five years and he was told that he had to fill in a new form. He is a very honest gentleman in his mid-70s who has for some time suffered a number of problems with walking and who has had several operations. He said that if he leant on his wife's arm and stopped every 20 yds or so for a rest, he could probably travel 200 yds without a wheelchair. He was then denied renewal of his orange badge. The bottom line was that he could travel 200 yds by some means. It would not have mattered if he could only get himself over 200 yds on his hands and knees. He would still have been denied renewal of his orange badge.

I applaud Mr. Andrews's attitude, which I recommend to anyone who finds himself in such a situation. With personal advocacy that would have done any hon. Member proud, Mr. Andrews took the matter up in the press and contacted the television company; he fought a battle. The council did not say that it was wrong. It said that it would send him a new form and that if he wrote that he could not travel 200 yds under his own steam, it would give him a badge. That is ludicrous. He had to be less honest than he wanted in informing the authorities of his circumstances, to obtain an orange badge. The scheme is now so strict that people who need badges are losing them and that small addition to their quality of life is taken away.

I am reminded of the new incapacity allowance. The suggested method of proving that one qualifies for that allowance reflects the same attitude. One must prove that one is so incapacitated that one cannot do anything for oneself. I hope that is not the purpose of the allowance, which should be to add to an individual's quality of life, not to transform people from being vegetables into active citizens.

[Mr. Michael Connarty]

The inflexibility of the new orange badge regulations works against those who are temporarily incapacitated for one or two years and who have been advised by their doctor that they cannot get about under their own steam. The provision of a badge would help such people more easily to shop and in other ways. The regulations do not allow for a temporary badge. Must the applicant lie and state that he or she is permanently incapacitated, and not admit that—if the doctor is right—they will be able to get about in one or two years? Are such people merely to state that they are disabled and, after a couple of years, hang on to their badges as long as they can? To use a phrase that is common in politics and in life generally, such people are caught between a rock and a hard place. It is time that the Government examined the scheme's inflexibility.

Mrs. Reid from Bo'ness is one constituent who has written to me on that subject. The Scottish Office says that the regulations are set, but that a flexibility clause allows a local authority to use discretion but not grant temporary badges. There is something wrong if flexibility and discretion cannot be used to assist a person who is temporarily disabled or incapacitated. I will be harsh on the Scottish Office and say that it sets the regulations and then passes the buck. That is a favoured way of doing things. I was for 10 years the leader of a council that was weighed down with regulations with which it had to conform, but it was not given the resources to do so.

The transport planning authority appears to have chosen a person—I will not name the gentleman—having the least heart and soul in the bureaucracy to administer the scheme. The terms and tone of his letters upset people, in that he does not countenance any flexibility if he can get away with it—and the regulations allow him to deny flexibility. The Scottish Office Minister responsible should add flexibility to the regulations and exhort local authorities to use the discretion that will give the incapacitated the small addition to their quality of life that the orange badge scheme can provide.

The regulations appear to give plaudits and prizes for being rigid and inflexible, and I am sure that is not the scheme's true purpose. I enter a plea on behalf of my constituents and other people in Scotland and in England and Wales who find it difficult to renew their orange badge, and who are expected to enjoy a lower quality of life. The Government are providing a lower quality of life in everything that they do, but I am sure that they do not want publicly to be found out. I ask the Minister responsible to reconsider the scheme and to introduce a regulation that will provide for easier orange badge renewal by people who have owned one for a number of years—and certainly for those who are in the later years of their life—but which still keeps abusers out of the picture. I hope that we may see changes in the next couple of months.

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): The House should address four matters in the context of my constituency before it adjourns for Christmas. The House will not be surprised to know that they are the high-speed rail link, as it passes through Kent; grant-maintained schools; the application for objective 2 status within the European Community; and the routing of ambulances.

The high-speed rail link has been a major problem for the people of Kent, as alternative routes have twisted and turned across my constituency and elsewhere in Kent over the past five years. I will highlight the plight of 90 households at Pepper Hill, under whose properties Union Rail currently wants to drive a tunnel. Union Rail blatantly states that those residents will suffer no noise or vibration. That is why I called for a geological survey to be commissioned, to assess the noise and vibration impact on those residents—what I call the rumble.

As the A2 action group of local residents and I are not experts in geological surveys, I asked the then Conservative-controlled Gravesham borough council to appoint a geological expert to investigate the Union Rail survey. I understand that the council eventually did so, and that that expert is already at work.

The ball is now in the court of Union Rail. Last month, it delivered to me and to the borough council a preliminary report on its geological survey. It promised—we know about British Rail's promises—that the result of laboratory tests would be delivered to Gravesham borough council by 29 November. They have not yet been delivered.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport kindly gave Gravesham borough council and myself until 31 December to give our views, which will not least be based on the results of the geological survey. I ask that all pressure be put on Union Rail to deliver the test results now, as they are already nearly one week overdue.

I believe that the rumble will be felt by those residents living over the proposed tunnel, which strengthens the case for the alternative route 226. It would take the tunnel—and a tunnel would be of advantage to all residents of Northfleet—away from properties, to run under an electricity substation.

I understand that the National Grid Company, which owns and operates that substation, produced an option report on the costs and practicalities of renewing that ancient switching substation or resiting it. I hope that the Department of Transport will study that report with a positive mind, to ascertain whether a solution can be found. One must be found, because the existing plan is totally unreasonable for the residents concerned.

The Department of Transport paper for the channel tunnel rail link high-level forum, "Property Purchase and Compensation Policy", commented on compensation safeguarding when the route is announced by Ministers in January. That paper states:

> "Safeguarding also brings into play the statutory blight provisions (and purchase notices) of Part VI of the Town and Country Planning Act 1990. A blight notice may be served by the owner of any domestic property within the safeguarded zone seeking purchase."

I cite the case of six householders sandwiched between the A2 motorway, which itself will be widened southwards nearer to their homes, and the high-speed rail link route announced. Those houses have for many years been sandwiched between two main transport arteries. They are four houses at Longview off Henhurst road, Cobham, and two houses in Scalers hill, also in the parish of Cobham.

The capital and amenity values of those properties have been ruined by public transport, and their owners must be compensated. I am told that their owners want to move. Those properties should be included in the safeguarded zone, so that their owners' rights will be taken into account.

Reverting to the 90 households over the tunnel, I note that the same document states:

"Blight notices would not be accepted for properties within safeguarded zones over bored tunnels except where there are surface works such as ventilation shafts."

That is quite wrong as a policy. The tunnel does damage to the capital value and amenity of the 90 households that live above, and it is not fair to claim that the costs of that compensation make the high-speed rail link that much less viable. It is not fair to the residents, because the other side of the coin is that the proposal makes the capital value, and amenity value, of residents' houses equally less valuable, and they are less capable of sustaining that loss.

I shall now discuss grant-maintained schools. Conservative Kent county council was traditionally in the forefront of local financial management. It put, as a matter of policy, 90 per cent. of the funding of schools directly local financial management. It was not surprising, therefore, that, with the advent of grant-maintained school status, many Kent schools advanced to take 100 per cent. responsibility for funds and decisions relating to education.

It is not surprising that the support of parents of children in so many schools for adopting grant-maintained status was overwhelming; indeed, 50 per cent. of secondary schools in Kent have already become grant maintained. In my borough of Gravesham alone, five of the eight secondary schools and two of the primary schools have voted to become grant maintained, and two further schools are balloting for such status at the moment. Those that have become grant maintained have been successful. They are vibrant; they are go-ahead; they give good education to the young people concerned. The response of the new Labour-Liberal coalition that runs Kent county council has been one of unremitting hostility. The Lib-Lab coalition that is running Kent has allocated £100,000 of education funds to the mindless pursuit of opposing the will of parents in grant-maintained schools—£100,000 from the education budget, which could have been spent on new classrooms, on repairs to school buildings and on new equipment for our schools, just to pursue the petty party political prejudices of the Labour and Liberal parties.

What justification do they give for that approach? The Labour education spokesman on Kent county council, County Councillor Mrs. Esterson, said that, in previous votes of parents before the most recent county council election,

"parents voted against Conservative Kent County Council."

Let us consider that. Now, at St. John's Roman Catholic Secondary School in Gravesend the parents have voted on the matter, and 75 per cent. voted for the school to become a grant-maintained school.

Let us see the logic of Councillor Mrs. Esterson. Presumably the parents voted against the Lib-Lab coalition that runs Kent county council. What rubbish! Of course they did not. They did not vote on political grounds. They voted on the grounds of the education of their children. They voted positively because they felt that in that school they had a good headmaster, good governors, good teachers—indeed, a very good school—and they believe that they will get better education by having 100 per cent. power over the decisions and the spending of the education funds relative to their children.

That does not bother the new Lib-Lab coalition that is running Kent county council. The council is now circulating a misleading letter to parents who are due to vote in such cases. I shall take as an example the letter sent to parents of children at the St. Joseph's Roman Catholic aided primary school in Northfleet.

The first claim made to the parents by the Lib-Lab Kent county council is:

"The Grant Maintained sector has not grown as Government Policy had hoped."

That is an odd statement to make, because what the Government hoped is irrelevant. What counts is what the parents decide, and progress has been made, because in those schools the parents have decided that it is in the interests of their children.

That letter goes on to ask, rhetorically:

"Do you want your Headteacher and senior staff to be heavily involved in non-educational duties? Or do you want money spent hiring extra staff to do such work?"

Non-educational duties? When one has those "Headteachers and senior staff" working on the delivery of quality education locally in their school? That is what they are working on, and they are deciding the best means of so doing. When one bears in mind the fact that the school gets an extra 10 per cent. of funds, they can judge what to spend it on, and that may be partly on administrative and clerical support if they so judge.

The letter also says:

"There is no published evidence whatsoever which indicates that standards in the Grant Maintained sector are either better or worse than in Local Authority Schools."

Where have the authors of those letters been living in the past few weeks? We have seen lists of exam results from schools up and down the country, and what does one note? The grant-maintained schools predominate in the top of that list.

I would point out that high up in that list is the Northfleet school for boys in the borough of Gravesham in my constituency—not a grammar school—a school which is exceptionally well run. The parents are so supportive that the school has become grant maintained, and it has done exceptionally well, as those lists prove.

Here is another extract from that letter from the Lib-Lab county council:

"Whilst the early schools which joined the Grant Maintained sector received significant additional money this was not 'new' money. It has been and is being removed from existing schools, in other words robbing Peter to pay Paul."

That claim is the most pernicious of all. The logic of transferring that 10 per cent. of funds is that that is the amount of education funds that had to date been spent on administrative and advisory support to those schools from county hall. The grant-maintained decisions show that the schools believe that they can get better value for the same money locally in the school than can the county hall bureaucrats.

The problem for Kent county council and other councils is that they are losing that 10 per cent. of funds. How do they react? They should either win contracts from the grant-maintained schools to provide those same services, or they should cut the bureaucracy that provided those so-called services proportionately. Given the petty warfare of Kent county council, under its Lib-Lab control, against the grant-maintained schools, it is unlikely that they would win any such contracts.

My constituents, and even hon. Members, are great enthusiasts for that television programme "Yes Minister". We remember that Sir Humphrey always presented to Ministers painful cuts in services rather than cuts in Sir Humphrey's empire. That is precisely what is happening at the moment at Kent county council.

[Mr. Jacques Arnold]

Let us remember that the letter referred to "existing schools". The new Lib-Lab masters of Kent county council go on about cutting schools and nursery schools as a consequence, but they are addressing the wrong options. At the very first test of its competence, the Lib-Lab pact in Kent has failed. It claims that Kent taxpayers are confronted with only two options: either to pay higher council tax or to cut education services. That is not the choice. The bureaucracy has a responsibility to scale down accordingly, and we shall be watching to see whether it does so.

Incidentally, I welcome the 13 per cent. increase in the revenue support grant from the Government to Kent county council, and I would think that, with that 13 per cent., it should be well able in the coming year to develop services and impose no council tax increase whatsoever on the people of Kent.

Lastly, I shall discuss the British application to the European Community for designation of north Gravesham —indeed, of a wide area of Thames-side in Kent—for objective 2 status for European structural funds. My hon. Friends the Members for Dartford (Mr. Dunn), for Medway (Dame P. Fenner) and for Gillingham (Mr. Couchman) and I have long campaigned for such status, with the support of our Member of the European Parliament, Ben Patterson, and the local borough councils.

We particularly appreciate the enthusiasm of our right hon. Friend the Minister for Industry in making the application, and I should like to highlight two projects to which objective 2 funding from the European Community could contribute.

The first is Northfleet town bypass. Northfleet is an historic urban area which has always been dependent on heavy industry, but its roads were not built for heavy goods vehicles. Northfleet high street and the Springhead and Dover roads are quite inadequate for the heavy goods vehicles that daily pound along them.

There have been long-standing plans for such a bypass known as the Thames-side industrial route fourth phase. It is now known apparently, as the south Thames development route fourth phase. It would extend from the Springhead lower roundabout westwards to Dartford. This would be a very good project, with which financial support from the Community would help.

The second project that I wish to highlight is the north-east Gravesend access road. There is poor, ancient access to the two business areas—the Norfolk road industrial area; and the Old Denton industrial area, which has large companies such as Comma and Southern Water. We need a new road from the Lion roundabout to the Denton industrial estate, over the north Kent line and onwards to Denton wharf.

This road would bring relief to the residents of Old Denton, an historic and compact area. Heavy goods vehicles are currently rumbling along ancient roads such as Range road, which are lined with very small terrace houses that cannot withstand the vibration those vehicles generate.

We have heard in the House that paramedics on our ambulances now have the expertise to diagnose emergency patients and therefore take them directly to the most appropriate medical centre. In particular, Ministers have highlighted the fact that paramedics can identify appropriate cases and take them directly to trauma centres —intensive care units. My belief is that if they can diagnose up to specialist cases, surely they can diagnose down.

Our intensive care unit in Gravesham is at the Joyce Green hospital, Dartford—an excellent unit, but many miles away. The accident and emergency unit to which all ambulance cases are taken is at West Hill hospital in Dartford, which is also excellent but is miles away. If we now have highly specialised paramedics, I do not see why they cannot diagnose down emergency cases that require, for example, stitches or treatment of burns, which could easily go to the casualty unit at Gravesend and North Kent hospital, which is in our town and is far more convenient. I hope that the national health service will consider this proposal for convenience and for cost-saving.

11.12 am

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): I shall speak reasonably briefly because time is, alas, too short, which is one of the reasons why I tabled an amendment. On Thursday, 21 subjects were requested for debate. The proposal that we should abandon Parliament from 17 December to 11 January seems wrong. The notion that we should occupy only three hours of a Friday when five hours are available for debate is entirely wrong. There are enough Members here well to fill the three hours available and I have no doubt that other hon. Members, had they been presented with the opportunity of a five-hour debate, would have been here to debate issues.

Mr. John Marshall: Where are they?

Mr. Cryer: It is inept of the Government to allow a three-hour debate when five hours are possible.

If the Parliamentary Private Secretary, behind his master, keeps making little jokes, I shall have to analyse in great detail all his silly comments. The Conservative Members behind him, who wish to take part in the debate, will be very reluctant for him to continue his silly antics.

May I continue last night's Adjournment debate on the Child Support Agency? I was here for part of the debate, which was instituted by my hon. Friend the Member for Warley, West (Mr. Spellar), and was particularly interested and concerned by the Minister's reply, because, like many hon. Members, I have been presented with cases that are disturbing and distressing for the people involved and for hon. Members.

The Minister's response to my hon. Friend's valid points was simply lacklustre and inadequate. There is a head of steam to get the Child Support Agency legislation changed; the Government should take note of it, because people from all walks of life are adversely affected.

It is worth remembering that the Child Support Act 1991 was presented to the House as legislation to ensure that irresponsible fathers who were not paying maintenance would be traced and would make a contribution to their children. Everybody regarded that as a perfectly just and proper aim, but the aim of the agency is now to tackle the easy money—that of fathers who are paying, who are known, but who are being subjected to an entirely restrictive and unfair formula.

Hon. Members who write to Ministers who piloted the Act through Parliament are shrugged off with an inadequate response, and told that the chief executive will reply. When a reply is received, it is simply a straightforward computer printout that tells Members, for example, that courts previously made decisions about this matter—something, apparently, that the agency believes only people on Mars knew.

Of course we know that information, and that cases varied from court to court. Sometimes that was a strength, because courts took into account differing circumstances. The letter goes on in a pedestrian way, saying that the person can ask for a review, and if they are dissatisfied with it they can appeal. In the meantime, they have to pay for the assessment and collection, which is rubbing salt into deep wounds.

Last night, as the Leader of the House will confirm, the Minister admitted that, in 616,000 cases, the agency has traced only 9,000 absent fathers. I believe that Government policy is to use the Child Support Agency not as a child support agency but as a Treasury support agency. It has been given the task of raising money from people who already accept their responsibility and pay maintenance.

I have a typical constituent's letter. I shall not give his name, because these circumstances are always private and distressing to the people involved. He writes:

"I am an 'absent Father' who firmly believes in the paying of maintenance for my 3½ year old daughter. I made a voluntary arrangement with the DSS . . . to pay £28·00 a week. I have never missed this payment ever since it was agreed by all parties concerned, approximately 18 months ago. I am currently making arrangements through my solicitor to transfer my equal share of the matrimonial home and its contents into my ex-wife's name.

I parted from the marriage with my car (value £1,800·00). The house has equity of approximately £12,000·00 plus contents.

I am now in a relationship with a Divorcee who has two children from her previous marriage. She receives £5·00 per week for child maintenance on an irregular basis.

I have recently had a form from the CSA and find that they do not take into account the fact that I am now in a new relationship with my new partner and that I also provide for two children aged 9 and 4 years. The CSA say they are not my responsibility. I am their Daddy as far as they and everyone else is concerned. They together with myself are going to suffer badly, to a point where we may have to sell our home, if the CSA is allowed to continue.

I ask you to look at the CSA formula and tell me if you agree with it.

For the sake of my family, myself and thousands of other absent parents who willingly pay maintenance, I implore you to do something".

That is not uncharacteristic for a person who is acting fairly and handing over equity in the home.

The Minister's response is that it is simply nothing to do with the formula that the Government have laid down. That is grossly unfair. If the Tories claim that they are the party of the family, the Child Support Agency is bringing pressure to bear on families which will lead to further break-ups. If they are trying to save taxpayers' money, if there are further break-ups, that will mean further claims on the welfare system. I strongly urge the Leader of the House to pass the information to the Minister who replied so inadequately last night. Things must be changed.

I shall conclude my remarks about the Child Support Agency by mentioning a female constituent who has written to me. She has received six maintenance payments in three years and has complained about the lack of maintenance. She is the sort of person whom, we were told, the Child Support Agency was designed to support.

The Child Support agency took several weeks to write a letter. It then got the address wrong, although it had been given the correct address, and then said that it wanted information about the income of the former partner within two weeks. The former partner refused to give that information, so the agency allowed another two weeks. The woman wrote to me within the past few days to say that the information was still not available. On that example, even when the Child Support Agency is doing the work, it is not effective, and the figures given by the Minister bear that out.

Another young women wrote me an appealing letter. She had a baby and does not seek maintenance. She did not say so in her letter, but she said that she wanted the name of the father on the birth certificate. She does not have much money, but she would like the DNA test to be taken by the man, who disputes the claim. She is having great difficulty.

I referred her to the Child Support Agency, which told her that it would be three years before it could tackle her case. She is an ideal young woman for the agency to help, because she is a single parent and simply wants the name of the father on the birth certificate so that the child is not fatherless. That is not an unreasonable aspiration.

Another example is that of a man in a high-earning category—he earned as much as a Member of Parliament. He fathered a child and accepted his responsibility. His marriage has recovered from the sense of betrayal that had been incurred, and he and his wife were settling back. He has two teenage children to look after, and they are ready to go to university.

Through the door came a letter from the Child Support Agency. There was nothing private or confidential about it. His wife opened the letter—they were exchanging correspondence—and all the old wounds reopened. That day, when he returned from his well-paid, responsible position—a pillar of society, if one likes—his wife had packed her suitcase ready to go. He told me that it had been a difficult week, but it looked as though the marriage could be saved.

That is the effect in thousands of houses up and down the country. Yet the bland, ineffective reply of the Minister yesterday made it sound as though it was all some sort of administrative procedure. We are talking about an area of great sensitivities and difficulties. Relationships are being trampled on with hobnailed boots. I hope that the Minister will take the message. It is fair to say that the message is not simply coming from Labour Members. Some Tory Members have criticised the agency—there are anxious mothers and fathers battering at their doors as well.

Another subject that I shall mention is one that I have raised in the House previously—wheel clamping. I am raising the subject again because it has been raised again in Bradford—wheel clampers have been about again. In this case, they clamped the car of an articulate young women who, I am happy to say, will sue them. They held on to her and kept her by her car for two hours while she organised the recovery of the imposition of £75. I have had an Adjournment debate on this subject, as has my hon. Friend the Member for Warley, West (Mr. Spellar).

Wheel clamping is taking place in Bradford, and women are being placed in jeopardy. They are often clamped late at night, at 11 or 11.30 pm. We are not talking about people parking cars in other people's back or front gardens—we are talking about what appears to all intents and purposes to be wasteland. People come out of the Alhambra theatre in Bradford to find that their cars have been clamped and they must find £75. A few months ago, the fine was increased from £50—an arbitrary imposition.

Many people are angry, because they are placed in danger by these cowboys. Indeed, in one case—it is not West Yorkshire Outdoor Securities Ltd., although that is the most prominent cowboy organisation in Bradford—one clamping company was clamping cars without the permission of the owners of the land. It was simply putting on a clamp and extorting money from innocent car owners.

A consultative document was issued by the Home Office, and responses to it had to be in by the end of May. However, there is still no sign of any activity by the Home Office. It should produce some proposals as soon as possible. The matter is causing concern.

I must tell the Minister about a woman who came to Bradford—she is not one of my constituents. She came 10 miles with a companion to go to the Alhambra theatre. Her car was clamped. The last bus and the last train had gone, and she had no other means of getting home. Fortunately, her companion had £50, which was handed over, and she was able to get her car. She went to the police. The police sat on their elbows and said that it was nothing to do with them—it was not a breach of the peace.

I shall tell the House what I say to people who are clamped and do not have the support of the police. I tell them to say that they will picket on behalf of the National Union of Mineworkers, and see what the police will do then. During the miners' strike, the police discovered all sorts of laws that could be utilised. However, in the case of men and women whose cars are clamped late at night, they cannot do a single thing.

The law needs clarifying along the lines of the Scottish court decision that clamping on private land in this way is extortion and theft. Since that court decision, there have been no traffic jams in Scotland, following the removal of those cowboy crooks.

My final point relates to a matter raised yesterday—the "Dispatches" programme about Aims of Industry and British United Industrialists, which have been raising money for the Conservative party. In response, the Leader of the House said that there were all sorts of conspiracies, and that it was not worth troubling his mind about them.

The Conservative party is a continuing conspiracy. On the programme broadcast on 1 December, the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Sir E. Heath), a former Prime Minister, made the clear statement that, if people were asking others for money for political parties, it was a political donation. A Scottish Minister said exactly the same thing about British United Industrialists. The right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup made the point generally, but specifically referred to Aims of Industry.

It appears that not only Labour Members are concerned about this—distinguished former Tory Prime Ministers are saying that such donations are for political purposes and therefore should be recorded as political donations. If that is the case, firms such as Lucas, which was named on the programme, are in breach of the law in not declaring such donations as political donations.

It was made clear that Aims of Industry and British United Industrialists know what they are doing. They are raising money which they have repeatedly said is to help the Conservative party at general elections. That should be sorted out and, if the 1985 legislation has been breached, the Government should call on the relevant Departments to institute prosecutions.

It was made clear by a member of the Wallasey Conservative party that Aims of Industry had campaigned on behalf of the then Lynda Chalker in Wallasey. If that happened—the programme has strong evidence that it did—the election laws of 1983 must also have been breached.

The Leader of the House is cautious and believes that the Conservative party is the party of law and order. Here is a test: if it is the party of law and order, he should pass on the message to the Home Office to institute prosecutions against Lucas and other companies that have made illegal donations without admitting them, and certainly to ensure that Aims of Industry is prosecuted over its activities in Wallasey.

Everybody knows that public buildings and taxpayers' money are being used to subsidise dinners at No. 10. Many of us believe that those who turn up for such dinners include representatives of tobacco companies, which is why there is no ban on advertising cigarettes. The industry influences the Government through the money that it donates to the Conservative party. I believe that the beer barons are also making massive contributions to the Conservative party, which is why they did so well in the Budget.

If I am wrong, I expect that the Conservative party will want to raise its head over the sleaze surrounding it and start the prosecution process, so that it can refute, clearly and firmly, any accusations by people like me on the basis of evidence provided by television.

Mr. Nigel Evans (Ribble Valley): I wish to discuss the subject of credit card fraud, which is particularly important at Christmas because we are expected to spend some £15 billion in the shops this month, much of which will be transacted on plastic. Unfortunately, fraud using credit cards has doubled in the past five years.

People in this country have far more credit cards than our European neighbours. The French have 20 million cards and the Italians have only 5 million, yet we have 83 million credit, cheque guarantee or retailer cards.

Banks and retailers that issue cards are losing more than £400 million a year, or £761 every minute of the day, at the hands of fraudsters. Last year, more than 2 million cards were reported stolen. Of those, 150,000 were taken as a result of muggings and 300,000 during burglaries.

Black market prices in London suggest that, once stolen, credit cards can be sold to a middleman for between £50 and £150. The platinum cards—whatever they look like—can be sold for some £300. Once a middleman has bought a card, he passes it on to an encasher who uses a team of petty criminals to buy as much as they can using the cards. Those goods are then sold at knockdown prices from the back of a lorry, at car boot sales or elsewhere. By the time the process is completed, the average loss on a stolen card is £600.

Another problem is counterfeit cards from the far east. The police estimate that between 25 and 50 per cent. of gold card fraud is committed on counterfeit cards. So what measures can be taken to cut that fraud? Credit cards can be passed through an on-line system, which detects whether a card has been stolen. However, that system is expensive and not all retailers are linked up to it. Another system is to check the signature on the back of the card. Hon. Members will have noticed how many times their credit cards are returned to them without the signature being checked. Unfortunately, that is happening too often.

Moreover, how many times do signatures differ during the day? Mine certainly differs from time to time, so even that checking procedure is made more difficult.

The result of the over-reliance on signatures and the reluctance to use on-line system means that 60 per cent. of all card fraud is committed after a card has been reported stolen. Barclays bank has its own system for Visa and Barclaycard. It looks at the purchase pattern of the person using the card and, if it is irregular, will check up on it. However, the scheme to which I am most attracted uses photo identification and laser-etched signatures on the back of credit cards. It is being used by the Royal Bank of Scotland, the National and Provincial building society and the Trustee Savings bank. The Royal Bank of Scotland launched its pilot scheme in October 1991, when 30,000 customers at 39 selected branches in Edinburgh, London, Glasgow and Manchester were invited to apply for the new-style cards. They are "highline" cards with a photograph on the back and an etched signature.

The results achieved during the trial period were remarkable. Of the 360 cards lost or stolen, only three were used fraudulently, with a total loss to the bank of £494, as opposed to the £45,000 that it would normally have expected. Following that success, the card is being tested further in Lancashire and is now available to all Royal Bank of Scotland customers.

The National and Provincial building society has experienced similar success with its photo credit card, which differs from the Switch and hole-in-the-wall card of the Royal Bank of Scotland. Just five months after it was made available to the society's 300,000 Visa card holders, more than a third of the customers have taken up the offer to have their photograph put on the back of the card. It is an encouraging take-up rate and 1,000 customers a day are now applying for those new credit cards. Staff at those branches have Polaroid cameras with which they can take photographs of the customers. They charge £2 for a photograph, which is what customers would expect to pay commercially. Remarkably, no fee is charged for the cards. Too often, customers are asked to pay £12, £20 or even more for credit cards, even without photographs and laser-etched signatures.

The beauty of having a signature etched on to a card is that a third of cards used fraudulently are intercepted between the time a company sends out the cards and the time the recipients receive them. If a signature is already etched on a card, it is much more difficult for a fraudster to put his signature on it, thus helping to crack down on such fraud.

The public seem to like the new system. All the polls show that people using the cards back the use of photographs and laser-etched signatures. Retailers also like it and it has been endorsed by the British Retail Consortium because it helps it to crack down on crime. Scotland Yard has also welcomed the scheme. It pointed out that, even if a fraudster could remove the picture of the owner and replace it with his own, he would be reluctant to do so because, where suspicion occurs, the card is retained by a member of staff and the police then have a good idea of what the fraudster looks like. So thieves and fraudsters hate such schemes.

I am not enamoured of the idea of making such a scheme compulsory, but the evidence shows that companies issuing cards should embrace such new technology. It is a wonderful addition as a form of identity in general. I favour the idea of identity cards. A cheque guarantee or credit card with a photo on the back is an absolute boon. The cost of a card without a photograph is about 25p and with a photograph it is £1·20, but the massive savings that can be achieved will more than pay for the extra price.

Banks should not drag their feet over implementing new technology to reduce credit card fraud. It wastes police time, when such fraud could be stamped out. Given the fantastic reduction in fraud through using that technology, why should police time be wasted by not using it? Consumers who do not use that technology pay for the fraud every month through credit card protection schemes, inflated borrowing rates and card charges. It is up to us as elected Members to call on the banks to make every effort to tackle this problem. Our constituents have the right to be protected against credit card fraud and no stone should be left unturned in pursuit of that aim.

Mr. John Spellar (Warley, West): I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) for his kind comments. I had better not go further because if I did the political editor of New Statesman and Society will see yet another conspiracy. The Leader of the House will be pleased to know that I will not go into the subject of the Child Support Agency which I spoke about yesterday in the Adjournment debate. As I said then, many of the problems being experienced with that agency were raised when the right hon. Gentleman, as Secretary of State for Social Security, introduced the measure.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South spoke about wheel clamping. I shall give a brief history of how that matter has been pursued in the House by a number of Members, including myself. In the summer, I secured an Adjournment debate on the subject and had some meetings with Ministers and civil servants. Unfortunately, that did not bring any results, so I introduced a ten-minute Bill, and a consultation document was published. As my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South said, responses to that were due by the end of May, which was a fairly short response time. Since then, there has been nothing from the Home Department. I have tabled questions and had correspondence with the relevant Minister, but there is still delay in taking a decision.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South said, for well over a year private wheel clamping has been banned in Scotland and there have been no horrific consequences or enormous traffic problems. Such wheel clamping still takes place in other parts of Britain, although there has been a bit of a lull recently. I was interested to hear that there are still problems in Bradford. During the Christmas period, people drive into areas with which they are not familiar to do Christmas shopping or to go to pantomimes. From previous years, we know that that is the peak time for clamping. There will be an upsurge in cases and more unfortunate people will be subjected not only to considerable indignity and inconvenience, but to occasional danger and certainly considerable cost. Given the increased charges in Bradford, it is obvious that the clampers there do not think that inflation is only 1 per cent., as the Chancellor said in his Budget speech.

The construction industry is facing a bleak Christmas and is experiencing its longest recession for years. As we know, many famous companies, household names, have gone out of business, and the industry believes that at least one other major contractor is likely to go under. The problem affects not just the big names but it is widespread in the industry. Subcontractors are being squeezed at all levels. More than half of the brickwork contractors who were in business a couple of years ago have disappeared. They are experiencing dramatic reductions in orders and a considerable squeeze on their cash flow.

There has been comment about the time that it takes to get money from main contractors and clients, and I am pleased to see that such matters are being addressed. A former Member of Parliament, Sir Michael Latham, is looking at the issue of contracts in the construction industry, and the industry is looking forward to a report from a man who is knowledgeable in this area.

I was pleased to hear the Chancellor acknowledge some of the difficulties that are being experienced not just in the construction industry, although that is the industry in which difficulties have been exacerbated, but by small companies who experience delays in the payment of their bills. The Chancellor is looking at some remedial measures including, I am pleased to hear, the German system of compulsory interest after a specific delay. That will help companies to stay in business.

Such difficulties are also experienced by the work force, the operatives in the industry. There have been major reductions in the number of people working in construction. One of the industry's worries is that many people with valuable skills who have been made redundant two or three times during the prolonged recession will have left the industry never to return. The industry wonders what skills shortages it will face when there is an upturn in building.

Those who are still lucky enough to be in work face considerable problems over pay reductions and the worsening of conditions. Wages for skilled craftsmen in London have reduced by about a third over the past two or three years. Many of them have been forced into casual employment and, effectively, companies are nodding and winking at such people who also claim benefit. Many companies would not be able to price jobs at current levels and people would not be able to work for current wages if they were not illicitly claiming benefit with the collaboration of companies. If the Chancellor is looking for cuts, I suggest the return of some degree of regulation and proper contractual employment in the building industry.

Quite apart from what will happen on deregulation, companies face pressure on health and safety standards. Underlying all the problems is the fact that the industry is experiencing its worst slump since the war. A couple of weeks ago an east midlands builder told me that that week he had advertised for bricklayers and for the next three days he was inundated with calls. Many of those who called had been laid off in the previous few weeks because house building companies had constructed to the first level and were leaving the sites vacant over the winter while they waited to see what would happen in the housing market. Far from being static, the situation is declining further.

The Secretary of State for the Environment should give some encouragement to the building industry about future prospects. The Chancellor of the Exchequer could have done that. Although there was a welcome announcement about the Jubilee line, the commercial property sector is quite flat and house building is still just staggering along and is the only area in which there is likely to be any development. It is worrying that public sector housing is not receiving the necessary support through the Government allowing councils to use capital receipts or encouraging housing associations. Such moves would give a much needed boost to house building.

Government Departments have not been helpful to the industry, as we have seen with the celebrated Bristol case. The curtain walling contract for the Ministry of Defence procurement office in Bristol will be awarded to a foreign company because only overseas companies were allowed to tender for the project. That was based on an out-of-date, 18-month-old report from the Bath technical institute. That situation has now passed, and British companies would have been able to complete the project.

The House does not have to take the word of the institute. I have talked to major developers who have been involved in similar projects who say that they have had satisfactory work within an adequate price from British companies. Unfortunately, the attitude of many Departments is to encourage overseas competition in a futile attempt to cut prices. That is done in a way which is inconceivable to any of our foreign competitors. It is unlikely that the French army would allow a British contractor to tender for a curtain walling contract or that the European Parliament in Brussels would invite any non-Belgian company to tender for its roofing work.

It is also as unlikely as the Bundeswehr inviting a number of overseas companies to tender for its ammunition contracts, as occurred in the infamous bribery case involving a Ministry of Defence official. The core problem is that the Government are encouraging overseas competition to the detriment of British companies. That occurs in a number of areas, but particularly in the Ministry of Defence.

Finally, I think that the House should review the period of the recess. Prolonged breaks are damaging to our standing with the public. It is not bad for hon. Members, who are thick-skinned about the matter, but it is bad for democracy when the parliamentary representatives are constantly attacked in the press. Hon. Members may safely rebut criticism from highly paid journalists who write about our pay, because they always seem to be reluctant to put their wages and conditions alongside ours. That is a challenge that they seem reluctant to take up.

We make ourselves targets by having prolonged breaks. There are so many issues which the public are crying out for us to debate and scrutinise. We should not adjourn until those issues have been fully discussed.

11.52 pm

Mr. Stephen Milligan (Eastleigh): In the Christmas spirit which should characterise the debate, I should like to begin by asking my right hon. Friend——

Mr. Dicks: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. With great respect, my hon. Friend the Member for Eastleigh (Mr. Milligan) has not been here for a great deal of the morning. Some hon. Members have been here from 9.30 am waiting to speak.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Michael Morris): Order. It is entirely for the Chair to choose who is required to speak. To my knowledge, the hon. Member for Eastleigh was here before the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Milligan: I am grateful for your ruling on that issue, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I will try to keep my remarks brief, so that my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks) will have a chance to make points for his constituents.

In the Christmas spirit, I will ask my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House to pass on the thanks of my constituents to three of his ministerial colleagues for actions they have taken to help my constituency during the Session.

First, will my right hon. Friend thank my right hon. Friend the Minister for Public Transport for receiving a delegation from Eastleigh to consider the future of the British Rail Maintenance Ltd. works? There has been considerable concern about how the jobs there will be affected by rail privatisation. My right hon. Friend received the delegation in a sympathetic way and suggested the setting up of a railway liaison group, which is meeting later today to consider ways in which those jobs can be saved, and my right hon. Friend has promised to attend meetings of the group regularly. In view of his busy schedule, we are extremely grateful for the interest which he has shown.

Secondly, will my right hon. Friend thank my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment for his sympathetic view of the future of Hampshire in the context of the local government review? There is a strong feeling in Hampshire that it would be wrong to move towards unitary government. Hampshire county council is older than this Parliament, and it is an effective county council which is widely respected. Hampshire brought in the lowest shire council tax in the country last year, and I believe that it would be wrong to abolish the council. I was grateful to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for saying that Hampshire might be an exception which would be allowed to retain a two-tier system.

Thirdly, I am particularly grateful to my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor. Only 10 days ago in the House, I made a speech about unemployment and suggested two measures which I though would be of concern, particularly in my constituency, but also across the country. I thought also that those measures would help to reduce unemployment.

The first measure was more help to small business and, in particular, action to penalise companies that did not pay their debts on time. The second was more help to provide training. I am delighted that my right hon. and learned Friend adjusted his Budget at the last moment to take account of those two concerns and that he made recommendations in those directions.

I should like to address my main remarks not to either Front Bench but to the Press Gallery, which is characteristically packed for today's debate. I spent 20 years as a journalist and I have great sympathy for those who ply the trade. I think that journalists come in for a lot of unfair criticism. People do not realise how speedily journalists must produce their articles. One need only look at the coverage this week of the Budget. It was remarkable that most newspapers were able to produce such detailed and extensive coverage within a few hours of my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor sitting down.

I believe that most journalists do a remarkable job. This country is blessed with a press which is much more entertaining than most papers abroad. When the British press is compared with Die Welt, Le Monde or the New York Times, one sees that it is a pretty good read. It is also diversified. We have the highest newspaper readership of any country in Europe. We must admire the quality of the press, which maintains a high standard of language, unlike some of our television companies. One reads much less bad language in the press than one hears on BBC 1 or ITV of a Sunday evening now that swearing and bad language have become commonplace on television.

Two issues concerning the press have been raised. The first is the question of privacy, which has been extensively discussed and which I do not wish to discuss further this morning. The second—which I believe most people would regard as more important—is the accuracy of the press. I was interested to note that the chairman of the Press Complaints Commission said that 70 per cent. of the complaints that the commission receives deal not with privacy but with accuracy.

As I said, producing accurate articles soon after an event is difficult. Inevitably, mistakes are made. We all make mistakes. Only this week, we have seen typing mistakes in the transcript of the messages between the Government and the IRA. The information was produced quickly and mistakes were made, and that happens in journalism, too. I once made a terrible mistake when I was working for the BBC. The former leader of the Liberal party, the right hon. Member for Tweeddale, Ettrick and Lauderdale (Sir D. Steel) was standing in the European elections in Italy. We followed him around for a day and watched him eat spaghetti and talk to the Italians, then rushed to the studio to record a piece for the six o'clock news. The opening line in my commentary was, "Sir David Steel is the first Englishman to stand for election in Italy." Within a few minutes, the BBC switchboard was jammed with hundreds of thousands of calls from people complaining that I did not realise that the right hon. Gentleman came from Scotland.

It is easy to make mistakes, but sometimes there is too much of a rush to produce an article without properly investigating the circumstances. Only last week, I was rung up at 11 o'clock at night and asked about a report that money was being filched from the railway pension fund to pay for the royal train. Late that night, I contacted my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport, who made it clear that there was no truth whatever in the report. I pointed that out to the BBC "Breakfast Time" programme, but those concerned were not interested in whether it was true—it was too good a story, so they ran it, with comments from Opposition Members.

I regret to say that two newspapers did the same, not just reporting the untrue allegations but suggesting that they were true. The Guardian said:

> "The Government has taken £730,000 from the British Rail pension fund and transferred it to the royal train's budget to make the train more attractive for private investors to take over."

We do not look for favours from the Daily Mirror, but we do expect normal standards of journalism to apply sometimes. That newspaper ran the headline:

> "BR regrets that £730,000 has been diverted to Royal Train".

The story reads:

> "Transport Secretary John MacGregor has shunted hundreds of thousands of pounds away from British Rail pensioners to keep the Royal Train running."

The Guardian at least had the grace to publish a letter from my right hon. Friend the Minister for Public Transport two days later pointing out how untrue the story was—although, interestingly, right at the bottom of its correspondence column. To my knowledge, the Daily Mirror has made no such apology.

[Mr. Milligan]

Newspapers have a duty to try to check the accuracy of stories before they print them, and when they get them wrong, as inevitably they will, to print proper corrections. Some newspapers have now introduced local ombudsmen who look into complaints and that is a significant improvement. I should like to suggest another simple change. Most newspaper editors could adopt the practice of American newspapers such as the New York Times and print a regular corrections column—not dictated by politicians but in the interests of their readers, and put things right where mistakes have been made. That would be good for the readers and for the reputation of newspapers. The Times, when it was the top people's newspaper, made a regular habit of printing corrections. Alas, that happens no longer. If local and national newspapers introduced a regular corrections column, they would be doing their readers a great service. In the Christmas spirit, I offer that suggestion, and I look forward to hearing my right hon. Friend's comments.

Mr. Terry Dicks (Hayes and Harlington): I was in the Chamber for the start of business and, except when I went to the toilet on one occasion, I have been here ever since.

I should like an answer before the Christmas recess to the issue that I am about to raise. It is almost a business question and, as the Leader of the House is here, perhaps he will agree to a debate on airport capacity, particularly as it affects Heathrow airport in my constituency.

Everyone knows that Heathrow airport is the busiest international airport in the world and that there is a great deal of pressure on it to expand. A planning application for terminal 5 is currently with the Secretary of State for the Environment, and we are expecting the pre-consultation approach at the beginning of next year.

Linked to that, the British Airports Authority has asked the Department of Transport for permission to contribute towards the widening of the M4 in my constituency. It is amazing that the Department of Transport can have consultations about the widening of the M4, as it relates to terminal 5, before there has been a planning inquiry and an acceptance of the need for terminal 5 and the proposal to build it.

A working party looked at runway capacity requirement for the south-east into the next century. The working party sat for many months and came up with the wonderful recommendation that it would keep all the options open and make no recommendations. I do not know what it cost the public purse, but it was a joke.

The Department of Transport has said that it will require from August of this year until May of next year to consult on all the options, about which the working party could not come to a conclusion.

One of the options is a third runway at Heathrow. That is one of the most nonsensical ideas that I have ever come across, since I have been a Member of Parliament or before. Even the air traffic control people have said that if there were a third runway at Heathrow it would never be more than 30 per cent. utilised because the congestion is not on the ground but in the sky.

I do not know why that was an option, especially as Stansted has capacity for approximately 8 million passengers, and only approximately 2 million use it. If ever there was a case for Stansted to use its vacant runway and terminal capacities, it is this.

The Secretary of State for Transport has said that he must keep the consultations open. He said, "Unofficially, Terry, I can tell you that in my view there will be no third runway at Heathrow." His spokesman for aviation has said much the same. The Department of the Environment has said that it would never agree to pulling down thousands of homes in three villages in my constituency in order to put a third runway at Heathrow.

While all this behind the back, nudge nudge, wink wink attitude is taken, the issue is driving people crazy. My constituents want a definite assurance that there will be no third runway at Heathrow. People are concerned that their homes are blighted, that, having lived there for many years, they will have to move away. They are concerned that they will not get the right compensation if they have to move, which they do not want to do. I cannot understand why this situation should be allowed to go on.

The Labour party has earned no great credit in this matter. Its candidate at the last election has been winding up people there. Old people have been worried sick because he told them, prior to the 1992 election, that within six weeks of the Tories getting back into power there would be a Cabinet announcement that a third runway would be built at Heathrow. All this time later, there has still not been such an announcement. There will not be such an announcement, but he is trying to get people in my constituency worked up. He has linked the opposition to the runway with the opposition to the fifth terminal, and he has united people in the battle.

Another issue is that we still have night flights. Anybody who was in London overnight will know that the first flight coming in from east to west, across central London and above the M4, was at 5.25 am. I am told, "Don't worry, Mr. MP, people do not usually stay awake after they have been woken up by an aeroplane; they go back to sleep." That is another nonsensical report that has been produced by idiots who have nothing better to do with their time.

There should be a move towards the complete abolition of night flights. We should say to the aviation industry —to the airlines and the British Airports Authority in particular—that Heathrow is situated within a community and that that community should not be manipulated for the benefit of airline passengers, airlines and airport owners. They should adjust to the needs of the community.

Many of those people were there long before the airport. Others came later, and obtain good-value properties under the flight path. However, the airlines tend to believe that because the economic benefits come from Heathrow, that is the overriding factor and nothing else should be considered.

I have a simple answer to solve much of the problem. There are 77,000 domestic flights a year in and out of the world's busiest international airport. There is no reason not to halve that number by telling people flying from airports such as Manchester, Liverpool and Plymouth that they cannnot come to the world's busiest airport, but must go to other airports such as London City, Luton or Stansted. We cannot continue to have 77,000 movements a year, plus general aviation movements at Heathrow, when there is a demand for international airlines to use it. If we halved the number of domestic flights to Heathrow, we could use some of the space created for international flight use. We could also cap the level of movements.

My right hon. Friend the Leader of the House must tell his colleague, the Secretary of State for Transport, that I want an answer to the problem before Christmas. I want an announcement before Christmas that there will be no third runway at Heathrow—it is unnecessary and impractical. I want the fears of my constituents, especially old age pensioners, who do not understand what is going on, allayed immediately. If my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport, does not allay their fears, he will face the biggest row and fight that he has ever experienced over transport.

Mr. David Amess (Basildon): Before the House adjourns for the Christmas recess, I wish to raise three issues. They do not, on this occasion, include Pitsea post office, as I am prepared to let the guilty parties, the post office and Tesco superstore, wrestle with their consciences.

I pay a warm tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) for his magnificent effort in yesterday securing more than £300,000 in Konver from the European Community. I also pay tribute to the excellent European Member of Parliament, Miss Patricia Rawlings, and my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House. My constituents and the rest of Essex will benefit greatly from that extra money.

First, I have been the unpaid spokesman for hospital radio broadcasting for as long as I have been a Member of Parliament. I am beginning to think that I have not done a fat lot of good, as, each year, I have made the same speech, but have been unable to deliver the goods to interest the House in that important issue.

All Members of Parliament receive letters from constituents about hospital radio broadcasting. They make the right noises, but there has not been the will in the House to deliver to hospital radio broadcasting what it wants. At first, we tried to obtain zero-rated VAT for hospital radio broadcasting. We then tried to get hospital radio broadcasting its own frequency. We have now reduced our expectations and merely want to replace the present induction loop system with a generalised frequency.

There are 640 hospitals with more than 260,000 beds. The organisation employs more than 12,000 volunteers, and is the largest voluntary organisation in the country. It broadcasts more than 10,000 hours of programmes every week to 8.2 million people. I hope to goodness that the House will take the subject seriously. We all have constituents who work as volunteers in hospital broadcasting. Let us give them what they want—the Christmas present of their own frequency.

My second topic for discussion is China. I was appalled that, by just one vote, Beijing failed to win the Olympic games. What is the world thinking of? Have we forgotten Tiananmen square and the disgraceful events that took place there? It is outrageous that we seem to have forgotten the atrocities that took place in China a short time ago.

Basildon constituents are interested in matters in China. I wish to bring to the attention of the House the position of Bishop Cosmas Shi Enxiang. He is a Catholic bishop who is loyal to the Vatican, which puts him at odds with the Chinese communist authorities that require Catholics to be submitted to the Government-controlled Chinese Catholic Patriotic Association. I suppose that he is in an old folks' home. In reality, he is in detention. I hope that, before Christmas, the Government will do everything they possibly can to secure the release of that bishop.

Thirdly, in 1991, I introduced a ten-minute Bill to amend the Pet Animals Act 1951. I appeal to the House to explain to our constituents that purchasing pets before Christmas is a serious matter. It is a disgrace that that Act, which is more than 40 years old, enables children under 16 years of age to go to pet shops and purchase kittens, dogs, alligators and other amphibians without proper parental consent and information on how to look after them.

I hope that the House will have a happy Christmas recess. I hope that the nation will enjoy the Christmas break. From one Essex man to another, I have great expectations of my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House and I hope that he will give a Christmas present to hospital radio broadcasting, to the Chinese bishop and to pets throughout the country.

12.10 pm

Mr. Nicholas Brown (Newcastle upon Tyne, East): It seems like only a few weeks ago that we last held a debate of this kind; indeed, it was only a few weeks ago. My hon. Friend the Member for Warley, West (Mr. Spellar) was right to draw our attention to the way in which people view what must seem to them—they even seem to me—to be protracted breaks. They are longer than the electorate expect the House to have.

The Leader of the House seems anxious to pack us off for the Christmas recess as soon as he can, so much so that the debate is held on a Friday, and many of my hon. Friends anticipate the wishes of the Leader of the House on those matters. It is not hard to see why. The debate today has focused on deprivation and hardship. It has been demonstrated from the Conservative Benches that deprivation and hardship can be found in parts of the country where Labour Members, perhaps, do not look for it closely enough.

The hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale (Sir F. Montgomery), who opened the debate, spoke movingly of affordable housing, of the importance of objective 2 status and of economic deprivation. I thought that he might talk about Jarrow, where he used to be a teacher, or Hebburn, where he served on the urban district council, as it then was. I thought that he might talk about Consett, in the north of England, which was his first parliamentary battle.

But no; instead, he told us of the economic deprivation in his constituency. I thought of Prestbury and Alderly Edge and the communities that seem to be having a rough time. I thought of the industrial decline, to which he referred, since the end of the war—I assume that he meant the Falklands war—his cry that something must be done and his hope that the Department of Trade and Industry would do something before he went upstairs. I took that to be a reference to the Committee Corridor and the 1922 Committee.

The theme of deprivation and neglect by Government departments was taken up by my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner), who referred to British Coal's responsibility, or its attempt to avoid it, for subsidence and housing damage in the high street and New Station road part of his constituency.

The theme found an echo on Conservative Benches. The hon. Member for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold) also spoke about tunnelling undermining property and property values. Although one appeal was directed at the Department of Trade and Industry and British Coal, the other was directed at British Rail.

The theme, however, is the same. If those great engineering works are to be undertaken, responsibility must be accepted for the homes of those who will be affected by them. The rapid abandonment of Britain's coal mining industry by the Government leaves environmental problems behind. My hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover is quite right to draw the attention of the House to that and to demand an adequate response from the Government.

The hon. Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Mr. Streeter) spoke of a turning point in the economic fortunes of the nation and drew our attention to crime, divorce, badly behaved children and the undermining of the institution of the family, perhaps pointing to the direction in which he thought that our economic fortunes had turned. I agree with the emphasis that he gave to poor parenting. He chose a French study as evidence, but there is also evidence to be drawn from a study by Professor Colvin, based on samples drawn from Newcastle, which makes much the same point. At the heart of the problems is poor parenting, rather than single parenting, so it is on that that we should concentrate, but the study also drew attention to economic deprivation.

The hon. Member for Sutton drew attention to the duty of the tax system to underpin the family. I take that to suggest that he will oppose the Chancellor's pinning of the married couple's allowance to the new 15 per cent. rate and that he does not fully support the way in which the Child Support Agency works. That theme was taken up later by others.

The hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. Rendel) hoped that the Government would reward his constituents for voting Liberal by building them a new bypass, which suggests that he does not quite have the measure of the present Administration.

The hon. Member for Hastings and Rye (Mrs. Lait) gave us a reprise of "The Ragged Trousered Philanthropists" by telling us that average wages in Hastings were only a third of the national average. Presumably, she will have something to say to her constituents when their disposable income is hit by the 4 per cent. extra tax burden resulting from the Budget, when those in the public sector have to get by with their wages frozen and when the council tax for Hastings and Rye, like that of every other council, goes up well ahead of the rate of inflation.

My hon. Friend the Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Connarty) rightly drew our attention in this pre-Christmas debate to the plight of the disabled and, in particular, to the inflexibility of the regulations governing the orange badge scheme.

I was pleased to see the hon. Member for Gravesham making common cause with my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover about the effects of underground works on property values and the right to a compensation scheme. If he focused his complaints on Kent county council rather than on the Government generally, we can understand the political reasoning behind that. I hope that I do him no harm by identifying him with my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover. My hon. Friend is as well known in his constituency as the hon. Gentleman is in his. That unique partnership might carry a certain bipartisan value in Kent. I understand that that is the way in which public administration is now conducted in that county.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) spoke for both sides of the House when he drew attention again to the shortcomings of the Child Support Agency. Hon. Members are complaining not aboout the principle of the agency but about the way in which it operates in practice. People who made agreements that they thought were lawful and reasonable, and that were accepted by both parties, are being hunted down for more money and those whom we assumed that the legislation and the agency were directed at are getting away with not making payments.

The sums of money involved can be high, as I know from my constituency case load. In one case, which is not unique, a constituent is having to pay £60 a week from a £200 income. Not only is that a substantial amount of money, but it is not the sort of money that he would be able to pay, or be expected to pay, were the child still within his household.

The hon. Member for Ribble Valley (Mr. Evans) spoke with authority about counterfeit credit cards and credit card fraud and rightly drew to the attention of the House the spectacular rise in crime under the present administration. My hon. Friend the Member for Warley, West drew our attention to another aspect of crime: the way in which the wheel clamping industry is operated by cowboys against the interests of citizens who do not deserve to be punished or penalised in such a vigorous manner.

The hon. Member for Eastleigh (Mr. Milligan) drew our attention to unemployment and to what I hope is an unrelated matter, the standards of journalism, and suggested that regular corrections columns should be carried in newspapers. He especially referred to The Guardian. The idea that a newspaper should have a corrections column as a regular feature says something about standards of accuracy that are now expected. It is probably right that there should be some facility for putting right yesterday's errors. Perhaps that suggestion should also be recommended to the Editor of Hansard so that such a facility was available to us as well as to our friends in the press.

Mr. Jacques Arnold: Disgraceful—an attack on Hansard.

Mr. Brown: The hon. Gentleman shouts disgraceful as if Labour Members would want to make exclusive use of such a facility. Of course not; it would be available to hon. Members on both sides of the House.

The hon. Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess) spoke of the defence industry in Essex, of the Konver programme and of defence diversification. It is a policy that Conservative Members seem to oppose in general but are happy to have specifically applied to the areas that they represent.

I should like to comment on the area that I represent, which the hon. Member for Altrincham and Sale knows well. It is, of course, the area that contains the Swan Hunter yard. It is a yard in receivership, which some six months ago directly employed 3,000 people and now employs fewer than 1,000 people who can expect to lose their jobs if no action is taken in the next six months. I accept that there is a case for defence diversification in Essex, but I expect that, if the Government still pretend to represent the whole country, they should accept that areas that once relied on defence industry employment, such as Tyneside, Merseyside and Barrow in Furness, deserve and need assistance, and they need it now. The work force at Swan Hunter have served the country well in peace and war and deserve better from the Government than neglect, the rundown yard, the redundancies and long-term unemployment that will be their fate if something is not done and done shortly.

The Leader of the House (Mr. Tony Newton): I shall mildly correct the wrong impression given by the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East (Mr. Brown) in saying that it had only been a few weeks since we debated such a motion. He may have misremembered or misthought that we had such a debate before prorogation. In fact, the previous recess motion debate was some considerable time ago—in July, when large numbers of hon. Members were complaining that it had not come earlier.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: I was referring to parliamentary weeks. We were not sitting throughout the summer.

Mr. Cryer: Very good: what a mistake to make.

Mr. Newton: I missed that, but I am sure that it was entertaining.

The other thing that struck me was that nobody referred to the other amendment on the Order Paper or whether it is the official policy of the Opposition not to have a recess. I see from the Order Paper that the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) wants the House to sit until 24 December, and among others, my hon. Friend the Member for Colchester, North (Mr. Jenkin), assiduous as are all Essex Members of Parliament, wishes the House to resume on Sunday 26 December. [Interruption.] If every motion before the House today were passed, hon. Members from the northern parts of the country would not even get home for Christmas lunch before they would have to turn round and come back.

I am not sure whether that point applies to the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East, but I know that it applies to a number of hon. Members. I find some of the complaints a little ironic in view of the constant pressure —not, I accept, from the hon. Members for Bradford, South and for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner)—for me to seek to advance the Jopling report to ease the burden of work in the House so that hon. Members can spend more time on their other work in their constituencies.

I shall not be able to comment in full on every speech. However, in view of the friendly references to the county to whose representation we both contribute, I shall make some quick reference to what my hon. Friend the Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess) said, not least because he was kind enough to pay tribute to our hon. Friend the Member for Chelmsford (Mr. Burns), who has just appeared in the Chamber, and to myself as the right hon. Member for Braintree. At this moment, we also have here my hon. Friends the Members for Brentwood and Ongar (Mr. Pickles) and for Epping Forest (Mr. Norris). Indeed, we have one third of the parliamentary representation of the county of Essex in the Chamber. No other part of the country can make that claim.

Mr. Dicks: Only for the past five minutes. It is a plot.

Mr. Newton: I am prepared to tell my hon. Friend the Member for Hayes and Harlington (Mr. Dicks) publicly that there is no conspiracy in this. I did not know that any of my hon. Friends from the county would be here today. The quality of their representation has been revealed.

I shall not be able to satisfy my hon. Friend the Member for Basildon on every point, but I have one important point to put to him. According to press reports in Hong Kong and in the European Catholic press, Bishops Shi Enxiang and Chen Jianzhang—fortunately there is an aid to pronunciation in the notes in front of me—were released on or around 20 November. Both names were on the list of cases of concern prepared by Amnesty International and they have been the subject of western representations. I am not sure whether there has been absolute confirmation of their release, but I know that the reports have appeared. Both my hon. Friend and I will welcome the bishops' release if it proves to be the case.

My hon. Friend the Member for Altrincham and Sale (Sir F. Montgomery) made a number of points about housing matters, about the social security system and about the position on objective 2 assisted area status for his constituency. I will, of course, draw his remarks to the attention of my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade. I know that my right hon. Friend regretted that it was not possible to propose Altrincham and Sale for objective 2 status. The straightforward reason was that the unemployment rate in the relevant period was well below the national and Community averages.

I hope that, in considering what he said to us about housing matters, my hon. Friend the Member for Altrincham and Sale will acknowledge that the Housing Corporation's programme will provide for 53,000 new homes next year, producing a total output of around 173,000 over the three years 1992-93 to 1994-95. That is 20,000 more homes than we promised in 1992. It is important that I should put that point on the record.

One other contribution to which I especially wish to refer is the speech by the hon. Member for Bolsover, because it was different from the contributions that he sometimes makes in proceedings in which I am involved. I much respected the way in which he put the case on behalf of his constituents, who clearly have an extremely difficult problem. I will ensure that his comments this morning are looked at thoroughly by the Ministers concerned. He will know that the Government, with the support of both sides of the House, have approved the subsidence regime under the Coal Mining Subsidence Act 1991, which provides extensively for the repair of or compensation for properties damaged by coal mining subsidence.

I realise that the question whether coal mining has caused the subsidence is one of the issues raised by the hon. Gentleman. I will ensure that the specific issues raised by him are brought to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment. My right hon. Friend will consult local authorities until 10 January on his proposals for the revenue support grant in 1994-95.

I understand that no approach has been made on the specific issue that the hon. Gentleman mentioned, but my right hon. Friend stands ready to meet any right hon. or hon. Member or authority to discuss proposals during that period. That responds to some of the hon. Gentleman's requests. I cannot promise a successful outcome, but I can guarantee that the hon. Gentleman's representations will be carefully considered.

My hon. Friend the Member for Plymouth, Sutton (Mr. Streeter) made a lengthy and thoughtful contribution to the debate on family matters, which I am sure will be studied by Ministers in the Home Office, Department of Health and Department of Social Security. My hon. Friend will accept that it is not possible for my response to be as wide-ranging as his speech.

My hon. Friend recognised the importance that people generally attach to the traditional family and that many lone parents are doing a magnificent job in difficult circumstances. I am sure that he much welcomed the proposal in the Budget speech of my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor, amplified in a statement by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security, to help towards the child care costs of those who seek to maintain or to regain their independence by making use of family credit. They will include many lone parents, but not only them.

The hon. Member for Newbury (Mr. Rendel) and my hon. Friend the Member for Hastings and Rye (Mrs. Lait) remarked extensively on the importance of road schemes in their localities. The hon. Gentleman will be aware that the statutory orders for the scheme with which he is concerned have been made. Construction is not due to commence in the current financial year, but is a priority in the programme, and it is being considered in the review announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State in August. At this stage, I cannot pre-empt the results of that review, which are due to be announced early in the new year.

Progress on a number of schemes in the Hastings area—where there are currently five schemes in the national road programme for improving various stretches of the A21—will greatly depend on the time needed for the statutory procedures. My right hon. Friend recently announced a package of measures to cut the time that it takes to progress new roads, and it is hoped that the A21 and A259 schemes mentioned by my hon. Friend will benefit from those proposals.

The hon. Member for Falkirk, East (Mr. Connarty) commented on the tightening up of the orange badge scheme, and I will draw his remarks to the attention of my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Transport and for Scotland.

My hon. Friend the Member for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold) raised a large number of matters relating to his constituency—in particular, those arising from the channel tunnel rail link, which he also raised in an Adjournment debate a month or so ago. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has promised that the Government will take full account of the comments of my hon. Friend and those of Gravesham council in reaching decisions. I have no doubt that they will carefully consider the points that my hon. Friend made today.

The Government share his view that it is unacceptable for local authorities to seek to obstruct or to undermine the case for grant-maintained status through the dissemination of inaccurate or partisan information. I urge my hon. Friend to draw to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State the information that he revealed today.

Mr. Jacques Arnold: I have done so.

Mr. Newton: I am glad to learn that.

I am about to run out of time, so I will not add much to the comments of my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security in last night's Adjournment debate on the Child Support Agency, when he acknowledged genuine concerns and the need to investigate them, as Ministers are doing—which the hon. Member for Warley, West (Mr. Spellar) might have acknowledged.

I assure all those right hon. and hon. Members to whose speeches I have not been able to respond that their messages will be faithfully transmitted, and I hope that they will receive an appropriate response——

It being three hours after the commencement of proceedings on the motion, MR. DEPUTY SPEAKER put the Question necessary to dispose of proceedings, pursuant to Standing Order No. 22 (Periodic Adjournments).

Resolved,

That this House, at its rising on Friday 17th December, do adjourn until Tuesday 11th January.

Transport (South-east London)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Kirkhope.]

12.44 pm

Mr. David Evennett (Erith and Crayford): Naturally, I am pleased to be able to raise the subject of transport in south-east London this afternoon. It is a matter of great importance for my constituents, and I know from discussions with my colleagues in south-east London and north-west Kent that it is one which features heavily in their constituency correspondence.

One of the most vocal critics of our poor transport service has been my hon. Friend the Member for Dartford (Mr. Dunn)—my good friend and neighbour. Unfortunately, he is unable to be with us for this debate as he has a long-standing and pressing constituency engagement. Nevertheless, I am sure that he will read the proceedings closely and with great interest. His constituents and mine share many of the same problems. However, I am delighted to see my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley) in his place—he will participate in the debate as well. Similarly, the hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Raynsford) shares the same transport problems as we all do in south-east London.

I have raised the issue on many occasions in debates, questions and meetings with various Ministers at the Department. But I regret to advise that to date there has been relatively little improvement in transport provision in our area. Today, I do not want merely to highlight the inadequacy of transport in south-east London, nor to speak only on behalf of the hard-pressed local commuters, although I intend to speak on those matters. I want to range widely over both road and rail transport problems in our area. There are major concerns.

At the outset, I must say that I share the concerns of my constituents and experience the same problems as I journey from my home in Crayford to Westminster either by road or rail. At the start, I shall be positive and thank my hon. Friend the Minister for his recent visit to my constituency to see at first hand both the local problems and the considerable potential in our area. The visit was much appreciated by all involved.

Regrettably, as we told the Minister during his visit, many people in my area feel that the Government do not have a coherent strategy for transport in south-east London. While applauding in general terms the Government's aims to increase road building and to improve railway services through increased expenditure and a coherent strategy nationally, we feel somewhat neglected in our area. There appears to be no real rail strategy, and no road strategy either.

I am grateful for the support of my hon. Friend the Member for Bexleyheath (Mr. Townsend), who is in his place, in discussions that we had with the Department. When one looks at the increased number of new Networker trains now starting to operate on Network SouthEast in north Kent and south-east London, I am sure that all hon. Members will be encouraged and delighted. However, if one is travelling every day from Crayford station, Erith station, Barnehurst or Bexleyheath, and is subject to delays, cancellations and overcrowding on a regular basis, the individual traveller sees little benefit and questions the strategy of British Rail. Similarly, if one is travelling to London to shop, to a film, to the theatre, travelling to visit friends or relatives, going on holiday or whatever, the service provided on the British Rail lines through my constituency and the borough of Bexley in general is extremely bad.

My postbag regularly contains horror stories from my constituents about late, poor or non-existent services. To add insult to injury, already hard-pressed travellers and commuters in my constituency face a large increase of 8 per cent. on the cost of their fares from 1 January.

Commuters from Bexley are justifiably angry at having to pay for an increase far above the inflation rate. They commend the Government on keeping inflation so low but criticise British Rail for putting up fares so much. They are irritated at having to pay so much more for an inadequate and appalling service. People are late for work, appointments and social engagements simply because of British Rail's failure to deliver a first-class service.

In the mornings I listen to the radio—either Capital FM or my local community station, RTM Radio on 103·8 FM —which regularly lists cancellations on local services. RTM gives an excellent report each morning, highlighting both good and bad news for commuters and travellers. Regrettably, the news is too often bad.

British Rail may apologise, and sometimes does. Occasionally it even informs the public. But in general its attitude is wrong and it appears unconcerned. New timetables have made the position worse and the decision to close Charing Cross station for rebuilding work for several weeks during the summer angered the travelling public even more and made the service even worse in August.

I have often raised the issue of British Rail in the House, even in Adjournment debates. I have met British Rail executives and taken up the issue of the poor value for money provided by British Rail with the Government and British Rail. Unfortunately, there has been little improvement. The fact that people travelling on commuter lines from south-east London and north-west Kent are still experiencing one of the worst services in the country is unacceptable. I hope that when British Rail is privatised and lines are franchised, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and my hon. Friend the Minister for Transport in London will look for more effective operators of our local railway service, because improvement is essential. We are putting our trust and hopes for the future in my hon. Friend and the Secretary of State.

Three railway lines serve my constituency. One runs along the river, through Abbey Wood, Belvedere, Erith and Slade Green en route to Dartford. The second goes through Bexleyheath and Barnehurst, located in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Bexleyheath. Those stations are well used by residents in my wards of Bostall and Crayford, and Northumberland Heath, as well as by my hon. Friend's constituents. The third line goes through

[Mr. David Evennett]

Sidcup and Bexley and serves Crayford—the town where I have a home. I regularly use Crayford station and know about the problems suffered by Crayford line travellers.

In theory, one would think that my constituents were well served by such a network of railway lines and collection of stations, yet in practice nothing could be further from the truth. At my regular surgery at Erith town hall on Friday evenings, my constituents tell me of the poor service and my postbag contains even more complaints. The existence of the hardware—trains, stations and tracks—does not make a good service by itself. British Rail should adopt a different approach to its customers. It needs a commitment to service, concern, and value for money for travellers. The citizens charter has had some effect and publicity clearly brings some results. This Adjournment debate has resulted in many groups contacting me and trying to put a gloss on their operations.

A letter from the divisional director of Nework SouthEast, Mr. Fearn, is indicative of some of the problems that we have been suffering. Mr. Fearn says that British Rail is providing 15 new Networker trains in daily service in our area and that customers have commented favourably on those trains. That is only natural when one compares them with the old cattle trucks that are used for the rest of the time. Anything would be an improvement on those. However, I admit that those trains are super and very good news.

Mr. Nick Raynsford (Greenwich): When they work.

Mr. Evennett: I endorse the comment by the hon. Member for Greenwich.

However, in our area we have no competition. Competition, publicity and private enterprise bring choice and better services for consumers.

Mr. Fearn's letter shows that the passengers charter has highlighted poor results in our area. It says:

"we fell short of the demanding train service punctuality standard set under the Passenger's Charter on Kent Link for the 12 months to 5 November. This has triggered a 5 per cent. discount payment on renewal of customers' season tickets."

The fact that BR failed to meet its requirements is well known to my constituents and those of other hon. Members.

One example of how Network SouthEast does not look after passengers is that it stopped the half-hourly Sunday service and substituted an hourly service on the Bexleyheath line and other lines in my area. Mr. Fearn's letter states:

"In terms of the timetable, we reinstated the Sunday half-hourly service on the North Kent and Bexleyheath lines to Dartford in October this year."

Those services should not have been cancelled in the first place. It is fine to say that those of us who campaigned to have the half-hourly service reinstated have had some success, but the half-hourly Sunday service should never have been cancelled. However, we welcome a sinner repenting.

On the issue of fares, Mr. Fearn's letter states that the number of fraudulent passengers has been reduced to less than 1 per cent. compared with 4 to 5 per cent. in the past. That is also good news. I learned from Mr. Fearn's letter that Erith and Slade Green stations are to receive major facelifts by next spring, subject, of course, to the contract being granted to private contractors. That is good news because Erith station has been in desperate need of restoration and refurbishment for many years, and the platform buildings at Slade Green need refurbishment.

South-east London suffers from the great disadvantage of the lack of choice. It has no underground network and in that respect it is the most underprivileged part of the metropolis.

Mr. Cyril D. Townsend (Bexleyheath): My hon. Friend puts his case superbly. Is he aware of the campaign that I and others have been running against the British Rail tactic of having no staff on stations in the evenings? For a public service that is disgraceful and downright dangerous.

Mr. Evennett: I thank my hon. Friend and endorse his comments. I am aware of his campaign and have supported it. He is right to demand a first-class service that passengers must at all times feel safe in using. In the absence of staff, severe problems could arise.

As I say, we in south-east London do not have an underground network and have to rely exclusively on British Rail. Not for us the choice and competition that exists, for example, in north-east London where there is real choice between various BR lines and a substantial underground network.

Many people in Erith and Crayford and in neighbouring areas in the south-east of London look with considerable interest to the extension of the Jubilee line to south-east London. The 12-month delay in the go-ahead for this essential addition to our local transport network caused great local disappointment. I have followed the history of the proposal and I understand the difficulties that have been encountered, but, to say the least, the delay has been unfortunate.

My area needs the Jubilee line extension much more than the crossrail link is needed across northern London. Whatever our political persuasion, we all eagerly look forward to its completion and operation. It is the first step towards giving more choice to south-east London travellers. The Jubilee line extension is welcome and positive news.

Yesterday, I took part in the debate on the Budget, with which I was delighted. In his Budget speech my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor gave the go-ahead to the extension of the docklands light railway which will go south of the Thames to Lewisham. There is some movement, I am delighted to see, not only on the Jubilee line but with the extension to the docklands railway into south-east London. For that I must congratulate my hon. Friend The Minister for Transport in London and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport on the work that they have done in getting the finance and the go-ahead.

I am always disappointed that some Labour Members do not welcome such developments. They should, because we can always debate station locations or whatever once we have the principle and once the projects are up and running. I think that that is important.

I am grateful for the money that has been invested in London transport. The Economic Secretary to the Treasury mentioned a figure of £1·75 billion yesterday. That sum includes the cost of work on the Jubilee line and on the docklands extension. That is big money, and we are extremely grateful in south-east London for that development. It is something for which we have worked hard. My hon. Friends the Members for Eltham and for Bexleyheath have campaigned behind the scenes on the issue.

We want an improved and extended tube network. That is not a subject for debate today, and I will not go into the details of the enlarging of financing for the tube across London. I want to talk about subjects that relate to south-east London and are most important to my constituents.

I will say, however, that tube financing has again hit the headlines of The Evening Standard in today's lunchtime edition. The paper reports on capital expenditure and whether it should come from private or public funding, or from a mixture of both. I have to say that it is of no concern to my constituents whether the funding or ownership is public or private. They want a first-class service to which they have greater access and on which they can rely. I am disappointed with the headlines in The Evening Standard, because it is a first-class evening newspaper for the whole of London. I was rather disappointed that it should have taken that view. The funding is of no consequence to the travelling public in my constituency who want a first-class service.

Mr. Peter Bottomley (Eltham): It is probably fair to The Evening Standard to say that the editorial is rather more thoughtful. We should make the point that journalists respond in the same way as hon. Members. They should be patted on the back, and then one should pass over the headline.

Mr. Evennett: I thank my hon. Friend for his witty intervention, and I believe that my hon. Friend is a former journalist. I endorse what he said. The paper's editorials are read with great interest by a vast number of my constituents. The editorials are always well thought out, and I enjoy them. The headlines in today's paper are disappointing. I will leave the issue of the tube by saying that we want it in south-east London, we like it, but, at the moment, we ain't got it.

I wish to speak now about roads, a subject in which my hon. Friend the Minister is even more involved. One desperately needed improvement in our transport network in south-east London which was proposed was the building of the east London river crossing. As my hon. Friend knows following his recent visit, my constituents in Crayford and Erith are suffering the daily nuisance and disturbance of hundreds of heavy goods vehicles using suburban roads and the high streets.

Those roads are wholly inadequate to deal with the heavy burden of traffic, especially the large lorries which cause delays to traffic trying to negotiate town centres. It has also proved to be dangerous to other road users and to pedestrians. In particular, I am concerned about young children and the elderly who are put at the greatest risk by the juggernauts which go through, for example, the centre of Crayford and try to negotiate the one-way system there.

The lorries use residential roads to cut through from the industrial estates to make their way to the Dartford tunnel or the Blackwall tunnel. The latter, of course, is not large enough to cope with the volume of traffic that is travelling from south-east London across to east London, to Essex or to the M11 and destinations in East Anglia or the north.

The Queen Elizabeth bridge has made the traffic flow on the M25 much better. We all welcome that excellent addition to our road network in the area. But using the crossing point at Dartford puts many miles on the clock for those wishing to travel from south-east London up to the M11—and for those who wish to travel to the north circular and north London, who have to travel east before they can go north and west—and takes much longer because the number of such journeys adds to the traffic congestion.

I warmly welcome the recent statement by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State in a written answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham to the effect that the approach road to the proposed east London river crossing would not destroy any of Oxleas wood. Many people in my area campaigned vigorously to save that historic woodland. We all share the view that it is important to keep such woodlands and open spaces. It is excellent news that the woods are to be saved from destruction and that the motorway approach will not plough through that attractive area. Yet we in south-east London are left rather in limbo as a result of the decision.

I strongly urge my hon. Friend the Minister to reappraise the situation and examine alternative solutions to the problem. My constituents in Erith and Crayford would welcome an announcement from the Government about what they propose to do to deal with the traffic problems in our area. Is the east London river crossing to proceed, and if so, when? If not, what do the Government propose to do to improve traffic flow and alleviate traffic problems in south-east London?

Is my hon. Friend aware of the tremendous traffic pressure on the Blackwall tunnel and the A2, especially during the rush hour? I am sure he is. When the tunnel is closed for repairs or when an accident happens, the snarling up is tremendous. There are too many cars trying to gain access to too few river crossing points in our area. We need answers from my hon. Friend, and I urge him to review the position and perhaps suggest that some of his colleagues and officials in the Department try the commute from Crayford, using the A2 and the Blackwall tunnel, at around 8.15 in the morning, when they will see the snarl-up developing.

Perhaps my hon. Friend the Minister will also enlighten me about suggestions that we have read in the paper about the possibility of a new bridge at Blackwall to relieve some of the congestion. The existing tunnels are inadequate for the traffic that they serve. Moreover, they bend, and that slows down the flow of traffic.

As I said earlier, we were absolutely delighted when my hon. Friend the Minister for Transport in London visited my constituency and met Bexley council leader, Councillor Len Newton and his officials at the new Erith leisure centre. The centre, provided by the council, is an excellent amenity for the north of the Bexley borough. My hon. Friend came to discuss the problems of traffic and road transport in our locality. Having known him for many years, and being a friend of his, I am particularly grateful for the time and interest that he took, despite the inclement weather. Standing on the waterfront at Erith, my hon. Friend received a frosty welcome—not from the residents or council officials but from the weather. I am glad that he has had the opportunity to see at first hand the problems created by juggernauts using inadequate roads. My hon. Friend is now well briefed on Bexley's proposals and hopes and we await his decisions and actions in that respect.

Councillor Newton and I emphasised to my hon. Friend the concerns of the councillors and residents of Bexley about the ridiculous suggestion that the east London river crossing should go ahead and be built and that traffic should be allowed to flow along the Thamesmead spine road—the A2016. That would increase local congestion and add to the chaos and anger not only in Erith but in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Bexleyheath. Such a scheme would be a disaster for traffic management in our area. In addition, it would fail the basic test, which is that the east London crossing should be part of a strategic road network for south-east London. The Thamesmead spine road solution would increase problems rather than reducing them and is therefore a non-starter.

My hon. Friend also saw the problems caused by the traffic flow in Crayford town, and how that historic and residential town is being destroyed by the juggernauts, lorries, vans and cars which constantly thunder through the town centre, causing considerable congestion and potential hazard. When he was standing outside Crayford town hall in the bitterly cold weather, chatting to people at the local bus stop, my hon. Friend received first-hand experience of the problem.

We in south-east London know that there are great plans for the east Thames corridor. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment is keen to develop the potential of the area and we are keen for the corridor to go ahead. We are looking for more investment, factories, homes and jobs, and the regeneration of the riverside. In my constituency, both Thamesmead and Erith are ripe for such development.

The prospect of the corridor is exciting and challenging and offers much scope and potential. To realise that potential and to encourage industrialists, house builders and new residents to come into the area, we need a better transport network. That transport network must include substantial road and rail improvements, and an improvement in services is essential.

What is the key question for my hon. Friend the Minister? My constituents are growing impatient and I urge my hon. Friend to take action. All is not gloom and doom, because there have been positive signs on the underground, the docklands light railway, the Jubilee line and even British Rail, as described in the letter from the director that I highlighted earlier.

Another encouraging sign is that we have seen a considerable rise in bus service in the past few years. The Hoppa bus has been a tremendous success, and I praise the Kentish Bus Company. That company's depot is in my constituency, and I visited it recently. The service to local people has improved beyond belief. There are better buses, a more reliable service, cheerful and polite drivers—which is important for passengers—and better routes have been provided. I congratulate the Kentish Bus Company for the improved service.

Bus services are far better than they were, and many local people—particularly the elderly—are very grateful for the improved service which, together with their bus passes, is a real lifeline for many pensioners.

When I was a newly elected to the House 10 years ago, I received many letters from disgruntled passengers, whose buses never turned up or were always delayed and many of the staff were not as polite as they should have been. That has changed dramatically. The use of the Hoppa, which picks up people where they need to be picked up and ensures that they do not have to walk considerable distances to a main road bus stop, has been a great improvement for local residents. We have a large elderly population in Erith and Belvedere that is very grateful for the improved service that enables elderly people to get to the Bexleyheath shopping centre and elsewhere.

I thank my hon. Friend for the attention that he has given to that part of London. We can be proud to have such an effective Minister to deal with the problems of London, particularly problems of transport. I am sure that my hon. Friend's in-tray is full of suggestions from hon. Members who represent London constituencies and that he knows that there is still much to be done.

We need to improve the road and rail network across the south-east of London. I know that my hon. Friend understands the frustrations of travellers, the annoyance of local people and the concerns of hon. Members. I urge him to look at the problems of our part of London and to come forward with a strategy and proposals to solve them. I know that he will do it, we believe that he will do it, and I hope that he will do it very soon.

Mr. Peter Bottomley (Eltham): I congratulate my hon. Friend on not only arranging the Adjournment debate but on persuading the business managers to allow it to continue for longer than the usual half-hour. The issue of transport in south-east London deserves a lot of attention in Parliament and action on the ground.

I want to mention the most visible, frequent and popular form of transport—walking. We must remember that, whatever our interests as rail passengers, most of us get to railway stations on foot. Whatever our interests may be as car drivers or passengers or bus passengers, we normally walk to bus stops and make many journeys by foot. We must think of the journeys made by those who have no choice as they have no car in the garage or street and are forced to be pedestrians.

There was a remarkably sensible editorial in The Evening Standard. I rang up that newspaper this morning to congratulate it on a good editorial and article featured on Monday—I wrote the feature, but it was improved by another writer. The editorial in today's Evening Standard gets even more clearly to the heart of the issue of London Underground than we have to the issue of British Rail surface lines. If we had sustained capital investment in London Underground, it could run without subsidy after a few years, with the potential of increasing its capacity; the Government are providing help with crossrail, the Jubilee line and docklands light railway extensions.

As London becomes more prosperous—a world city building on financial expertise, flexibility, the fact that English is a common world language and the fact that it houses many universities—there will be less long-term unemployment, more people sharing in prosperity and more people with a choice in life. The key to achieving that aim is London Underground.

I wish to mention the centre of London before returning to the subject of south-east London. The most recent large line built in London is the Victoria line, which has been up to capacity between Victoria and Green Park. Most people do not want to change trains at Victoria or Green Park, but want to travel across London. That is where crossrail can help. My hon. Friend the Member for Erith and Crayford (Mr. Evennett) talked of crossings over the Thames.

There are fewer rail crossings over the Thames in east London than road crossings, which is why I want to redirect attention towards a proposal from the south-east London branch of Friends of the Earth for a rail tunnel at Woolwich. That tunnel would make it possible for people to make connections to Network SouthEast lines as well as to underground lines—a major improvement.

It will be interesting to listen to my hon. Friend the Minister's words on progress on the possible east London river crossing bridge and, in addition, to hear whether he will say who will consider the economic prospects, and the social and environmental benefits, of having a rail tunnel under the Thames at Woolwich.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Erith and Crayford for his words on Oxleas wood, which is currently not in my constituency. The independent impartial boundary commissioners propose to bring the ward which contains it into Eltham constituency. Shrewsbury ward is currently in the constituency of the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Austin-Walker), and I do not think that I am being controversial when I say that the greatest fuss is about the impact of the southern approach road. The issue of the bridge has successfully cleared two inquiries, but the proposal to wreck Oxleas wood did not clear either of them.

Where the route should go is a matter for discussion and debate. If one considers the route south of the M11, across the Thames where the proposed bridge might be, the road as previously proposed would have turned south-west towards Brighton. However, we all know that most traffic is trying to get to the channel ports which are to the south-east. Even if the Thamesmead spine route is not used, we should recognise that the economic reasons for the road going south-east are the same as the environmental ones. Although it will be difficult for Members of Parliament and residents of the Bexley area to accept, the road should go through Bexley rather than Eltham.

On the subject of pedestrians and buses, I echo what has been said about the flexibility of the development of London bus services, which I welcome. I also welcome the non-appearance of the total deregulation of London's buses, which marks a wise decision. The Select Committee on Transport considered the matter and made suggestions to the House and the Government. We need to make bus services more flexible. London Buses has much to contribute, but I do not believe that it will run many buses directly. It is the advantages of tendering and flexibility that matter.

I shall now give an illustrative example of local people's interests. In Middle Park avenue, on the Middle Park estate, which is in my constituency, there is what could be described as a rat run. If it is not a rat run, it is a tempting run, through which people drive their vehicles too fast. It is a prime candidate for traffic calming. I am sad that London Buses objects to bringing in some traffic-calming measures on the ground that if they were made, it would not run its buses through the estate. In other parts of England, I have seen bus operators perfectly content to negotiate traffic-calming features of one kind or another. I would ask the people in London Buses, and the emergency services, to stop being so stupid in saying a flat no to suggestions on behalf of local residents. Too many of London's casualties are pedestrians and local people who are hit by vehicles driven by local people and outsiders.

Slowing the speed of traffic has contributed to bringing the present total number of road deaths to below half the peak level, even though traffic has increased and will continue to increase. I ask bus operators and the emergency services to do all they can to find a way forward, rather than digging out the historic negative that one cannot do something in a new way, because it has never been done in that way before.

I echo what has been said about the benefits to London of having my hon. Friend the Member for Epping Forest (Mr. Norris) as the Minister of Transport in London. It is good to have a Minister for Transport in London, but it is even better that it is my hon. Friend, who has a constituency interest in London and a background in the transport industries.

One reason why road traffic flows in London is the helpful work of the police. Most of their work is in keeping traffic flowing, but there is a problem and I hope that the Select Committee on Transport will make inquiries, both of the Home Office and of the Department of Transport.

In general, traffic policy is settled by the Department of Transport. Some of the budgets are held by the Home Office. The police, on their performance indicators, will normally be judged on crime, and traffic will not get much of a look-in. That applies also to capital investment in virtually automatic technology, such as speed cameras and cameras to detect red light jumping, and to a variety of ways in which technology can be of value.

It is important to try to get rid of the rumour that the people in the traffic branches of the Metropolitan police are called black rats, because they are down a sewer and never seen. They should be out in the open, getting respect for their professional expertise and being honoured for the dangerous work that they do. Stopping vehicles or attending scenes of car crashes on busy roads is a dangerous business; it can be as dangerous as it is on the motorways. I hope that that matter will get attention at New Scotland Yard, the Home Office and the Department of Transport.

We are in the same situation we were in seven years ago, when I was at the Department of Transport, on the question whether local authorities can be trusted to use new technology, or even old technology, to enforce rules on parking on yellow lines. I am not asking my hon. Friend for a detailed response on that matter, but wish to flag it as a matter of significant concern.

Rail investment matters both above and below ground, Denis Tunnicliffe at London Underground was very open in praising Ministers before the last election on their commitment to getting a level of investment that would allow a decent, modern metro to be maintained and extended. I am sure that hon. Members will want to recognise the efforts made by Transport Ministers in the collegiate discussions with the Treasury over the budget level in a difficult financial year.

We are not spending enough. I do not believe that we should draw too many lessons from the Central line power failure, because that was unusual, and the Central line has had £700 million of capital investment in addition, that line does not come into south-east London, as was pointed out by my hon. Friend the Member for Erith and Crayford. If we can get tube links into south-east London, which will require some capital investment, that will be good.

On the surface, when will aproval be given for the doubling up of the rail tracks at Borough Market junction? Anyone who looks towards Westminster from the 29th floor of Guy's hospital will see the bottleneck that stops Thameslink services going through London Bridge. Four times as many people want the service to go through London Bridge as want it to go through the Elephant and Castle. That is the key to all the Kent line services. I do not expect my hon. Friend the Minister to come up today with a detailed policy statement, but I want him to say to those to whom he talks that there will be constant, persistent, consistent pressure, because that is the key to getting the best value for other investments in the Kent services.

Let me return to the subject of the rail lines going through the south-east constituencies. The main channels of communication go along the railway line. They unite Greenwich and Woolwich, as I was saying to the Local Government Boundary Commission inquiry in my constituency recently. They unite Kidbrooke and Eltham. No doubt my colleague, the hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Raynsford) will say something on that subject as well. The roads performs the same function. Watling street, the A2, or the Old Dover road—part of it, by the Royal Standard, is still called the Old Dover road—is a natural way of uniting constituencies, at least in the borough of Greenwich.

I hope that, when the House considers those proposals, it will look at the transport links and decide that if Shooters hill and Shooters Hill road are used as the division, that will make it possible for hon. Members to represent their constituents' transport interests in the House. I look forward to doing that for some years to come, representing Eltham and making sure that my hon. Friend keeps his ministerial job going well.

If we get better safety provisions for pedestrians, cyclists and motor cyclists, some access to allow those using cars to commute to central London—although not too many—and improved rail services and choices, we will be able to make sure that London transport contributes to the quality of life in London rather than detracting from it.

1.26 pm

Mr. Bridget Prentice (Lewisham, East): I congratulate the hon. Member for Erith and Crayford (Mr. Evennett) on achieving an Adjournment debate on a subject that must be dear to everyone—not just those who represent south-east London—who has to find his or her way from it by road or rail. We do not yet have the sophistication of the tube line, as the hon. Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley) pointed out.

It is important that we accept the principle of a high-quality public transport system, for two good reasons —one economic and one social. The economic reason is that if we are to get the people of south-east London to the centre of London or elsewhere so that they can participate in the prosperity that we hope that a capital city such as London will achieve, we need a good transport network. If we want the tourism of a capital city such as London to develop and enhance the city, we need excellent transport services. If we want serious reductions in unemployment —if we are beginning to see some reduction in unemployment, it is only by 0·5 per cent. in my consitituency—we need to ensure that people can move about the city.

The vast majority of people who use the buses are women who are tied to their homes through having young families or who have part-time jobs, the elderly, people with disabilities and children of school age, particularly those of secondary school age. For that social reason, it is important that we have a proper and systematic system working throughout the capital but particularly in the south-east, which has been cut off from the rest of London because of defects in the transport system.

I shall now spend some time bemoaning the state of British Rail and Network SouthEast. I know that other hon. Members will join me in that, because those of us who have to travel on those trains know that they are dirty and overcrowded, with trains being cancelled and delayed. The Kent link and the Kent coast line have the worst punctuality record of all the London lines. We have already accepted that we have a poorer transport system than elsewhere, but we also have the worst service. One in five trains is routinely late and delays and cancellations have exasperated and frustrated commuters for as many years as I can remember. When I travelled in this morning, I did not leave as normal from Hither Green, but left from Catford Bridge and, of course, once again the train was late. Although it was not at peak hour, the train was still quite crowded.

It is illogical that Ministers or British Rail believes that the reduction in the number of people travelling into the centre of London because of the rise in unemployment during the recession is an excuse for removing huge numbers of trains. Will the Minister tell us, now that, according to the Government, we are coming out of recession, whether there will be more trains on the timetable rather than fewer trains? I doubt it.

No doubt the Minister will talk about the Networker trains and how wonderful they are. They are much cleaner, brighter and smoother than the old, rickety trains to which we are used. However, they too have had problems. Doors have malfunctioned and elderly people in my constituency have had difficulties boarding them. I hope that that will be considered and that some redesign is possible to remedy that fault.

The hon. Member for Eltham mentioned the problems that we face in south-east London over the lack of decision on the channel tunnel, which has been going on for many years. Houses down that line are blighted. I am deeply concerned that, in my constituency, two of the major areas, Grove Park and Hither Green, will be affected as long as Waterloo remains the terminal. I know that residents in streets such as Millborough crescent and Springbank road are already under siege because they feel that their properties have been devalued. When we heard that the line was to be changed to run along the east London corridor, there was great relief. Unfortunately, the issue has been thrown back into the pot and it appears that, for several years to come, those constituents will suffer because there will be fewer trains to take them into central London and much heavier use of the track by channel tunnel trains. I should like to be able to reassure my constituents that the Minister thinks that is not likely to happen.

My hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, West (Mr. Dowd) and I were probably the only hon. Members who gave a small cheer during the Budget debate when the Chancellor said that the docklands light railway was to come to Lewisham. The rest of the House was relatively quiet at the time and it may have sounded rather odd that the Chancellor's only support for that announcement came from the Opposition Benches. However, I am glad that it was only a small cheer, because I received a letter yesterday from the Department of the Environment. It states:

"The approval we have given remains subject to the condition that no Government grant will be made available."

That leaves so much uncertainty that we are concerned about whether the whole proposal will eventually go through. I know that the Minister is visiting Lewisham on Monday to look at the plans. I hope that he can confirm that a target date will be set and that the DLR will go ahead. I know that controversy surrounds the scheme, because, for that to happen, other stations on the line may have to be closed, which may not please people elsewhere.

We conducted a survey on British Rail in my constituency during July and August this year. It was not a straightforward survey which we carried out by standing on the platforms while people waited for cancelled and delayed trains. We did not ask them merely to say yes or no to a series of questions. We handed the questionnaire to people and then let them get on to their trains, once they had arrived. People had to post the completed questionnaires to me, which, as hon. Members know, was asking a lot of them. They had to make an extra effort to respond to the survey.

The results of the survey were horrifying. I received well over 300 replies in a couple of weeks. Three out of four people, in the past six months of travelling on British Rail trains through Lewisham, had experienced having to stand in the guard's van because the train was so overcrowded. Some 98 per cent. of those replying felt that their trains were overcrowded. Some 84 per cent. said that they could not get a seat and two out of three feared travelling at night. One of the main reasons for that fear is that there are no staff on the stations. Another aspect of that is that people have an opportunity to dodge fares. I pass through stations regularly and I come home with pockets full of tickets that I have not handed in to a member of staff. I may decorate a room with them one day as a way to use them up. Two thirds of those who replied feared travelling at night and two thirds felt that there should be more staff on duty.

Some Lewisham commuters went further and wrote letters to me explaining some of their more serious worries about the state of British Rail. One described the overall service as appalling, chaotic and perhaps even dangerous. We should all be worried if people travelling in the rush hour fear for their lives or fear injury because of the dangers caused by overcrowded trains.

Mr. Cyril D. Townsend: On the point about there being no staff on stations, the hon. Lady will be only too well aware that some ghastly sexual crimes have been committed on local railway lines. One of the risks of having no staff on stations is that if there is an incident on a train, there is no one to whom to report it. When I raised that matter with the authorities, I was told that people could ring stations in London and that there were cameras monitoring people. That is wholly unsatisfactory and puts at risk many of the travelling public. That should be unacceptable in this day and age.

Mrs. Prentice: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for making that intervention; he is right. The lack of staff especially affects women, although not only women. A number of people wrote to me saying that they did not fear travelling at night because they simply did not travel at night any more. They will not travel by train in the evening because of their fears, so they travel by taxi or by minicab instead. It is nonsense for people to be turned away from a public transport system because they fear for their safety. Having staff on stations is crucial for that reason, and is also important in terms of giving people information.

With the changes in the timetable in the past year, there are stations in south-east London and in Kent where there are no staff on duty. If a passenger misses a train by one or two minutes, he or she may wait on his own for almost an hour because a station is unstaffed. Unfortunately, even in the middle of the day, that is not a pleasant experience in this day and age. I hope that British Rail will heed the needs of passengers in south-east London.

Some respondents have been travelling on British Rail for 40 years. They say that the service has never been so insultingly bad as it is at present.

One wrote:

"I cannot remember when I last had a seat on a rush-hour train out of Lewisham . . . Cancellation and late running are not the main problem, though the situation is far from ideal. The main problem is that with each new timetable a few more services have disappeared and that the remaining trains are shorter."

British Rail is suffering from inadequate investment in south-east London. People wanting to travel to work in a positive frame of mind arrive at their offices, factories or shops feeling frustrated, stressed and under considerable tension as a result of travelling into central London.

I welcome the news that there is to be no deregulation of London's buses, but I am extremely concerned that the Government are still going headlong into privatisation, which is causing considerable anxiety to members of the public who rely on bus services to get around.

I have written many letters to the Minister on behalf of constituents about the travelcard. I know that he said that its future is safe, but we cannot be convinced of that. I hope that the Minister will reiterate today that the travelcard will remain in existence, come hell or high water.

I remember the right hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major) speaking some time ago about motorway coning and saying all that would be stopped when he became Prime Minister. Has the Minister ever thought of holding a national no roadworks day, on which motorists could use the roads without having to skirt cones, barriers and other obstacles? Will he at least suggest to the utilities—British Gas, British Telecommunications and London Electricity —that they consult so that, if they must dig up a particular road, they all do so the same day, instead of digging it up separately week after week? I am sure that central London's car users would greatly appreciate such an arrangement. Perhaps there could be at least a London no roadworks day, later extended to other parts of the country.

I would normally say that one could drive a bus through Government transport policies, but I fear that the bus would be snarled up in the jam on the south circular. This debate has provided a useful opportunity to inform the Minister of problems encountered by rail commuters and others in south-east London. I know that the phrase "an integrated transport policy" sends civil servants into paroxysms, but perhaps the Minister will ensure not only that British Rail is the subject of proper investment and considers the passenger to be of paramount importance but that roads and bus services are considered as part of an overall strategic plan for south-east London travel. The Government should also get their act together in respect of the channel tunnel, so that my constituents using the line from Hither Green down to Kent stations will not suffer from its heavier use by channel tunnel trains on which they will not be able to commute.

1.48 pm

Mr. Nick Raynsford (Greenwich): I also congratulate the hon. Member for Erith and Crayford (Mr. Evennett) on his good fortune in being called for today's debate, particularly since it has allowed relatively full discussion compared with the normally short Adjournment debate. I congratulate him also on his good choice of subject. He selected a topic of real concern to all right hon. and hon. Members who represent south-east London constituencies. It is noticeable that in today's debate we have heard a unanimous expression of concern from both sides of the House about the serious problems that exist and the way in which people in south-east London are badly served by current transport arrangements.

Network SouthEast traditionally has been the main transport service for south-east London. It has, I am afraid, an unenviable record which has been mentioned by every speaker who has contributed to the debate. Its punctuality record for the past year, is, as my hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, East (Mrs. Prentice) pointed out, the worst of all the Network SouthEast regions, with the possible exception of Thames, which just about matches the failure of Network SouthEast on punctuality.

The written answer that I received a couple of weeks ago, giving the latest figures, shows that in the most recent period, up to 5 November this year, only 79·9 per cent. of services arrived reasonably punctually on the Kent coast line and only 78·2 per cent. on the Kent link line. On both the Kent coast line and Kent link services, fewer than one in five trains routinely arrive on time, against targets—which are not especially ambitious—of 82 per cent. for the Kent coast line and 88 per cent. for the Kent link. That record of unpunctuality is a daily experience for my constituents and those of every other hon. Member who represents south-east London.

I shall now quote from a letter that was sent to me on 26 November by a constituent who also happens to work for ITN. I hope that he will have some influence on coverage of the issue.

"In the past three weeks literally not a single train that I have tried to take has been on time. Many have been delayed by more than 15 minutes, others are cancelled altogether.

I have written so often to the Network Customer Service Manager that my letters are now ignored—I have not had a reply to the last four anyway."

No trains and no replies to his letters—what an appalling record.

In the past, those problems have been attributed to the poor condition of the old, out-dated rolling stock that people have to travel in on the Kent link and Kent coast services. Now the new Networkers are being introduced. We were promised that their introduction would be the solution; they would be modern, comfortable and reliable and we would all have a more attractive and pleasant rail service to and from London.

I agree with the hon. Member for Erith and Crayford that the Networkers are fine when they work, but unfortunately they do not work all that often. For a brand new supply of rolling stock, it is astonishing how many of my constituents—and, I expect, constituents of other hon. Members—have had to write with descriptions of lengthy delays that occur while the doors are made to work. The doors jam, apparently, if passengers lean against them. It seems extraordinary, in 1993, after getting on for two centuries of experience of building rolling stock, that it is impossible to design and build trains whose doors do not jam if passengers lean against them.

I hope that the Minister can give us some sort of answer as to when we can expect those problems to be sorted out and when Network South-East will run trains whose doors open reliably and do not cause the type of problems and delays that we have come across. I must also ask him for an indication of when Network SouthEast will achieve a reasonable target performance, given the abject failure to which I have referred. It is reasonable for us to expect that at least 90 per cent. of trains arrive punctually as a matter of course. When can we expect even that rather modest target performance to be achieved?

Investment in the rail service is crucial. There is an urgent need for increased investment, not just in new rolling stock, but in improved signalling and track. The hon. Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley) rightly referred to the bottleneck on the approach to London bridge. That has been a serious problem and it has to be tackled. I ask the Minister, when can we expect that problem to be resolved? Secondly, can we expect any progress on the other rail investment issue that was mentioned by the hon. Member for Eltham—the rail crossing at Woolwich, which would serve a very useful purpose, linking the Kent services with north London and, in the course of so doing, making it possible to run an orbital service around the whole of London? We hear about the problems and the appalling congestion on the M25, but the link at Woolwich offers the opportunity of an orbital rail service around London. When can we expect any news about the possibility of progress on that issue?

My hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, East asked about the channel tunnel. When will the uncertainty end, and when can we expect the high-speed link to be operational? That is one of the most disgracefully delayed features of investment in British Rail's infrastructure in the last decade. It may not appear to be directly relevant to south-east London, but, in the absence of a dedicated high-speed rail link, the rail network between London and the Kent ports has to be used to accommodate passenger and freight traffic to and from the channel tunnel.

It is clear that Network SouthEast is having to change the programming of local services to accommodate additional traffic that will come from the channel tunnel. That was brought to my attention by the Blackheath Society, which is concerned about changes to the timetabling of trains at Blackheath and about the fact that the two trains an hour that run through Blackheath at off-peak times are leaving the station in close proximity to each other. It has reasonably asked that the times should be spaced out at a more reasonable interval, but it was told by Network SouthEast that it was not possible because of the channel tunnel.

I did not believe that, so I took the matter up with Network SouthEast. It replied:

"I can understand your frustration at the current situation affecting users of Blackheath Station, the spacing of services is clearly not ideal.

The current timetable has pathways built into it for Channel Tunnel services. The decision to introduce this in advance of the tunnel opening was taken to enable us to iron out any problems before the new trains take up their pathways."

Network SouthEast obviously requires a great deal of time to iron out problems as the current timetable has already been operational for some months.

"At the time this decision was taken and the timetable process activitated the Channel Tunnel was due to open in May 1993, this date has now of course been postponed. The inclusion of these pathways entailed a complete rewrite of the timetable with both Network SouthEast, European Passenger Services and Railfreight Distributions aspirations to be catered for. British Rail's main commitment was that there would be no curtailment of Network SouthEast services but clearly there would have to be timing changes with considerably more services than in previous years approaching and leaving the London area."

There we have it—our services will be squeezed even more because of the need to accommodate channel tunnel traffic. Given the likelihood of yet further delay in the construction of the dedicated high-speed link to the channel tunnel, that is likely to be a continuing frustration and problem. As the hon. Member for Eltham said, with the congestion at the approach to London bridge and the difficulty in accommodating the existing volume of traffic, heaven knows what the consequences of a substantial additional volume of traffic from the channel ports will be. Therefore, when can we expect the high-speed link to be operational?

The London underground has not been available to south-east London. It has been south-east London's traditional complaint that the underground has passed it by. I suppose that we should raise half a cheer for the news that the Jubilee line and docklands light railway extensions may be coming to south-east London. It is only half a cheer because important questions remain unanswered about both.

There is the important question whether there will be a station on the south-east London part of the Jubilee line. It is extraordinary that there is no commitment as yet—the Minister may be able to assure me that I am wrong—to build a station at north Greenwich, the one point on the Jubilee line that is in south-east London. It would be astonishing if there were a hole in the ground with a concrete box in it and underground trains passed through south-east London for the first time without stopping there. Will this be the fate of south-east London—the tube, at last, but it does not stop for us? Or will we get the worst scenario, which now appears to be under consideration —a park-and-ride facility for 1,000 cars on the north Greenwich site to fund the construction of the station?

The delay is for the same reason that delayed the Jubilee line for 18 months—the Government's insistence that there had to be a contribution from the private sector towards its construction.

We all know about the nonsense of the Olympia and York contributions. Supposedly, it was £400 million but that has gradually reduced. As my hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) revealed in the House yesterday, it is probably worth no more than £200 million now because of the phasing negotiated with the Government by the bankers acting for Olympia and York. At least that problem is supposedly resolved.

In the case of North Greenwich station, there is no resolution. I understand that British Gas is reluctant to meet the Government's request for £25 million for the station. That is not surprising, given that the same Department of Transport is proposing to cut a significant part of the development site with its bridge across the Thames at Blackwall. While the negotiations continue, there is uncertainty about the station. The latest proposal I have heard is that there might be a park-and-ride facility for 1,000 cars to provide the money that British Gas will not produce. If that were so, it would be an outrage.

The area is already grossly overcongested with traffic. To attract a substantial additional volume of commuter traffic into the area simply to pay for the rail link will be a gross disservice. It will not only adversely affect the environment of everyone living in that part of south-east London but ultimately blight the future development of the peninsula. It will be a case of infrastructure investment not assisting development, as most of us believe it should be doing, but distorting future development and creating a pattern that is incompatible with the sort of development that most of us want to enhance and improve our local environment.

If the Jubilee line station is a problem, the docklands light railway station is an even greater one. We have the supposed announcement of the extension of the docklands light railway accompanied by some interesting figures. The Budget statement announced that a project that was supposed to cost £140 million will now cost £100 million. I grant that the Minister is not responsible for that. It is extraordinary that he is not responsible. It is an amazing comment on transport policy under this Government that the Department of the Environment is now responsible for the docklands light railway. What a way to run a transport system.

The Government are now saying that the scheme will cost only £100 million, rather than £140 million previously estimated. Like many other hon. Members who have been troubled by the failure of the original section of the docklands light railway to provide a reliable and dependable service, I am naturally concerned about the reduction in cost. Is this another example of cheeseparing leading possibly to malfunction and breakdown of the service? So there is a big question there.

It seems likely that the real saving, so far as one can identify it, is from a decision to drop two stations from the docklands light railway extension, respectively at Island Gardens and Greenwich Cutty Sark. I am still waiting for answers to the questions that I put to the Department on this matter. But the only explanation appears to be that the cost is such that the two stations must be dropped. What a way to plan a rail system. Stations that were to provide an important access point to people using the facility must be dropped, supposedly because they cannot be financed.

It is not a question of the scheme not having extremely favourable cost benefit implications. All the financial analysis suggests that it will be one of the most profitable rail investment projects that is feasible. We notice that the Secretary of State for the Environment, in his press release, talked about the great benefits of the scheme. He said that it would help attract tourists to Greenwich. It is astonishing that in the same breath he should be praising the merits of the scheme for bringing tourists to Greenwich when he is proposing to drop the station that would serve tourists who want access to Greenwich town centre. It is nonsense. I am only sorry that the Minister will not be in a position to answer my questions, as the matter is not within his responsibilities.

The people of Greenwich are feeling sore. They will get a glimpse of two quasi-underground services—the Jubilee line and the docklands light railway—apparently without any new stations. What an extraordinary fate and what a way to plan rail infrastructure investment. It has been planned to serve not the public but merely the whims of the market on the basis that, if a private developer does not stump up the money, we cannot have our station. Such thinking is symptomatic of everything that is wrong with transport planning.

This morning, we learnt that the Government plan to sell London's underground. It is typical of the Government that such a decision is announced not in an election manifesto or a ministerial statement to the House but simply in a newspaper report that says that the Government have now decided to sell London Transport. It is a wonderful sense of timing, just after two weeks that must have done everything possible to encourage potential buyers that it is an attractive prospect. In the past two weeks, we have seen the worst chaos of London Transport in memory, with a massive power failure that halted the entire Central line for five days. Apparently, the cable concerned is 70 years old. Yesterday, we were told of the extraordinary experiments being run by London Underground on driverless trains.

The news raises the question about whether the sale is designed to save money rather than improve the quality of the service. But this blinkered vision—I hesitate to say "tunnel vision" because it would be an inappropriate pun —puts all the emphasis on a commercial approach and is typical of the Government. Their policy is sell, sell, sell and, if the thing cannot be made to work, sell it to someone else. It is a deplorable surrender of responsibility. The Government are washing their hands of their responsibility to deliver a proper service to Londoners. It is the product of political dogma seized on by a desperate Government, who have failed lamentably to look after Londoners' transport interests. Incidentally, they have reneged disgracefully on their election pledges to provide desperately needed increased investment in London Underground, a point which the Opposition will continue to make in the months ahead.

We also notice that the Government have abandoned their manifesto pledges on London's buses. The manifesto pledged to deregulate London's buses and I admit that we welcome the abandonment of that pledge. However, it has only a limited advantage because the Government are proceeding with their other ideological predilection—privatisation. We shall therefore see a privatisation exercise involving net cost tendering, which raises questions about the continuation of services in areas where they may not be commercially viable.

We all knew about the problems that would be caused by deregulation—chaos in central areas, excessive interest in profitable routes and, consequently, a great deal of traffic congestion and problems. But one of the problems associated with net cost tendering is the disappearance of many less profitable services in areas where whoever seeks to take on the routes simply cannot run them viably.

The subsidy provision for London Buses in the current year is some 50 per cent. less than it was last year—some £52 million as against £100 million in 1992-93. We do not yet have figures for the revenue support grant for next year. If that downward trend in subsidy continues, a question hangs over whether those unprofitable services can be run in a framework in which the Government are going for net cost tendering. What will happen if a contractor takes on an unviable service, says "We shall try it", and then finds that it cannot make money. If the line does not provide adequate returns, will they say, "We are sorry but we cannot run that service any more"? How will those services be sustained under a privatised framework? I hope that the Minister will answer because we are worried that, following privatisation, the number of services in some parts of London, particularly the south-east where routes are far from profitable, will be seriously reduced.

My hon. Friend the Member for Lewisham, East asked about the travelcard. I simply endorse her concern that the travelcard must remain available. It is all very well for Ministers to say that they will continue with the travelcard, but can they guarantee that it will continue to be available on the same terms and at the same real cost, without a huge increase in price?

Many of us are concerned that even if a token travelcard continues to be available, a rapid and considerable increase in cost will take away a great deal of its value.

I have spoken mainly about public transport and I shall now turn to vehicular traffic in south-east London, which is causing serious problems. Traffic congestion in south-east London must be among the worst in any part of the capital, as those of us who travel through the hopelessly congested main routes into London and some of the smaller routes which are extensively used as rat runs, know all too well. The consequences of such congestion in terms of atmospheric pollution and the health hazards that flow from it are serious.

It is no coincidence that there is an above-average incidence of asthma, especially among children in south-east London. That together with the figures for the increased emissions of NOx and carbon monoxide and the atmospheric pollution from industrial sources that south-east London unfortunately suffers, constitutes a real health hazard for people there. Against that background, it is worrying that the Government still seem preoccupied with road building and investment in new road infrastructure rather than in improving and extending the public transport network.

Some hon. Members have spoken about the decision to abandon a ridiculous proposal to bulldoze Oxleas wood as part of the east London river crossing scheme. I hope that the Minister will give a categorical assurance that there will be no reappearance of the ill-fated scheme to drive a road anywhere near that part of south-east London which already suffers excessive traffic volumes and atmospheric pollution. The damage that would be caused to parts of Plumstead and the areas around Oxleas wood would be just as unacceptable as the damage to the wood itself.

There is severe congestion at Blackwall, and the Department of Transport is right to look at a third crossing to relieve it. The bridge that the Minister appears to favour has certain cost and speed of construction advantages, but a high-level bridge would have serious environmental consequences. Has a low-level bridge with a facility for it to be opened for ships on the Thames been considered? Would such a bridge be feasible and would not it cause less environmental damage than the current proposal?

More parochially, in the interests of my consituency, what is the possibility of exploring a scheme to divert through traffic from the historic town centre of Greenwich? Everyone who knows the area is aware of its enormous architectural importance and of the damage being caused by the volume of heavy traffic through the area. Progress is being made on a scheme, which I hope the Department of Transport will endorse, for a heavy goods vehicle ban in the town centre. That would be a step forward but to solve the problem we need a proper bypass to keep traffic out of the town centre. Will the Department encourage work reasonably soon at least to study that option?

We have had a wide-ranging and important debate on an issue of enormous concern to all hon. Members who represent south-east London constituencies. The situation is intolerable and the people of south-east London are ill-served by current policies and transport systems. We shall continue to highlight those failures and will press the Government to change their policy in important areas and increase investment in public transport. As concern has been expressed by hon. Members in all parts of the House, I hope that the Minister will deliver some good news and will fight to ensure improved traffic provision and arrangements in south-east London.

2.10 pm

Mr. Jim Dowd (Lewisham, West): May I first apologise to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, and to other hon. Members? I had intended to be here for the whole debate, and I congratulate the hon. Member for Erith and Crayford (Mr. Evennett) on getting not just the Adjournment debate but a particularly elongated version. Unfortunately, my plans this morning went awry as I am sure hon. Members will appreciate. It was nothing to do with British Rail, but I did not get here at the time I expected.

I am grateful for the few moments in which I have been permitted to speak. Obviously, I shall restrict my comments to ground that I feel has not been covered and to which perhaps the Minister could respond. South-east London is particularly prone to problems with Network SouthEast, and people think that hon. Members from that area go on at disproportionate length about it. The reason for that is, as my hon. Friend the Member for Greenwich (Mr. Raynsford) said, that London underground is to all intents and purposes the north London underground. There are, I believe, 14 stations located south of the river out of a total of 260 stations. Apart from New Cross and New Cross Gate, there are none in south-east London at all.

Network SouthEast has been working hard recently to improve its performance, but, as has been made plain, it has had mixed results. It is also working hard on its public relations. I was present at a useful meeting at Bromley town hall with representatives from Bromley, Greenwich, Bexley, Croydon and Lewisham. The Minister's colleague, the Minister for Public Transport, was present and we found the meeting to be extremely useful.

The meeting heard a quite surprising number of relevations about cuts in services or what will, in effect, be cuts in services. Those revelations were made only through that forum, which was an entirely unofficial body. We heard of the problems that making slots available for channel tunnel traffic is likely to cause. We also heard of the details of the franchises that are ultimately to be let for services in the south-east. Will the temporary reductions, or the allegedly temporary reductions, in the normal commuter services for south-east London be made good in the years to come? Ultimately we all hope—if any of us are still alive at the time—that the dedicated link should relieve congestion through south-east London, and then we shall look to those services being returned.

Another area where the pressure for slots is having an effect is the reduction or the almost complete cancellation of the Thameslink service into south-east London. We have been told by Network SouthEast that all the slots are going to the Gatwick-Luton link. While that is perfectly reasonable in itself, I do not see why we in south-east London should lose all our Thameslink services. The service is immensely useful and it is important for south-east London. Why do all the services need to be sacrificed? A reduced service is better than no service at all. I would ask Network SouthEast to reconsider that.

My final points relate to the A205, which is part of the south circular road, for which the Minister's Department took responsibility some years ago. Its performance in charge of that route has been problematic, to put it at its mildest. It is a major route, although that part is little more than a disjointed series of highways and byways. The idea that it can be compared with the north circular road is erroneous. The north circular road has the characteristic of being a route in a way that the south circular does not.

Recent repairs, particularly those at Dulwich common, caused chaos throughout south-east London and not just in the immediate vicinity. People started to re-route their journeys into central London from a long way back. Will the Minister give any assurances on the stewardship of the A205? The red routing of the A205 is under public consultation at the moment and, regardless of people's attitudes, all local authorities are determined to co-operate with the traffic director to ensure that that is as beneficial as possible.

In conclusion, I will raise with the Minister a subject that I have raised before. Perhaps he will be able to say something about it again. It concerns where the Catford town centre relief road stands in the current order of events. There have been at least five different start dates for the scheme. I wonder whether we are still working to the same one that we were the last time the subject was raised. I believe that the start date was in the latter part of this year or the early part of next year. Those are just a few points, and I am grateful to hon. Members for allowing me to make them.

2.14 pm

The Minister for Transport in London (Mr. Steve Norris): I have been in this place on and off for about 10 years and I still have not a clue how it works. I came here briefed that my excellent hon. Friend the Member for Erith and Crayford (Mr. Evennet) and I might have to speak for two and a half hours between us. I now find, after an extraordinarily interesting debate, that I have to make about two and a half hours' worth of replies in about six minutes. I trust that the House will indulge me, therefore. I shall try to cover the major areas and if there are others that I leave untouched, I shall be happy to write to hon. Members on both sides of the House.

I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Erith and Crayford for initiating this important debate. He spoke extremely well. It was typical of him that when I went to Bexley recently to look at the problems, at his invitation —I am grateful to Councillor Len Newton and his colleagues for their hospitality to me and my colleagues —my hon. Friend was there with us the entire time. He is absolutely right that it was extremely cold and also that the visit was very useful. I am grateful to him for drawing my attention to the problems of his constituency. I try to get out and about in the city as much as I can. I know it pretty well, as do most hon. Members who have taken part in the debate, but there are always aspects that one needs to know better.

[Mr. Steve Norris]

I acknowledge the contribution of my hon. Friend the Member for Bexleyheath (Mr. Townsend): I will say a word or two later about staffing at stations. My hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley), a former transport Minister of great distinction, spoke with authority. The hon. Members for Greenwich (Mr. Raynsford), for Lewisham, East (Mrs. Prentice) and for Lewisham, West (Mr. Dowd) also spoke.

Let me just say to the hon. Member for Greenwich that I know that his hon. Friend the Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) regards having to speak on transport as something of a demotion, and I know that there is a lot of irritation in the shadow Cabinet about the fact that he, and not the Member for Kingston-upon-Hull, East (Mr. Prescott), whom Conservative Members all desperately miss, is no longer in charge of transport, but I hope that the hon. Member for Greenwich will not feel that he has been dealt too poor a hand by his colleagues. The way in which the Labour party works is pretty labyrinthine and impenetrable, and I do not know what kind of signals it is sending by having him demoted to shadowing me, but it is a personal pleasure to see him. I trust that he will stay on the Opposition Benches shadowing me for many years to come.

Mr. Raynsford: That is an old line.

Mr. Norris: It is a very old line, and all the better for that.

I am glad that there is real all-party agreement about our policy on buses which, I repeat is to proceed with privatisation, net cost tendering and the flexibility of routes. It is all extremely good stuff. Just to reassure Opposition Members, I should say that the prospect of deregulation remains firmly on track, although it may not be until the next Parliament that we engage upon the process.

To the hon. Member for Lewisham, East, let me say that I realise that it is all good knockabout political stuff for Opposition Members to question whether the travelcard will survive. I suppose that if I were in their shoes, I would do the same. It is good irresponsible stuff. There is not the slightest foundation in fact for the Opposition's allegations and there never has been. None the less, this is politics and most of us are over 21—embarrassingly so in my case—and I for one do not object to what is, after all, the stuff of politics.

Let me be serious, though, and say that there never was, and there is not, any threat whatever to the continuation, not just in name but in form and in substance—

Mr. Raynsford: And price?

Mr. Norris: And, indeed, as the hon. Gentleman says, in terms of price.

Mr. Raynsford: In real terms?

Mr. Norris: And in real terms. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will let me have a copy of the speech that he would like me to make. I said on one occasion in the Chamber that if it did not have such unfortunate antecedents I would ask the House to read my lips. I shall not proceed down that road.

Mr. Raynsford: Dangerous.

Mr. Norris: It is a fairly dangerous statement, as the hon. Gentleman says. None the less, this is a serious point.

Frankly, I have rather resented the fact that many people in London have been genuinely troubled by the rather irresponsible nonsense that has emanated from far too many Opposition Members, who have sought to question every aspect just to unsettle all those elderly people who really care about such issues—who have got quite worried because they have heard a Member of Parliament, no less, say, "Perhaps there will not be concessionary fares or a travelcard." Those people may not have the intelligence to read through the pretty obvious political signals. Opposition Members bear a heavy responsibility for taking that sort of approach. Let me make it clear once and for all, beyond peradventure, that there is no threat whatever to the travelcard or concessionary fare arrangements.

As to London Underground, I shall have to skirt over a great deal of what has been said today. The article in the Evening Standard is not so much a statement of policy as a statement of the fact that my dear old friend Dick Murray, transport correspondent of the Evening Standard, was faced with a blank page on a damp Friday morning and had to write something. It is all good stuff, but it is very wide of the mark.

I take this opportunity to make it quite clear that we have no plans, in the short or medium term, for the privatisation of the underground. What we do have is the breadth of vision to recognise that there are three sources that could help to finance the underground—passenger fares, grants from the hard-pressed taxpayer and the involvement of the private sector.

Like my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham I welcome the leader in the Evening Standard which—aside from the hyperbole, which sometimes went over the top—said that we ought to ask ourselves questions of this sort. It said, in a characteristically fair way, that the last thing one should do is to deride that approach or attack it on ideological grounds. It is a sensible proposition, so let us look at it.

The important thing that the leader in the Evening Standard said, and which I endorse, is that this is all about improving services to passengers. Passengers are all-important, and we must do nothing unless we are sure that it will deliver benefits to passengers—whether it is moving down the road to more private capital, or more taxpayers capital or doing something on fares.

I have looked at all the industries that have benefited from the introduction of private capital over the past 14 years, and a pretty clear case is made that we should introduce as many of those opportunities as possible. The form of introduction is still very much to be determined. It is too early to speculate on the idea of privatising the underground.

I am sure that all hon. Members are pleased that the Jubilee line extension has been given the go-ahead. As to the question about the North Greenwich station, I understand the point that the hon. Member for Greenwich has made. I think that the hon. Gentleman knows the political background to this—and I use the word "political" with a small "p". British Gas, as the major property holder in the area, is thinking very hard about how to develop the facility there. The Jubilee line scheme will proceed on the basis that the station is constructed—that is to say, the box will be built—and an arrangement will be arrived at with the developer to provide the station facility in due course.

It is in everyone's interest that that should be the case. I do not want the hon. Member for Greenwich further to denigrate the economic prospects of his own constituency and to cast further doubt on its economic viability. It is an extraordinary form of community politics to commit suicide on behalf of one's own constituents, as Opposition Members seem to do on many occasions. I will tell the constituents of Greenwich, if the hon. Member for Greenwich will not say it, that they will have a station that will serve them not for five years but for 150 years.

I am glad that the extension of the docklands light railway to Lewisham has been welcomed. It is right that the Department of the Environment is in the lead on this. As any sensible person would expect, I have been kept closely involved with its impact in transport terms. I am not the Minister in charge of the financing arrangements—which is not difficult for me to come to terms with—but I will continue to exercise considerable interest in the transport implications of the project, which is a very exciting one. I am always sad if a good development such as that which brings Lewisham into the city is not welcomed. Thank goodness that at least the hon. Members for Lewisham, West and for Lewisham, East, who should perhaps be able to say a word on the subject, appreciate the scheme.

I am delighted that the Chancellor was able to give the go-ahead to that project, which will be delivered in due course. The eventual mix of stations will be a matter for the private sector to decide in the sensible way expected of it. It is an obvious proposition to put stations where people are likely to board the trains. If one is in the business of selling a service, that seems to be a rather shrewd idea, which is good for passengers and revenue. We have had enough doom and gloom. Both the Jubilee line and the docklands light railway extensions are good news.

I want to talk about the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Erith and Crayford and the Kent link line. It is my hon. Friend's debate, and I apologise to him that so much of the debate has involved broader issues. London is receiving a large share of the rail investment—£800 million is being spent on the Kent link modernisation. We should like to spend even more, but we should not forget that in October British Rail announced its intention to operate 41 four-car units on operating leases from ABB, which will mean accelerated replacement of the Kent coast service trains.

As my hon. Friend rightly said, there is currently a problem with the rail service quality in his district. In view of the amount of money being spent, that is genuinely disappointing. I am sorry about that, as I am a great admirer of both British Rail managers and London transport managers who do a hard job, often in difficult circumstances.

I think that the issue raised by the hon. Member for Greenwich on the possibility of building trains with doors that open and shut as required is not a bad one. I am told that the fault has been identified and the staff are working 24 hours a day to correct it. I am sure that people are working seriously to do so, and that the hon. Gentleman would not want to be churlish, but would want to welcome those people's efforts. I am told that all the units should have been adjusted by Christmas. My hon. Friend the Member for Erith and Crayford mentioned the closure of Charing Cross station during the summer. I think that he will understand that Network SouthEast tried hard to avoid any inconvenience, but it was difficult in the circumstances.

I am glad that there has been a general recognition that the decision on the specific route of the east London river crossing was correct. In answer to a specific question, I wish to make it clear that I remain committed to the concept of improved east London river crossings, and my Department is currently engaged in an extensive study on that subject.

It is exciting and interesting that travelling from Tower bridge towards the east a range of opportunities have arisen for various reasons including the augmentation of the Tower bridge capacity, the tunnel between Tower bridge and Rotherhide, the east London line extension crossing the river, the docklands light railway extension, the third Blackwall crossing, the Woolwich metro possibility and other ways of taking forward the Woolwich crossing. There is also a possibility of a full east London river crossing to the A2, and a truncated east London river crossing. I understand my hon. Friend's reservations about that. There is the possibility of a lower Thames crossing.

The key factor is that all propositions should be put together and evaluated so that we have a clear idea—I am sure that it will be an all-party agreement—about which suggestion should have top priority, and those on which money should not be spent as a priority. I hope that I have shown the complexity of the subject. I took the point raised by the hon. Member for Greenwich about the prospect of a low bridge at Blackwall and the possibility of its opening for occasional river traffic. It was a good point and I will ensure that my staff are aware of it and that they explore the possibility. At the moment, as the hon. Gentlmean knows, the bridge is our preferred option on the basis of cost.

I am sorry not to have a chance to say a great deal about issues such as the Thamesmead spine road in my hon. Friend's constituency——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse): Order. I must explain to the Minister that the debate can go on until three o'clock so long as the Adjournment is moved at half-past two. The hon. Gentleman therefore has more time than he probably thinks that he has.

Mr. Norris: It was when you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, whispered in my ear that you were keen to get up to the north that I thought that I might never be called again in a debate if I did not let you off at half-past Two, but I thank you very much for your kindness.

It being half-past Two o'clock, the motion for the Adjournment of the House lapsed, without Question put.

Transport (South-east London)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Conway.]

Mr. Norris: What I will do is prevent you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, from getting the train that you have no doubt planned to get for a long time: I have 20 pages here.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I thank my hon. Friend for giving way. There are some people who, by their office, are unable to speak, and we all take guidance from Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I should like to speak on behalf of my hon. Friend the Member for Shrewsbury and Atcham (Mr. Conway), who has attended the debate with great interest. I suspect that he would like to get away also, so I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will not go through all 20 pages.

Mr. Norris: I am clearly torn, but when one is being torn by a Whip of Her Majesty's Government, one knows which way to tear, so I shall not intrude on his good will for much longer.

As I have a few seconds, I shall tell my hon. Friend who has the Adjournment debate that during my visit I was pleased to see the progress made on the Thamesmead spine road and confirm that the main works can commence on phase 4 of the project with the announcment of the Secretary of State's decision on the orders public inquiry.

I saw some of the traffic problems in Crayford town centre and was interested to learn of the long-term plans for the new industrial access road. I understand that transport supplemenary grant support is being sought for that scheme. I hope that my hon. Friend will appreciate that I do not therefore want to say a great deal more about it at this stage because of the Secretary of State's forthcoming announcement on the 1994-95 settlement. He did a good job in explaining the issue to me.

We need to make the best use of existing road space. One way of doing that is to introduce red routes. By the end of next year, we expect the A2 Rochester way and the A20 Sidcup bypass to be red routes. The benefits that we have seen from the red route pilot schemes are impressive, one of the important factors being that they do not suck additional traffic on to the system, but merely regulate the flow of traffic that is there far better. That benefits business, local residents and public transport particularly. I hope that all those benefits can be brought to south-east London as the programme of implementation, in which the traffic director is engaged, unfolds.

There are two ways of approaching the debate: one is to go through absolutely every issue that has been identified by my hon. Friends and others; the other is to accept that there may be some issues that I have not fully dealt with. I shall write to hon. Members about points that they have made for which I should give an answer.

Finally, I shall say to my hon. Friend that these debates have been useful. The true function of an Adjournment debate is for a Member to raise a matter of genuine local interest. My hon. Friend is tremendously assiduous in these matters and has served his constituency well for the past 10 years. I hope that he will continue to do so for many more. I hope that what I have said will give reassurance on some of the issues that my hon. Friend has raised. I will, of course, extend the same civility to him. If there are any other issues, I will write to him.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-seven minutes to Three o'clock.

ENVIRONMENT

Housing Revenue Account Subsidy

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what are his proposals for housing revenue account subsidy guideline rents and management and maintenance allowance for 1994-95.

Sir George Young: I have today placed in the Library copies of my right hon. Friend's proposals for housing revenue account subsidy rent guidelines and management and maintenance allowances for 1994-95.

I propose to increase the national allowance for management and maintenance by 4 per cent.—£132 million—taking the total to £3·4 billion, and that the increase should go to the 183 authorities whose allowances are below the Government's estimate of their relative need to spend. This will guarantee all authorities 95 per cent. of that estimate.

On guideline rents, I propose an average increase in next year's local authority guideline rents of £2·20 a week which would take the average guideline rent from £29·40 to £31·60 with increases at the individual authority level ranging from £1·50 in low-value areas to £2·90 a week in high-value areas.

EDUCATION

Student Loans Company

Mr. David Martin: To ask the Secretary of State for Education when the Student Loans Company will publish its annual report; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Boswell: The Student Loans Company has published today its annual report for the academic year 1992-93, which includes the company's accounts for the financial year 1992-93. I have placed a copy in the Library.

The report attests to a highly successful year for the company and is a tribute to its board and staff.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Police National Network

Sir Ivan Lawrence: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has yet chosen a supplier for the police national network; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: I have decided to award the contract for the supply of the police national network to Mercury Communications plc. This should reduce by about 40 per cent. the costs of those telephone calls which will be handled by the new network.

Welsh Constituencies

Sir Ivan Lawrence: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the Boundary Commission for Wales has decided when to start the next general review of constituencies in Wales.

Mr. Howard: The commission has given notice of its intention to commence, forthwith, a general review of constituencies in Wales. It is required to report before 31 December 1994.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Agriculture Council

Sir John Hannam: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the outcome of the Agriculture Council held in Brussels on 16 and 17 November; and if she will make a statement.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: This meeting of the Council, at which I represented the United Kingdom, continued its discussion of proposals from the Commission for changes in the arrangements for arable area payments, including set-aside; for adjustments to the agri-monetary system; and for implementing the agreement on oilseeds concluded between the Community and the United States. No decisions were reached.

On arable area payments, I pressed for changes in the existing system going beyond those proposed by the Commission. In particular, I want to ensure that farmers who entered arable land into the old set-aside scheme, which started in 1988, have a continuing incentive not to return it to production when their obligations under that scheme come to an end.

I made it clear that I could accept the modest change in the agri-monetary system proposed by the Commission but not the more far-reaching, and expensive, change urged by Germany. I argued that the suspension of the automatic adjustment of green rates, which the Commission has imposed under its own powers since September, should not be further extended.

The Council discussed the present state of play in the Uruguay round negotiations. It also had an initial discussion of a Commission proposal which would extend the existing sugar arrangements for a year, while at the same time introducing quota controls on production of inulin syrup, a sugar substitute.

WALES

NHS Trusts

Mr. Richards: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement about the development of the NHS trusts in Wales.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: There are currently 14 operational NHS trusts in Wales. I have received 12 applications from hospitals, community units and the ambulance service to become NHS trusts from April 1994. Public consultation on 10 of the applications ended on 20 September.

In the light of the representations received, and taking account the individual merits of each application, I have decided to establish a further eight NHS trusts to become operational from next April. The details are:

Gwynedd Health Authority
Gwynedd Acute Unit (Ysbyty Gwynedd, Bangor)
Gwynedd Community Unit

Gwent Health Authority
North Gwent Unit (Nevill Hall Hospital, Abergavenny)

Mid Glamorgan Health Authority
Rhondda Health Unit (Llwynypia Hospital)

South Glamorgan Health Authority
Velindre Hospital

East Dyfed Health Authority
Mental Health Unit (St. David's Hospital, Carmarthen)

Ambulance Service
North Wales Ambulance Service (Clwyd and Gwynedd)
Mid Glamorgan Ambulance Service

The orders giving effect to my decisions have been signed today. The trusts will be formally established on 1 December, with an operational date of 1 April 1994. I will announce shortly the details on the chairmen and non-executive directors of the new NHS trusts.

I have deferred a decision on the joint proposal from the East Dyfed and West Glamorgan ambulance services, pending a revised submission next year for trust status from April 1995. In the meantime, the host health authorities have been invited to integrate the two services. This further year should enable the merged service to demonstrate more clearly how the main criteria for trust status will be met.

The application from the Rhymney valley unit, Mid Glamorgan, has been rejected. I am not convinced that the proposals fully meet the criteria and, in particular, that patients would benefit from the move to trust status. In the light of my decision, it will be for the unit, in conjunction with the health authority, to consider how best to meet the health needs of local communities in the Rhymney valley.

Morriston hospital north unit in West Glamorgan and Taff Ely unit, Mid Glamorgan, have also applied for NHS trust status from April 1994. Both applications are currently subject to three months' public consultation. I expect to announce the outcome early in 1994.

This announcement today means that, from April 1994, some 85 per cent. of acute services and 80 per cent. of community services in Wales will be delivered by NHS trusts.

Elsewhere in Wales, I have invited the University hospital of Wales, the dental hospital and the community services unit, all from South Glamorgan, to prepare formal applications to become NHS trusts from April 1995. However, the invitations are without prejudice to decisions which I may be called upon to take on the authority's strategic plan on the future pattern of health services in South Glamorgan. The plan remains the subject of separate consultation by the authority at this stage.

The community services unit will focus on the Greater Cardiff area and the Llandough hospital NHS trust will be encouraged to extend its current range of patient care to include community and mental health services in the vale of Glamorgan.

Applications for 1995 trust status will need to be submitted in the early summer of 1994. No decisions will be reached until the consultative process has been completed. An invitation to prepare an application carries no commitment that an application will be approved and the decision whether to apply is entirely a matter for the hospital, community unit or ambulance service concerned.

EMPLOYMENT

Remploy

Mr. Richards: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what targets Remploy has been set in its 1993-94 annual performance agreement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: On behalf of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, my noble Friend Lord Henley has written to the chairman of Remploy approving the 1993-94 annual performance agreement between the Department and the company. This agreement covers the year from 1 April 1993. It has been negotiated by the chief executive of the Employment Service, on behalf of my right hon. Friend.

On behalf of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, my noble Friend Lord Henley has agreed targets which are realistic but stretching. These are:

the average number of disabled people employed by Remploy Ltd. will be at least 8,550; of which no more than 7,700, on average must be employed in factories;

at least 115 disabled employees will move from Remploy factories to opportunities under the Interwork scheme or to open employment, or from Interwork to open employment;

the unit cost of Interwork should be no more than the sheltered employment voluntary body deficiency grant £4,310;

Remploy Ltd. will keep within an operating deficit of £83·2 million—including £0·5 million reorganisation costs—which on average numbers of 8,550 will give a cost per disabled worker of £9,731;

Remploy Ltd. will prepare and agree a charter for its employees by March 1994.

I have today arranged for the text of the annual performance agreement to be placed in the Library.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Budget Council

Mr. Burns: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the outcome of the recent meeting of European Ministers at the Budget Council.

Sir John Cope: The Budget Council met in Brussels on 15 November. I represented the United Kingdom.

The Council considered the European Parliament's proposed changes to the draft budget which the Council established in July, Official Report, 26 July 1993, columns 596-97, and established a second reading draft budget for 1994. The Council reduced the total for commitments proposed by the European Parliament by 337 million ecu. As a result, the Council's second reading draft budget totals 73,112 million ecu—£56,089 million—in commitment appropriations. The own resources which would be required to finance the draft budget amount to 1·19 per cent. of Community GNP, compared with the own resources ceiling for 1994 of 1·20 per cent.

The Council also formally agreed the revised expenditure ceilings for 1994 which had been determined in the context of the new inter-institutional agreement—Official Report, 2 November 1993, column 113. The second reading draft budget is 374 million ecu in commitments, and 626 million ecu in payments, below the overall financial perspective ceilings. The following table summarises the second reading draft budget, with reference to the financial perspective:

	mecu	£ million[2]	mecu	£ million
Commitment appropriations
1. Common Agricultural Policy	36,465	27,975	36,465	27,975
2. Structural operations	23,176	17,780	23,176	17,780
3. Internal policies	4,370	3,353	4,193	3,217
4. External action	4,311	3,307	4,139	3,175
5. Administrative expenditure	3,634	2,788	3,610	2,769
6. Reserves	1,530	1,174	1,530	1,174
Total commitments	73,486	56,376	73,112	56,089
Total payment appropriations	70,352	53,972	69,727	53,492

[1] Council's second reading draft budget established on 15 November.
[2] Throughout this reply the rate of £1=1·3035 ecu has been used—the rate notified in the Official Journal as prevailing on the last working day of last month, 29 October.

The European Parliament will consider the draft budget for 1994 at its plenary session in December. The 1994 Community budget is expected to be adopted by the Parliament on 16 December, to take effect from 1 January.

The Council did not take a formal vote on the draft budget, the presidency concluding that there was the necessary majority to establish the second reading draft budget for 1994.

The Budget Council also established a letter of amendment to its draft supplementary and amending budget for 1993. The main elements of the letter of amendment were a reduction in the total of customs duties in the 1993 budget, in keeping with the Commission's latest estimates; and a corresponding increase in member states' GNP contributions, so as to maintain the overall level of revenue.

EDUCATION

EC Education Council

Ms Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will make a statement on the outcome of the EC Education Council on 8 November.

Mr. Boswell: The Ministers first heard a presentation by the Russian Minister of Education, Mr. Tkachenko, on the reform of his country's education system. The Council then discussed issues relating to student mobility and access by students to higher education in the Community, and the Commission's recent Green Paper on the European dimension of education. No formal conclusions were reached in either case.

NATIONAL FINANCE

EC Budget Council

Ms Quin: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the outcome of the EC Budget Council on 15 November.

Sir John Cope: I refer the hon. Member to the answer that I gave to the hon. Member for Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) on 19 November at columns 4-6.

PRIME MINISTER

Quotations

Mr. Gale: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list the sources for his quotations from the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) contained in his speech to the House on 18 November, Official Report, column 34.

The Prime Minister: The quotation from the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott),
"do you obey the law or not obey the law? We"— that is, the Labour party—
"don't have any kind of firm principles in the Party of how we might deal with this problem" is from the New Socialist, November 1985; and the quotation that Labour is "going to repeal"— that is, the Government's trade union legislation—
"all of it, there's no little bits you can keep . . . It all has to go" is from The Independent, 27 December 1989.

Efficiency Unit

Mr. Cyril D. Townsend: To ask the Prime Minister if he will publish the results of the study on civil service career management and succession planning carried out by the efficiency unit; and if he will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: I am placing in the Library today a copy of the efficiency unit's report on career management and succession planning in the civil service. I am pleased to welcome its findings.

The civil service is being restructured with departmental headquarters concentrating on policy making and the purchasing of services which increasingly are provided by agencies in government or on contract from the private sector. The systems for recruitment, appointment and career management of civil servants need to be matched to these changing tasks and responsibilities and the skills and qualities needed in the civil service in the future. At the same time, the Government agree with the need to preserve an impartial, non-political civil service recruited and promoted on merit.

Within this framework, the Government accept that the systems for career management and succession planning should be made more open. The report finds that the evidence from the private sector is that most senior posts are filled from within. But new arrangements are needed to address in each case the question whether the post should be open to competition from outside.

The report contains detailed recommendations about career management systems in individual departments on which there will now be consultation with those concerned. The report's proposals on how posts are filled and on the possibility of introducing more specific contract terms raise important issues which need further consideration. The Government will also be receiving early next year a report from the senior salaries review body on developing the existing performance pay arrangements which it will wish to take into account in reaching conclusions.

In the light of this further work, the Government intend to announce in the spring their decisions on the recommendations in the report and to publish an implementation plan.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Animal Procedures Committee

Sir John Stanley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has appointed a chairman of the Animal Procedures Committee; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: I have appointed Professor Margaret Brazier, who is Professor of Law and Director of the Centre for Social Ethics and Policy at Manchester University, as chairman of the committee in succession to Lord Nathan.

I should like to place on record my appreciation of the service that Lord Nathan has performed as chairman of the committee since 1990 and I am grateful to Professor Brazier for agreeing to take on the duties.

ENVIRONMENT

Local Government Review

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will announce the details of the accelerated programme of reviews of local government structure in England.

Mr. Curry: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State today directed the Local Government Commission to begin reviews of the remaining shire counties on 13 December and to submit all reports on or before 31 December 1994.

He also directed the commission to have regard to the revised policy guidance published on 2 November, and the revised procedure guidance, published today, in conducting these reviews. A copy of the procedure guidance has been placed in the Library of the House and additional copies are available in the Vote Office.

We are giving the commission the flexibility it needs to achieve the demanding programme of work which we have set for it. We are not changing the nature of the process, which is enshrined in the legislation. But we are no longer setting prescriptive time limits for every stage of a review, so that the commission can proceed in each area on a time scale that meets local circumstances. We are, however, quite clear that the length of time allowed for public consultation must not be reduced below two months, as my right hon. Friend announced at the end of September.

We are keen for the commissio n to submit a steady flow of reports from mid-1994. This will mean that within the wider timetable, individual county reviews will be phased. The commission has discussed a programme with the local authority associations, and today announced its intended sequence of county reviews. We endorse this programme. The table shows the dates by which initial proposals from groups of authorities or others should be submitted to the commission, and the dates when the Secretary of State expects to receive the final reports.

Those areas in the first phase include the old second tranche reviews which had been suspended pending publication of revised guidance. They will now be restarted to allow local authorities and interested parties to look again at their initial submissions.

The direction and the procedure guidance have been framed so as to allow solutions across shire county boundaries to be examined where these are the most sensible way forward. Some proposals of this kind have already been made, and others may follow. But we expect that in most cases it will not be necessary to look outside county areas to find structures on which local agreement can be reached.

My right hon. Friend has already announced that he intends to direct the commission to look at the boundaries of metropolitan areas after it has completed the shire reviews. We anticipate that any boundary issues between the shire counties and the metropolitan areas will be examined as part of the wider metropolitan review. This will allow the commission to proceed swiftly with its current work programme.

The announcement today means that the commission, local authorities and others can get on with the business of developing structural options which would deliver convenient and effective local government.

Most hon. Members have already shown much interest in the review and will no doubt wish to work with the local authorities to help them reach agreement on the best structure for their area. We expect a local consensus on structure to be a promising starting point for the commission.

Proposed phasing for initial stage of review

County	Date initial representations due	Target Date for final report
Bedfordshire Cambridgeshire Cumbria Lancashire Leicestershire	end February	end July
Berkshire Cheshire Devon Hampshire Kent Nottinghamshire Oxfordshire Staffordshire Suffolk	end February	end August
Buckinghamshire Dorset Hereford and Worcester Norfolk Northamptonshire Surrey Wiltshire	end March	end September
Essex Northumberland Warwickshire East Sussex West Sussex	end April	end October
Cornwall Hertfordshire Shropshire	end May	end November

Waste Disposal

Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the research commissioned by its Department earlier this year on the external costs and benefits of landfill and incineration of waste.

Mr. Yeo: We will be publishing a report tomorrow on "Externalities from Landfill and Incineration" by the Centre for Social and Economic Research on the Global Environment (CSERGE) and Warren Spring Laboratory. I have arranged for copies of the report to be placed in the Library. The report will be available from HMSO.

Environmental Guidance

Mr. Kynoch: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what further guidance he intends to provide on the role of economic instruments to achieve environmental goals.

Mr. Yeo: We will be publishing tomorrow a booklet called "Making Markets Work for the Environment", which was produced by my Department. I have arranged for copies of the report to be placed in the Library. The report will be available from HMSO.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Lebanon

Mr. Stephen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the Government's policy regarding arms exports to Lebanon.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Applications for the exports of arms to Lebanon are considered on their merits in the light of prevailing circumstances. During the Lebanese civil war it was not our practice to licence the export of lethal equipment to Lebanon. The Government would at present be prepared to consider, on a case-by-case basis, applications for the sale of arms to the Lebanese Government to help them re-establish their legitimate authority—provided that we were satisfied that the equipment supplied would not affect the regional military balance.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Chemical Weapons Convention

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps Her Majesty's Government plan to take to work for the effective implementation of the chemical weapons convention.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We signed the chemical weapons convention in January 1993 and play an active part in the work of the preparatory commission which is charged with setting up the future Organisation for the Prohibition of Chemical Weapons in the Hague. The Foreign and Commonwealth Office is working closely with the Department of Trade and Industry, Ministry of Defence and other Departments to make the preparations for the implementation of the convention in the United Kingdom. The necessary implementing legislation will be introduced when parliamentary time permits.

Foreign Affairs Council

Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the outcome of the Foreign Affairs Council held on 8 and 9 November.

Mr. Hurd: I attended the Foreign Affairs Council on 8 and 9 November. My hon. Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office also attended.

The Council agreed to rename the "Council of the European Communities" as the "Council of the European Union" to reflect its involvement in both EC affairs and the intergovernmental pillars; and that political declarations made in the context of common foreign and security policy would now be made in the name of the European Union. The Council also agreed on a minutes statement to the effect that these decisions did not alter the current legal position that the European Union does not enjoy international legal personality and that the designation of the parties to any international instruments having legal effects would be a matter to be decided case by case.

Sir Leon Brittan reported to the Council on his recent discussions with the United States Administration and on the state of the GATT Uruguay round negotiations in Geneva. The Council reaffirmed the need to make every effort to reach a global, durable and balanced agreement by the 15 December deadline. The Council expressed its concern over the slow progress of the negotiations and launched an urgent appeal to its main trading partners to engage more actively in the negotiations. The Council also considered a written report by the Commission on outstanding problems in the negotiations and noted that the Commission would shortly produce a further report on the audio-visual sector. The presidency decided to arrange a further discussion at a special Council in early December.

The Council agreed that new Commission proposals on anti-dumping procedures should be considered by the Permanent Representatives Committee with a view to a decision at the 6 December Foreign Affairs Council.

Greece raised the possible appointment of an EC observer for Cyprus. The Council agreed to defer discussion until a further Council.

Ministers had their first collective meeting with the chairman of the Palestine Liberation Organisation. Mr. Arafat gave his analysis of the latest developments in the peace process, and stressed the importance of international, including EC assistance. The Council recalled that the EC is already the Palestinians' largest donor, and underlined the need for transparent, effective and accountable Palestinian aid structures in the occupied territories.

The Council agreed proposals to amend the negotiating directives for an EC/Russia partnership and co-operation agreement.

The Council adopted a joint action providing for the monitoring of the 12 December Russian elections.

The Council discussed recent developments in the former Yugoslavia relating to the search for a negotiated and durable solution to the conflict, a contribution to the implementation of a peace plan and support for humanitarian action. On the basis of guidelines from the 29 October Brussels European Council, the Council adopted a joint action on the delivery of humanitarian aid in Bosnia and agreed to meeting further on 22 November to discuss both political and aid-related aspects of the crisis.

The Council discussed the Commission's draft negotiating mandate for a new partnership agreement with Morocco and concluded that further work on the dossier was needed.

In a brief discussion of relations with Tunisia, the Commission said that it expected to present a draft negotiating mandate for a partnership agreement to the next Foreign Affairs Council.

The Council held further discussions on access to information. No decision was reached and the negotiations will continue.

The Council agreed to take forward discussion with the European Parliament over detailed rules for the operation of the Parliament's temporary committees of inquiry.

The Council agreed to lift two further sanctions measures, on civil nuclear co-operation and sales of sensitive equipment to the South African police and military, as soon as the Transitional Executive Council is established.

The Council agreed to open negotiations on various bilateral agreements with Switzerland including transport and research.

The Council discussed conclusion of the EC/Bulgaria interim agreement. No agreement was reached.

The Council authorised the Commission to negotiate agreements covering trade in aluminium with Russia, Ukraine, Tajikistan and Azerbaijan.

An Association Council with Turkey was held in the margins which recalled both sides' commitment to achieving customs union in 1995.

Ministerial sessions of the accession negotiations with Finland, Norway, Sweden and Austria also took place in the margins.

No formal votes were taken during the Council.

Embassies and High Commissions

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many embassies and high commissions are maintained around the world; and what was the total cost involved under all expenditure headings in the last financial year for which figures are available.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: In 1992-93, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office maintained 235 embassies, high commissions and subordinate posts at a total overseas, recurrent and capital, cost of £383·5 million.

ENVIRONMENT

South-East London Combined Heat and Power Ltd.

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether Lewisham's South-East London Combined Heat and Power Ltd. will be affected by the Government's planned reassessment of business rates; if SELCHP will still be subject to fixed business rates under any review; and what plans he has to safeguard the future of waste management facilities under any review of business rates.

Mr. Baldry: We have no plans to change the rateability of combined heat and power stations or other waste management facilities in the 1995 revaluation of non-domestic property. We are currently considering whether combined heat and power stations should continue to have a prescribed assessment, instead of having rateable values set by local valuation officers. Whatever the result of that consideration, it is not possible to predict the outcome of the revaluation at this stage.

Neighbour Notification

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent advice his Department has given to local planning authorities on neighbour notification.

Mr. Baldry: Advice on publicity for planning applications, including neighbour notification, is given in my Department's circular 15/92, "Publicity for Planning Applications", issued in July of last year.

Local Government Commission

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish a breakdown of the Local Government Commission's time and duties; and what was the total cost of the commission to the Exchequer up to 28 October.

Mr. Baldry: The Local Government Commission has a duty to undertake reviews of the structure, boundaries, and electoral arrangements of local government in areas of England, in accordance with directions from, and having regard to any guidance issued by, my right hon. Friend. The commission also has a statutory duty to undertake periodic reviews of local government electoral arrangements in all areas. In carrying out these reviews the specific responsibilities of individual members and staff of the Local Government Commission are a matter for the commission itself. Payments of grant in aid totalling £2,130,000 were made to the commission in 1992-93 and a further £2,107,515 has been advanced to it in 1993-94 —up to 28 October 1993.

Housing Corporation

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many homes were provided through the Housing Corporation in 1992-93; and how many he expects will be provided in 1993-94 and 1994-95.

Sir George Young: The total number of completions by the Housing Corporation of housing for rent or sale in 1992-93, and the latest forecast for 1993-94 are as follows. The figures include completions under city challenge.

	Actual 1992-93	Forecast 1993-94
Completions	[1]62,137	57,600

[1] Including 18,430 completions under the Housing Market Package.

The figures for 1994-95 will depend on the autumn Budget statement by the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Local Authority Capital Asset Sales

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much local authorities have already raised from sales of capital assets since the announcement in the 1992 autumn statement that they would be permitted to spend all of their receipts up to the end of December; how much he now estimates will be raised in total by the end of December; how much of these receipts he estimates has already been spent by local authorities; and how much of these receipts will be spent by the end of the financial year 1993-94 and during 1994-95.

Mr. Baldry: The temporary relaxation in the capital receipts rules announced in the 1992 autumn statement allows local authorities to spend 100 per cent. of virtually all the receipts they receive during the period 13 November 1992 to 31 December 1993. Recent information provided by local authorities in England indicates that a total of around £1·3 billion of usable receipts were obtained during the period 13 November 1992 to 31 July 1993. This information also suggests that local authorities currently expect to obtain around £2·3 billion of usable receipts in total during the whole period of the relaxation, of which some £1·3 billion is estimated to arise as a result of the relaxation. On the basis of their latest returns, local authorities plan to finance £1·8 billion of their capital expenditure in 1993-94 from usable capital receipts received in that year or brought forward from earlier years. No equivalent information is yet available for 1994-95.

Council Tax

Mr. Hutton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many appeals against liability for the council tax have been made this year in each region in England; what is the length of time taken to hear these appeals; and what proportion of these appeals was successful.

Mr. Baldry: Information is not available centrally in the form requested. The available information is as follows:

Numbers of Appeals against Liability for the Council Tax By Region in England: Period ending September 1993

Region	Received	Resolved	Outstanding
Northern	21	4	17
Yorkshire and Humberside	27	4	23
North West	43	1	42
East Midlands	17	1	16
West Midlands	24	8	16
East Anglia	9	1	8
London	36	1	35
South East[1]	95	15	80
South West	360	34	326
Total	632	69	563

[1] Excluding London.

County Hall, London

Mr. Austin-Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will disclose the sale price of London's county hall and the proposed distribution of the proceeds.

Mr. Baldry: The London residuary body has sold the riverside building of county hall to the Shirayama Corporation of Japan. The amount of the consideration is a matter of commercial confidentiality. My right hon. Friend is about to lay before Parliament an order authorising the residuary body to distribute to the London boroughs and to the City of London certain moneys which will include the proceeds of the sale of the riverside building.

Thermal Oxide Reprocessing Plant

Mr. Clapham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will call for a public inquiry over the opening of THORP to allow for an examination of the alternative to reprocessing nuclear waste and to provide for an environmental impact assessment; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Yeo: Responses to the consultation are still being assessed. When they have all been carefully considered, my right hon. Friends the Secretary of State for the Environment and the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food will decide whether to afford a hearing or inquiry and, if they decide not to do so, will take final decisions on the authorisations.

Mineral Planning Guidance

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement about the revision of mineral planning guidance note 3.

Mr. Baldry: My right hon. and learned Friend the then Secretary of State for the Environment announced on 25 March, Official Report, columns 714-15, that we intended to proceed to consultation on revised planning guidelines as soon as possible. This is still our intention.

Sulphur Dioxide Emissions

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he is taking to curb sulphur dioxide emissions.

Mr. Yeo: The Government have in place a range of measures to control and progressively reduce emissions of sulphur dioxide, which were set out in the 1990 environment White Paper "This Common Inheritance" and subsequent annual reports. Copies are available in the Library of the House.

North Cornwall (Planning)

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when the results of the inquiry into the operation of the planning system in North Cornwall district will be available; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: Miss Audrey Lees was appointed in August last year to carry out an inquiry into the operation of the planning system in North Cornwall. She submitted her very thorough report to my right hon. Friend at the end of August.

Miss Lees concludes that many of the complaints about the district council were justified. North Cornwall has granted planning permission for sporadic developments in the open countryside, on an inconsistent basis, contrary to national planning guidance and the structure plan. Some councillors seem to have favoured certain applicants, often local people, because of their personal circumstances.

Miss Lees suggests that the practices and procedures of the council in publicising, assessing and deciding planning applications should be improved. She recommends that priorities given to completing the local plan to provide the basis for consistent decisions in future.

I am seeing North Cornwall district councillors today to emphasise the Government's concern to seek a positive commitment from the Council. I know that some improvements have been made already, but I will be seeking a full response to Miss Lee's recommendations when the council have considered her report.

The report also provides a valuable reminder of the need for all local planning authorities to follow proper procedures when dealing with applications for planning permission. I have arranged for each authority to receive a copy.

I note that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales has recently written to all the local planning authorities in the Principality to emphasise the importance of taking full account of Government planning guidance and the development plan in making decisions. He also warned that the personal circumstances of applicants should not normally influence such decisions.

Copies of the report are being placed in the Library of the House today and copies will be on sale from Her Majesty's Stationery Office tomorrow.

Local Government Staffing

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he intends to issue further guidance to the Local Government Staff Commission (England) about the staffing implications of the continuation of district or county councils as unitary authorities.

Mr. Baldry: I am placing in the Library a copy of the further guidance which we are issuing to the Local Government Staff Commission for England.

The guidance, which has been drawn up in consultation with the local authority associations and the staff commission itself, is designed to clarify the original policy guidance in cases where district or county councils continue as unitary authorities.

A continuing authority with new functions will need to take a completely fresh look at its existing organisational structures and staffing in planning for unitary status.

Within the constraints of employment legislation, the additional guidance provides as level a playing field as can be achieved for staff of outgoing authorities compared with those of the continuing authorities. It gives a framework within which the commission can provide continuing authorities with some practical examples of ways to help maximise their freedom to choose a new head of paid service and other senior managers, and to review the organisational structures and staffing of existing support services.

We expect the staff commission to look carefully at all the implications of the additional guidance.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Trial Delays

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what progress has been made in reducing delays in coming to trial in Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Patrick Mayhew: We remain determined to address with sustained and vigourous measures the problem of delays on remand. I believe that our efforts to do so in the past year have brought encouraging progress.

I announced to the House on 10 June last year a scheme designed to reduce the time defendants spent in custody before trial on indictment for schedule offences—the type of case where delays had been longest. This scheme was a joint initiative, involving agencies answering to the Lord Chancellor and the Attorney-General as well as the police and my own officials. It introduced targets for the progress of cases: 38 weeks from remand to committal and 14 weeks from committal to arraignment, a culmultative target of 12 months.

It began on 1 July last year. The agencies involved set up new machinery for close co-operation between them, in order to track the progress of cases, and to signal the need for attention to those whose targets risked being exceeded.

I am now able to announce the results of the first year's operation of the scheme. Fifty-seven cases with their first remand on or after 1 July 1992 had reached arraignment by 30 June 1993. All met the 12-month cumulative targets; all also met the 14-week committal to arraignment taget. Six cases, however, failed to reach committal within the target of 38 weeks from first remand. The average time taken to process cases also fell. In 1991, the last full year before the introduction of the scheme, the average time from remand to committal for such cases was 33 weeks; in 1992 case covered by the scheme reached committal in an average of 24 weeks, an improvement by 27 per cent. The statistics for a single year must obviously be read with caution, but I believe that the improvements indicated are most impressive and reflect great credit on all the agencies concerned.

We wish to see these improvements sustained. We have accordingly decided to continue the scheme until at least 30 June 1994; to extend its oversight to non-scheduled cases tried on indictment; and to tighten targets under the scheme by reducing cumulative target to 11 months. The latter will be achieved by making the committal to arraignment target 10 weeks instead of 14.

We will continue to take a close interest in the operation of the scheme, and in the whole period up to the start of the trial, in order to identify any further ways in which avoidable delay can be reduced.

TRANSPORT

Channel Tunnel

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what recent representations the Minister for Public Transport has had from the North West Channel Tunnel Group about the high speed rail link from London to the channel tunnel; what reply he is sending; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: The chairman of the North West Channel Tunnel Group wrote to me on 4 November. I am placing a copy of my reply in the Library.

Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency

Mr. Hain: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what has been the cost of providing 4,400 DVLA staff with (a) charter mark coasters, (b) charter mark book marks and (c) charter mark vehicle disc holders; what has been the total cost of the provision of these items; what has been the cost of consultancy advisers for DVLA's market-testing programme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Key: The DVLA is proud to have been awarded a charter mark on 27 October. The items mentioned were issued to agency staff to mark the occasion and to remind them of the charter principles. The total cost was £3,970, or £0·90 per head. The agency has contractually committed some £300,000 to the end of October to consultancy support for its current market-testing programme. This includes support for in-house teams such as the recent successful bid for the security guard work at the agency's Swansea headquarters.

Highways Agency

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many staff are currently employed at each location of the Highways Agency; and what are the projected site costs for the current year of each location (a) in total and (b) as a figure per whole time equivalent staff.

Mr. Key: The Highways Agency will not be in existence until April 1994; the following figures relate to the highways safety and traffic command of the Department of Transport. These figures therefore cover both staff who will become part of the agency and others who will remain in the central part of the Department.

The current staff numbers and pay budgets are:

	Staff numbers	£ million
Construction Programme Division Operating Units
South Eastern, Dorking	157
Eastern, Bedford	123·5
North Western, Manchester	84
West Midlands, Birmingham	105
Yorkshire and Humberside, Leeds	91·6
South Western, Bristol	66
East Midlands, Nottingham	30·1
Motorway Widening Unit, Coventry	143·5

	Staff numbers	£ million
Total staff numbers	800·7
Total pay budget		18·255
Network Management and Maintenance Operating Units
South Eastern, Dorking	97
Eastern, Bedford	125
North Western, Manchester	94·5
West Midlands, Birmingham	107·5
Yorks and Humberside, Leeds	86
South Western, Bristol	108
East Midlands, Nottingham	112
Northern, Newcastle	57
Total staff numbers	787
Total pay budget		16·588
London Regional Office	251
Total pay budget		6·756
Traffic Area Offices	449·5
Total pay budget		6·943
Headquarters Directorates	872·3
Total pay budget		23·492

Staff numbers are recorded as either full time or percentages of full time; the pay budgets are, therefore, based on whole-time equivalent staff, and are set to cover expected requirements for the year as a whole.

HEALTH

Specialised Services

Dr. Liam Fox: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what arrangements are being made to improve contracting arrangements for specialised services.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: We have been reviewing arrangements for the contracting of specialised services and last week issued guidance to the service under cover of EL(93)98—"Contracting for Specialised Services"—copies of which are available in the Library.

The guidance emphasises the need for purchasers, working closely with providers, to identify appropriate contracts covering needs, costs, quality and developmental issues to ensure the delivery of high-quality services to patients.

NATIONAL FINANCE

ECOFIN Meeting

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what changes the ECOFIN meeting of 15 November made to the proposed amendments submitted to the Council by the European Parliament on the 1994 budget for the European Communities; and if he will make a statement on the outcome of the ECOFIN meeting.

John Cope: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) on 19 November, Official Report, columns 4-6.

WALES

Mr. W. J. Ravenscroft

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) how long Mr. W. J. Ravenscroft, the executive director of Clwyd health authority, and his assistant have been working for three days per week with the health service in Pembrokeshire; and when he expects their work to be concluded;

(2) who is responsible for the salaries and expenses of Mr. W. J. Ravenscroft, the executive director—corporate management—of Clwyd health authority and his assistant during the period they have been working on the health service in Pembrokeshire;

(3) what are the terms of reference issued to Mr. W. J. Ravenscroft, the executive director—corporate management—of Clwyd health authority and his assistant in their work within the health service in Pembrokeshire.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Mr. W. J. Ravenscroft is not associated with the service review which has been commissioned jointly by Pembrokeshire health authority and the Pembrokeshire NHS trust for completion by the end of the year. Questions about the review should be addressed to the commissioning bodies. All costs of the review are being contained within existing management budgets without detriment to patient care.

Council Tax

Mr. Hutton: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many appeals against liability for the council tax have been made this year in Wales; what is the average length of time taken to hear these appeals; and what proportion of appeals was successful.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: To mid-November, the eight valuation tribunals in Wales had received 36 liability appeals. Tribunals expect to deal with appeals within an average time of eight weeks from receipt. Appellants have been successful in four of the eight appeals dealt with to date.

Housing Revenue Account Subsidy

Mr. Richards: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he will announce his proposals for housing revenue account subsidy for 1994-95; and what proposals he will be making.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The Welsh Office is consulting local authorities and other bodies on proposals for the rent guidelines and management and maintenance allowances to be used in calculating next year's entitlement to housing revenue account subsidy. I shall be placing a copy of the consultation papers in the Library of the House with a list of the estimated guidelines and allowances for each authority. The proposals are for an average guideline rent increase of £2·20 per week with a range of increases for individual authorities from £1·50 to £2·90 per week. The new average weekly guideline rent would be £31·30. For management and maintenance, it is proposed to increase allowances by an average of £31 per annum per dwelling over the 1993-94 level.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Banking

Mr. Congdon: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what changes are proposed to the banking provisions of the Companies Act 1985.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: A consultative letter was issued on 17 November seeking comments on draft regulations to change some of the banking accounting provisions of the Companies Act 1985.

The draft regulations would delete the definitions of the terms "banking activities" and "banking transactions" from schedule 9 to the Act. Banks would then, as they have sought, interpret the terms in the context of EC directive 86/635/EEC on the annual and consolidated accounts of banks and other financial institutions.

The draft regulations would also ensure that the UK holding companies on non-UK banking subsidiaries disclose details of transactions such as loans or mortgages from the subsidiaries to staff in the same way as UK holding companies of UK banking subsidiaries.

Comments should be made by 17 December.

Insolvency Service

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when the hon. Member for Birkenhead may expect a reply from the Newcastle upon Tyne Insolvency Service office to his letters of 29 October and 10 November about Mr. A. Hemmings.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: The official receiver at Newcastle replied to the hon. Member on 19 November 1993.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Register of Sports Sites

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage where the register of sports sites may be inspected; and which organisations have been given copies.

Mr. Brooke: Copies of the register of recreational land's database will be made available free of charge to the Sports Council, the Central Council of Physical Recreation, the National Playing Fields Association, local authority associations, local authorities, relevant professional organisations and relevant national governing bodies of sport.

The Sports Council is establishing with these organisations whether they require the information on diskette or on paper. Until the database has been circulated, all inquiries concerning the register are directed through the Sports Council.

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what was the cost to his Department of the register of sports sites.

Mr. Brooke: The Government's grant in aid to the Sports Council in 1991-92 included £500,000 to establish the register of recreational land.

EDUCATION

English

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what percentage of respondents to the National Curriculum Council consultation on his proposals for the revision of attainment targets and programmes of study for English circled the strongly disagree option in each of the questions G1, G2, G3, G4 and G5.

Mr. Robin Squire: The Department does not have that level of detail because the consultation on the proposals for revisions to the English order was carried out by the National Curriculum Council. However, section 2 of NCC's consultation report, recently published by the School Curriculum and Assessment Authority, does summarise the views expressed by respondents in general terms.

Fitzherbert School, Brighton

Mr. Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education whether the former Fitzherbert school site in Brighton has been sold.

Mr. Robin Squire: I understand from the City Technology Colleges Trust, which is the beneficial owner of this site, that a sale to Nuffield Nursing Homes Trust has been agreed. The price is commercially confidential.

Primary Schools

Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what plans he has to improve the teaching of basic skills in primary schools.

Mr. Patten: I have today published, following wide consultation, a circular—DFE circular 14/93—which sets new standards for all courses of training for primary teachers. It requires students to spend more time on learning to teach the core subjects of the national curriculum, in particular the basic skills of reading and arithmetic. It also requires students to spend more time in schools, with serving teachers playing a full part in their training.

The circular announces new plans to fund courses for classroom assistants, so that they can support the teaching and learning of basic skills in the primary classroom; such courses will be developed over the coming months and funded from September 1994.

The circular, which has been sent to all primary schools, those offering primary teacher training, and other interested bodies, includes comprehensive criteria which all primary training courses must meet. The criteria cover the subject knowledge and teaching skills new teachers require to be effective in the classroom; the amount of time to be spent in schools, and on the study of core subjects and basic skills; and the need for serving teachers to be able to play a full part in planning and delivering training.

The circular sets the new criteria in the context of the government's policies for primary education and teacher training. It supports the use of new course models to offer a variety of routes into teaching; including a six-subject, three-year BEd to prepare primary teachers for work across the curriculum. It encourages the use of the accreditation of prior learning to widen access to teaching for mature people without conventional qualifications.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Fisheries Council

Mr. Butler: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the outcome of the Fisheries Council held in Brussels on 22 November; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Jack: I represented the United Kingdom at the Council of EC Fisheries Ministers held in Brussels on 22 November.

The Council voted unanimously to agree the fish support prices for 1994. This was the only vote at this Council. The prices set reflect developments on the market, and the United Kingdom secured some adjustments to the Commission's proposals to reflect particular concerns of our industry. The United Kingdom also secured the continuance of the dual guide price system for herring, which is designed to enable the United Kingdom industry to take best advantage of EC market support mechanisms.

The Council held a further discussion on the Commission's proposal for changes to the rules governing fishing by Spain and Portugal. The Commission's proposal was unsatisfactory to a majority of delegations including the United Kingdom. As a result, the Belgian presidency will be looking for an alternative way foward. I repeated my insistence that the eventual decision must respect member states' existing shares of available quotas—"relative stability"—and must not allow any increase in fishing effort. I also stressed my determination to find satisfactory arrangements to apply in the Irish box. Discussions will be taken up in the December Council at which time decisions may be reached on these matters.

At the United Kingdom's request, the Council had a further discussion on industrial fishing. We received strong support from a number of member states to our request that the Commission should press ahead quickly with a thorough study of the subject including its possible effects on the marine ecosystem and marine mammals and birds. Pilot projects will be set up to study control and management problems on industrial fisheries. The Commission was asked to report back to the Council, if possible before 31 March 1994.

The Council reached unanimous agreement in principle to adopt measures this year on standards for the minimum information to appear in all member states' fishing licences. More detailed aspects of the Commission's proposal on fishing licences and permits will be considered further during 1994.

Agricultural Commodities, Trade and Food Production Directorate

Dr. Strang: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what were (a) capital expenditure and (b) running costs paid by her Department in 1992-93 in respect of the work of the agricultural commodities, trade and food production directorate on (i) the European Community, (ii) arable crops and alcoholic drinks, (iii) horticulture, plant protection and agricultural resources, (d) food, milk and marketing policy and (e) the meat group.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The information requested is as follows:

£ thousands

	Running costs	Capital
European Community	1,123	5
Arable crops and alcoholic drinks	1,494	40
Horticulture, plant protection and agricultural resources	7,930	64
Food, milk and marketing policy	2,689	21
Livestock products	1,791	22
Deputy Secretary and staff	130	0

Dr. Strang: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if she will list the responsibilities of the agricultural commodities, trade and food production directorate in respect of (a) the European Community, (b) arable crops and alcoholic drinks, (c) horticulture, plant protection and agricultural resources, (d) food, milk and marketing policy and (e) the meat group.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The responsibilities are set out in columns 42 to 46 of the civil service year book 1993. However, since that was published, the plant health division, plant variety and seeds division and agricultural resource policy division have ceased to be part of this directorate.

Set-aside

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what progress has been made in her discussions on the extension of the EC set-aside programme; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Jack: At the meeting of Agriculture Ministers on 16 and 17 November, my right hon. Friend the Minister continued to press for a number of changes to the rules on set-aside under the arable area payments scheme, in particular to enable those who have set land aside for five years under the old five-year scheme to keep all that land in set-aside, to reduce the percentage requirement for mixtures of rotational and non-rotational set-aside below the 20 per cent. proposed and to allow arable land taken out of production under forestry and agri-environment schemes to count against a producer's set-aside requirement. It was not possible to reach decisions at the meeting though a compromise was discussed that would allow farmers finishing a five-year set-aside agreement to keep all that land in set-aside for a further five years. Discussion will resume at the December Council when I hope that agreement can be reached.

Statistics

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans she has to rationalise the collection of statistics by her Department.

Mr. Jack: The statistical needs of the Department are kept under constant review. A thorough review of each statistical survey is reported to Ministers every five years. These reviews, which examine the need for the information and whether it could be collected more efficiently, lead to continuing rationalisation of collection of statistics.

Sediment Pollution

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what contribution her Department made to the recent European Commission study on sediment pollution in the EC.

Mr. Jack: I am not aware of any recent European Commission study on sediment pollution in the EC. My scientists are making a significant contribution to a study of sediment which is being undertaken on behalf of the Oslow-Paris convention.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Ethnic Monitoring

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what proportion of police forces operate ethnic monitoring procedures in respect of cautioning; and if he will list those police forces.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Forces are not required to collect data on the ethnic origin of those cautioned. We understand that around one third of police forces in England and Wales do so. The forces are;

Bedfordshire
Cleveland
Derbyshire
Devon and Cornwall
Durham
Gloucestershire
Gwent
Hampshire
Kent
Leicestershire
Northamptonshire
Nottinghamshire
South Yorkshire
Staffordshire
Surrey
West Mercia
West Yorkshire

Secure Training Centres

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what steps he plans to take to ensure that children who will be held in secure training centres do not deliberately harm themselves.

Mr. Maclean: I fully recognise the importance of this issue. Providers of facilities for juveniles serving the custodial part of a secure training order will be required to develop and implement a suicide and self-harm awareness and prevention policy. This will be monitored by the Home Office.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much of the 25 hours per week lesson time which children at secure training centres will receive will be spent on education; and how much on vocational training.

Mr. Maclean: The figure of 25 hours per week lesson time was a suggested minimum in the outline draft specification for the delivery of the regime in a secure training centre. A number of comments were received on this and other aspects of the proposed regime. The minimum number of hours lesson time per week and the breakdown between education and vocational training are matters which are still under consideration. Our present intention is to retain flexibility so as to enable each trainee to follow a programme based on his or her individual needs.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what police and medical checks will be required of staff appointed to work in secure training centres.

Mr. Maclean: The Government intend to ensure that a wide range of checks are made on staff who work in secure training centres. Staff who have a specific responsibility for the custody of detained juveniles will require a certificate issued by the Secretary of State.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to ensure that there is not an inappropriately high ratio of boys and girls in secure training centres.

Mr. Maclean: The secure training order will be a sentence available to the youth court for persistent juvenile offenders who meet statutory criteria. It will be the decision of the court as to who will be made the subject of an order. Facilities for both boys and girls will be available in each secure training centre.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) when he plans to announce a complaints and representation procedure for children who will be held in secure training centres;

(2) if he will make it his policy that arrangements for representation of children held in secure training centres should be the same as those provided in the Children Act 1989 for children in secure accommodation.

Mr. Maclean: I am still considering with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health what provision should be made for a complaints and representation procedure for children held in the new centres.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to introduce a mandatory key worker scheme into secure training centres.

Mr. Maclean: We are currently considering whether it will be necessary to require agencies or organisation providers secure training centres to provide a key worker scheme.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make it his policy that secure training centres should not be sited an impractical distance away from hospital accident and emergency departments.

Mr. Maclean: No decision has been made on sites for secure training centres. A number of factors will be taken into consideration. These will include proximity to main centres of population.

Persistent Offenders

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects the research commissioned by his Department from the Policy Studies Institute into persistent offenders to be completed.

Mr. Maclean: The Policy Studies Institute has completed fieldwork for the research commissioned by the Home Office into persistent juvenile offending, but on current information I do not expect to receive a final report before the new year.

Deportation

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the circumstances in which drugs are used to sedate people who are being forcibly deported.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Drugs are not used to sedate people who are being deported. Any medication required by the deportee would be administered by a medically qualified person with the deportee's consent.

Young Offenders

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when his Department hopes to introduce specialist training for staff working with juveniles in youth offender institutions.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the director general of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Mr. Derek Lewis to Mrs. Barbara Roche, dated November 1993:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about specialist training at Young Offender Institutions.

Some specialist training for staff working with young offenders has already taken place at Lancaster Farms Young Offender Institution, under the guidance of the Trust for the Study of Adolescence. Pilot training based on this, to develop a distance learning pack for use in other YOIs is to take place in January. We plan to have the distance learning pack available for general use later in the year.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects that 16 and 17-year-olds who are sentenced to adult penalties will no longer be held with adults serving similar penalties.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The custodial penalties available for 16 and 17-year-olds are detention in a young offender institution—YOI—and detention under section 53 of the Children and Young Persons Act 1933. Boys of this age sentenced to YOI are taken directly to a YOI with a juvenile unit, unless exceptionally they have to be held overnight at a remand centre or local prison because of travelling difficulties. Boys sentenced under section 53 may be held for a few weeks in a remand centre or local prison while a decision is taken as to where they should be allocated to serve their sentences. Girls of 16 and 17 may be held with other female young offenders in establishments which also hold adult women prisoners. This is considered to be the best option for holding them, in their own interests. There are no plans to alter these arrangements.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he plans to end remands of 15 and 16-year-olds to Prison Service establishments.

Mr. Maclean: The Government have enacted the necessary legislation to end the remand of 15 and 16-year-olds to Prison Service establishments and we have made additional capital provision available to local authorities so that they can provide an effective alternative. We will bring the new law into effect as soon as we are satisfied that local authorities have provided sufficient additional secure accommodation to meet the expected need.

Criminal Justice Study

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects his Department's study of entry into the criminal justice system to report.

Mr. Maclean: A first report on this study is expected in July 1994. This report will cover decisions made by the police about whether to charge or caution suspects arrested and held at police stations. The report will also contain information about the ethnic origin and gender of those arrested, the proportion dealt with as mentally disordered or handicapped offenders, and the extent of offending on bail.

A further report on the study is expected to be available towards the middle of 1995. This will contain details of decisions made by the Crown Prosecution Service in relation to termination or continuance of proceedings and information about court outcomes and sentences.

Siemion Serafinowicz

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will take steps to remove United Kingdom nationality from Siemion Serafinowicz; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Charles Wardle: There is no record of Mr. Serafinowicz having acquired British citizenship.

British National Party

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Metropolitan police Commissioner over an assault by a British National party councillor against an Evening Standard reporter; and if he will refer the case for prosecution.

Mr. Charles Wardle: I understand from the Commissioner that the complainant in this case does not wish any further action to be taken and has declined to give evidence.

Mr. Amanullah Khan

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when in May 1990 the United Kingdom National Central Bureau of Interpol received notification that the arrest of Amanullah Khan was requested by the Indian National Central Bureau of Interpol; and what description was given of Mr. Khan's nationality.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The notification was received on 25 May 1990. Mr. Khan's nationality was described by the Indian National Central Bureau of Interpol as "Indian and Citizen of Pakistan (not confirmed)".

Plutonium Smuggling

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information or assistance his German counterpart sought from United Kingdom authorities in regard to the trial in Flensburg of British citizen Albert Derbyshire for smuggling and alleged attempt to sell stolen Russian plutonium.

Mr. Maclean: The United Kingdom Central Authority in the Home Office received a letter of request from the German authorities under the 1959 European convention on mutual assistance in criminal matters asking that witness summonses be served on five named people in this country for the purposes of the trial. This request was executed earlier this month.

EMPLOYMENT

Disabled People

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) what representations were made to him at his meeting on 20 October with the Royal National Institute for the Blind, Mencap, the Spinal Injuries Association, the Royal Association for Disability and Rehabilitation and Deaf Accord to discuss his proposal to oblige employers to contribute 50 per cent. of the cost of providing services such as personal readers and special aids to employment for disabled people working with them for six months or longer; what reply he has made; what action he will be taking to revise the proposal; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what consultations he is having with the Employers' Forum on Disability and the CBI on his proposal to oblige employers to contribute 50 per cent. of the cost of providing services such as personal readers and special aids to employment for disabled people working with them for six months or longer.

Miss Widdecombe: The meeting on 20 October was called to discuss the new scheme "access to work" about which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made a statement to the House on 22 June 1993, Official Report, column 102. It will replace and extend four of the Department's current special schemes and enable us to help more disabled people and meet a much wider range of their employment related needs. To help fund the extra costs we will expect employers to contribute 50 per cent. of the cost of help, up to a ceiling, to employees who enter the scheme after working for them six months or more.

Members of the delegation welcomed the increased flexibility of access to work. They expressed concern about the willingness of employers to pay a contribution and the effects this would have on the employment of disabled people. My right hon. Friend sought to reassure them. Both current and previous research suggests that employers would be willing to make a reasonable contribution: my right hon. Friend pointed out that the limit on the employer contribution, and on individuals' entitlement, about which they also expressed concern, had yet to be set.

My noble Friend Lord Henley met representatives from the Employers' Forum on Disability on 2 November to discuss access to work; my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will be meeting them on 9 December. The Department is currently in correspondence with the CBI on a number of issues including access to work. The Department has offered to meet the CBI at a suitable date.

There are a number of issues on access to work on which my right hon. Friend has still to make decisions. In addition to the limits on individual entitlement and employer contributions, these include transitional arrangements for existing beneficiaries of the current special schemes, for how long those helped as new recruits will remain exempt from the employer contributions and whether there will be special arrangements for certain types of firm.

Once my right hon. Friend has taken a decision on these areas, an announcement will be made to the House.

PRIME MINISTER

War Veterans

Ms Walley: To ask the Prime Minister if he will take steps to assist British war veterans attending the D-day commemorations in Brittany to stay in the hotels in which their bookings have been made.

The Prime Minister: I am aware that some of the hotel reservations made by British veterans wishing to attend the D-Day commemorations in France in 1994 have been cancelled by French hoteliers. I am pleased to say that, following an approach by the United Kingdom Ministry of Defence, the French authorities have established an office in Caen to deal with all queries concerning accommodation in Normandy. The address of the office is:

Comite Departmental du Tourism du Calvados
Place du Canada
1400 CAEN
France
(Telephone: 010-33-31-86-53-30)
(Fax: 010-33-31-79-39-41)

Weapons Proliferation

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Prime Minister if he will set out the policies Her Majesty's Government intend to implement to prevent the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction.

The Prime Minister: We will continue to oppose the proliferation of weapons of mass destruction by strongly supporting the unconditional and indefinite extension of the nuclear non-proliferation treaty and by working towards the effective implementation of the chemical weapons convention and the strengthening of the biological weapons convention. We will continue to press for universal membership of these agreements and to give vigorous support to the related export control regimes.

Housing Associations

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Prime Minister if he will initiate an inter-departmental review of the relationship between housing association grant rates and benefit entitlements to identify the impact of varying marginal rates of tax and benefit on both housing associations and their tenants, to reduce numbers dependant on benefit and the poverty trap.

The Prime Minister: Ministers and officials in the Departments of the Environment and of Social Security already work closely together in those areas to ensure that the interaction between the different subsidy systems is fully understood and appreciated. A formal working group has now been established to discuss this and other issues relating to housing and benefits policy on a regular basis.

Cyprus

Mr. Cox: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's policy towards Cyprus.

The Prime Minister: The Government continue to support the United Nations Secretary-General's initiative, which we believe offers the best hope for a just and lasting solution to the Cyprus dispute. We hope that the two sides will be able to resume negotiations in New York soon after elections in northern Cyprus on 12 December.

Scott Inquiry

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Prime Minister how many documents his office has provided to Lord Justice Scott's inquiry into arms sales to Iraq since 23 November 1992; what has been the cost of document provision; how many civil servants in his office have been involved in assisting Lord Justice Scott with documents; how many have attended the inquiry; and which documents requested have been withheld.

The Prime Minister: My office has provided 184 documents to Lord Justice Scott's inquiry, doing so, for administrative reasons, via the Cabinet Office. No documents have been withheld. Up to six officials were involved in the compilation of the documents, and the costs incurred by both Departments has been approximately £800 in total. One Cabinet Office official has attended each hearing of the inquiry.

Crime Prevention

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Prime Minister which ministers are currently members of the ministerial group on crime prevention.

The Prime Minister: The current membership of the ministerial group on crime prevention is as follows:

Chairman, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Home Office (Charles Wardle MP, the hon. Member for Bexhill and Battle)

Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Department of Social Security (The noble Lord Astor)

Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Department of the Environment (Tony Baldry MP, the hon. Member for Banbury)

Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Department of Health (John Bowis MP, the hon. Member for Battersea)

Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Department of Education (Eric Forth MP, the hon. Member for Mid-Worcestershire)

Minister of State, Scottish Office (The noble Lord Fraser of Carmyllie)

Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Welsh Office (Gwilym Jones MP, the hon. Member for Cardiff, North)

Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Department of Transport (Robert Key MP, the hon. Member for Salisbury)

Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Department of Trade and Industry (Patrick McLoughlin MP, the hon. Member for Derbyshire, West)

Economic Secretary to the Treasury (Anthony Nelson MP, the hon. Member for Chichester)

Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Department of National Heritage (Iain Sproat MP, the hon. Member for Harwich)

Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Sir John Wheeler MP, the right hon. Member for Westminster, North)

Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, Employment Department (Ann Widdecombe MP, the hon. Member for Maidstone)

Baroness Thatcher

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Prime Minister whether the additional security costs arising from Baroness Thatcher's book-signing tour were borne by the police forces or by Government.

The Prime Minister: Any such costs will be met in the usual way from the police fund. Specific grant at the rate of 51 per cent. is paid by the Home Office on police expenditure.

Engagements

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 23 November.

The Prime Minister: This morning, I had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Chamber Carpet

Mr. Steen: To ask the Chairman of the Accommodation and Works Committee what was the cost and place of manufacture of the recent replacement of carpet in the Chamber of the House; how long it had been there; in what way it was disposed of and for what price; what plans exist for replacing the carpet in the remainder of the Chamber; and how much this is expected to cost.

Mr. Ray Powell: This is a matter for the Director of Works and I shall ask him to write to the hon. Member.

All-party Groups

Mr. Allen: To ask the Chairman of the Administration Committee which all-party groups receive funds or are serviced by outside organisations; and if he will list the organisation in each case.

Mr. Michael J. Martin: I refer the hon. Member to the Register of All-Party and Parliamentary Groups which is maintained by the Registry of Members' Interests in accordance with the resolution of the House of 17 December 1985. The Register is available for inspection by Members in the Registry and the Library.

Parliamentary Broadcasting

Mr. Allen: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will discuss with Westminster Cable the possibilities for cabling hon. Members' offices with the parliamentary channel at the same time as they cable the SW1 area, outside the Palace of Westminster.

Mr. Waller: I have been asked to reply as Chairman of the Information Committee. Any provision of such services would need to await decisions on the proposed parliamentary data and video network, on which the Committee hopes to report early next year.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Official Hospitality

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how much was spent on official hospitality in his Department in the first six months of financial year 1993-94.

Mr. Hague: The provisional figure for the first six months of the financial year 1993-94 is £97,000.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will give the main headings of the money spent by his Department on official hospitality in the financial year 1992-93.

Mr. Hague: The main headings were: ministerial hospitality; Minister of State's reception in honour of organisations representing disabled people; official hospitality.

Parking Fines

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how much has been spent on parking fines by his Department in each of the last three financial years.

Mr. Hague: The information is not available. Responsibility for parking fines rests with the driver; however, when fines are unavoidably incurred during the undertaking of official duties, management may, exceptionally, consider reimbursement.

Ministerial Offices

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how much has been spent on decorating and furnishing Ministers' offices in his Department in each of the last three financial years.

Mr. Hague: There has been no such expenditure on Ministers' personal accommodation in any of the last three financial years.

France (Official Visits)

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the purpose and place of each of the visits to France by officials of his Department in the financial year 1992-93.

Mr. Hague: Information for the Department as a whole is not available in the form requested. Details of departmental headquarters official visits to France in 1992-93 are in the table.

Reason/host	Place	Number of visits
Council of Europe	Paris	1
Council of Europe	Strasbourg	7
Training	Paris	3
Liaison with French officials	Paris	3
OECD	Paris	4
Beveridge conference	Strasbourg	1

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how much has been spent by his Department on officials travelling to France in the first six months of the financial year 1993-94.

Mr. Hague: Information is not available in the form requested and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. From 1 April 1993, the company that arranges travel for departmental officials keeps records by mode of travel rather than by destination.

SCOTLAND

Norwegian Salmon

Mr. Charles Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what further representations to the European Commission he has made following his meeting with industry representatives, in respect of the entry of Norwegian salmon into the Union; what response he has received; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Hector Monro: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland wrote to the European Commission on 16 November expressing concern about the current market situation, welcoming discussions which were taking place between the Commission and the Norwegian Government, and asking the Commission to take appropriate action.

The Commission has now introduced minimum import prices with effect from 20 November 1993 until the end of January 1994. This will provide a temporary floor to the market while the longer-term problems facing the industry are addressed.

The Commission has also invited the industry to update the information they have submitted in support of allegations of dumping by Norwegian exporters. I would encourage the industry to provide this information as soon as possible so that the Commission is in a position to proceed with an investigation.

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland (1) when he expects to announce what action the United Kingdom Government are taking in response to complaints from Scottish salmon farmers about the dumping of Norwegian salmon on United Kingdom and EC markets;

(2) what action he is taking to safeguard United Kingdom salmon producers from the effects of Norwegian salmon being dumped on United Kingdom and EC markets.

Sir Hector Monro: I have been asked to reply.

Allegations of dumping of farmed salmon on the European market by Norwegian importers are a matter for the European salmon farming industry to take up with the European Commission. The Scottish industry made such allegations in 1991 and the Commission has recently asked the industry to update the information provided on that occasion. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland has encouraged the industry to provide this information to the Commission as soon as possible so that the Commission is in a position to proceed with an investigation.

DEFENCE

Departmental Land

14. Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the total land area in the United Kingdom currently under MOD control.

Mr. Hanley: The defence estate in the United Kingdom is approximately 243,000 hectares—600,000 acres—of freehold and leasehold land.

Hercules

15. Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what action he proposes to take to ensure that the Royal Air Force shall be equipped with a new aircraft to replace the Hercules; and when he expects the first of such aircraft to enter squadron service.

Mr. Aitken: We are currently evaluating options for both refurbishment of the existing aircraft and purchase of new aircraft. A final decision will be taken on the basis of the option which offers best value for money.

25. Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when invitations to tender for the Hercules replacement programme are to be provided to contractors; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Aitken: We are currently studying the alternatives of extending the life of our existing Hercules fleet or replacing them with new aircraft. We will come to a decision on the way ahead when we have evaluated the results of these studies.

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence by what date he proposes to issue invitations to submit tenders for the Hercules replacement; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Aitken: We are currently evaluating options for both refurbishment of the existing aircraft and purchase of new aircraft. A final decision will be taken on the basis of which option offers best value for money.

Civilian Career Opportunities

16. Mr. Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what advice his Department is giving to service men and women who will be leaving as part of the "Options for Change" policy concerning alternative career opportunities in civilian life.

Mr. Hanley: The Ministry of Defence provides a comprehensive resettlement service for all service leavers including redundees. These include a range of briefings on specific careers and job search workshops which have been designed particularly with redundees in mind. Practical help with job finding is provided by the services employment network.

Trident

17. Mr. Malcolm Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what savings will accrue from reducing the number of warheads on the Trident missile programme; and what proportion of this may be reinvested in armed services numbers and duties.

Mr. Rifkind: Changes in the number of warheads have only modest financial implications, and do not affect the armed service's numbers and duties.

Nuclear Non-proliferation Treaty

19. Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what sanctions exist for breaches of the nuclear non-proliferation treaty.

Mr. Hanley: There are no formal sanctions associated with breaches of the nuclear non-proliferation treaty. Alleged breaches may be considered on a case-by-case basis by the United Nations Security Council.

Eurofighter

20. Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he next plans to meet the Spanish defence Minister to discuss the progress of the Eurofighter 2000.

Mr. Aitken: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Somerton and Frome (Mr. Robinson) earlier today.

South China Seas

21. Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether, and where, provision will be made for the basing of British forces in the South China seas after the withdrawal from Hong Kong.

Mr. Hanley: We have already agreed with the government of Brunei to continue the deployment of the Gurkha battalion in Brunei until 1998. Consideration will be given to a further extension in due course. We shall continue to participate in exercises held in Malaysia and Singapore under the five-power defence arrangements and make occasional naval deployments to the region.

Spare Parts

22. Mr. Heppell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the future provision of spare parts for the armed forces.

Mr. Aitken: My Department will continue to ensure the adequate provision of spare parts for the armed forces so they can fully meet their agreed defence objectives.

Market Testing

23. Mr. Sykes: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what benefits he expects to flow from his Department's market-testing programmes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Aitken: Experience suggests that the competitive pressures of market testing will produce savings of between 20 and 25 per cent. of running costs, regardless of whether the service is contractorised or retained in-house. The process provides an oppotunity to reassess the use of resources to give better service to the customer and better value for money.

Germany (Force Withdrawals)

24. Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his estimate of the saving to the defence budget from withdrawing British forces from Germany.

Mr. Hanley: Over the period 1990-91 to 1995-96, the defence budget, excluding the cost of the Gulf conflict and redundancies, is expected to reduce by around 12 per cent. in real terms. While the operating cost of maintaining British forces in Germany is expected to reduce by around £500 million in real terms between 1991-92 and 1993-94, it is not possible to identify separately the savings of withdrawing British forces from Germany.

Belize

26. Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he wil review Her Majesty's Government's present defence commitment to Belize.

Mr. Hanley: By agreement between the Government of Belize and Her Majesty's Government, the Belize defence force will assume responsibility for the defence of Belize on 1 January 1994. We see no reason to change these plans.

Yugoslavia

27. Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many British troops are now deployed in the former Yugoslavia; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Gosport (Mr. Viggers) earlier today.

Contracts

28. Mr. Bryan Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what action he is taking to ensure that a high proportion of defence contracts is awarded to British firms.

Mr. Aitken: In order to achieve the best value for money, wherever possible, we place contracts by means of open competition. British companies have proved highly competitive to the extent that, over the past five years, we estimate that 91 per cent. of defence equipment expenditure was spent with United Kingdom industry.

Reserve Forces

29. Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the relative state of readiness for active service of the regular reserves and the Territorial Army.

Mr. Hanley: Members of both the regular reserve and the Territorial Army require a period of special-to-role training in advance of deployment on active service. The amount of training required depends on the role and nature of the units in which the reservists concerned would serve.

Queen Elizabeth Hospital, Woolwich

Mr. Austin-Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement regarding the timetable for withdrawal of his Department from the Queen Elizabeth military hospital in Woolwich.

Mr. Hanley: Current plans are for a withdrawal by March 1998. We are holding discussions with the NHS about the Greenwich healthcare trust progressively taking over the hospital in advance of this date.

Dockyards

Ms Rachel Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will agree to provide a contractual guarantee of work to both Rosyth and Devonport dockyards.

Mr. Aitken: The Government have not ruled out the possibility that some form of contractual commitment relating to future refitting work could be included as one of the matters for negotiation with tenderers for the dockyards.

Ms Rachel Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether the Transfer of Undertakings (Protection of Employment) Regulations 1981 provisions will apply to the employees of the royal dockyards following full privatisation.

Mr. Aitken: This will depend upon the particular circumstances of the proposed sale. However, my Department will honour any obligations on it arising from the relevant employment legislation.

Ms Rachel Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if the Government will guarantee the pensions and redundancy entitlements of the royal dockyards' employees after full privatisation.

Mr. Aitken: Terms and conditions of employment at the royal dockyards remain a matter for negotiation between the work forces—or their representatives—and their respective employers.

Defence Diversification

Ms Rachel Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make it his policy to encourage defence diversification.

Mr. Aitken: The Government's policy is that decisions on how to adapt to changing market circumstances, and what products to make, are for the commercial judgment of companies.

The Department of Trade and Industry provides advice and assistance to companies who may be considering diversification, including a recently published handbook called "Changing Tack". That Department, together with the Department of Employment, also administers the United Kingdom participation in the EC Konver programme, which is designed to assist regions affected by the decline in the armaments industry and the closure of military bases.

Shipbuilding and Refitting

Ms Rachel Squire: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when the dialogue over an industrial policy for shipbuilding and ship refitting will commence.

Mr. Aitken: The Government believe that industry is best placed to take the decisions necessary for its own success. My Department is, however, seeking to promote greater awareness of our likely future requirements through regular and continuing dialogue with industry.

MV Belvaux

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence on what date, for what purpose and for how many days MV Belvaux was chartered by his Department; what nature of cargo the vessel was intended to carry; for how many of the days chartered the vessel was employed on other tasks for his Department; when the charter was cancelled; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: The MV Belvaux was taken up on time charter on 26 January 1993 against a contingency of transporting artillery units at short notice to reinforce the troops deployed by Bosnia. The charter lasted for 117 days and was relinquished on 22 May 1993 once developments in the former republic of Yugoslavia justified its termination. During the period of the time charter it was possible to make 23 days' use of the vessel for other purposes without compromising availability for the primary contingency task.

Small Arms Nitro Compound

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what information he has on the facilities available in the United Kingdom for the manufacture of small arms nitro compound; from which foreign countries it is imported; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Aitken: My Department does not purchase small arms ammunition propellant separately but procures the complete ammunition round from a prime contractor. It is for the prime contractor to decide on the source of the propellant used in his ammunition and to ensure that it meets the appropriate technical and performance standards. The capability to produce nitro-cellulose and nitro-glycerine for small arms ammunition does exist in the United Kingdom.

Channel Islands

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement over remaining documents in his Department relating to the Nazi occupation of the Channel Islands; and if such documents have now been seen by the German authorities.

Mr. Hanley: There are very few closed documents relating to the Nazi occupation of the Channel Islands. The German authorities' investigations are proceeding with MOD giving every assistance, including sight of the relevant files. The closed documents will be released on completion of the German inquiries.

Royal Tournament and Edinburgh Tattoo

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the current level of support from the services and from civilian staff of his Department for (a) the royal tournament, (b) the Edinburgh tattoo and (c) other similar scale events, showing the additional attributable cost; what plans he has to reduce that level of support; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: The 1992 royal tournament, the most recent for which detailed figures are readily available, required support of about 19,500 man days of effort from service personnel, excluding participants. The 1993 tournament was reduced in length from 29 to 20 performances, with a consequent reduction in effort. There are no MOD civilian staff directly employed on royal tournament tasks. The additional attributable costs—that is, costs which would not otherwise have been incurred, amounted to approximately £350,000 in 1992.

The 1993 Edinburgh tattoo required support of a little over 5,000 man days of effort from service personnel, excluding participants. Some MOD civilian staff worked overtime in support of the tattoo and a number of casual cleaners were hired for its duration. The total attributable costs were some £60,000.

There are no other events comparable to the royal tournament and the Edinburgh tattoo.

There are no plans at present for further reductions in support to these events.

Nuclear Warheads

Mr. Hutton: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what information he has on the number of nuclear warheads which have been destroyed by the Russian Government under the provisions of the START 2 treaty.

Mr. Hanley: The START 2 treaty has not yet come into effect and cannot legally do so until START 1 enters into force. Therefore, no nuclear warheads have been destroyed by the Russian Government as a result of the terms of the START 2 treaty.

Mr. David Hart

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the purpose of Mr. David Hart's visit to RAF Strike Command on 27 May; how long the visit lasted; and whom he met.

Mr. Hanley: Mr. David Hart was invited by the Chief of the Air Staff to receive a briefing on the role and organisation of RAF Strike Command in the context of an article written by Mr. Hart in The Spectator magazine published in February 1993. During a half-day visit, Mr. Hart met the Commander in Chief and a number of his senior staff.

Search and Rescue

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has for the future of the search-and-rescue services at RAF Chivenor; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: The Wessex search-and-rescue—SAR—flight at RAF Chivenor is planned to be replaced by the Sea King SAR flight from RAF Brawdy in April 1994. This decision will be looked at again in light of the decision which I announced on 11 November, to move a battalion of the Royal Welch Fusiliers into temporary accommodation at RAF Brawdy from August 1994, and once the outcome of the review into the rationalisation of RAF flying training stations is known.

Market Testing

Mr. Stephen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the size of his Department's market-testing programme; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Aitken: We intend to market test, in the four years to March 1996, activities currently costing £1·2 billion each year to undertake in-house and employing over 40,000 people.

Written Answers to Questions

Wednesday 24 November 1993

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Shop Leases

Mr. Brazier: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what plans he has to modernise the law regarding shop leases in particular with regard to original tenant liability.

Mr. John M. Taylor: As I announced in my answer on 31 March to my hon. Friend the Member for High Peak (Mr. Hendry), Official Report, column 197, the Government have, after careful consideration, decided to implement the recommendations in the Law Commission's report on Landlord and Tenant Law: Privity of Contract and Estate (Law Com. No. 174), for future leases but not for existing leases. The necessary legislation, which will apply to all leases including shop leases, will be introduced as soon as there is a suitable opportunity.

ENVIRONMENT

Local Government Review

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether the remit of the Local Government Commission includes making recommendations on changes in intervals for elections and on the creation of single-member wards; and whether such proposals could be implemented by statutory order alone.

Mr. Baldry: The policy guidance to the Local Government Commission for England, revised November 1993, invites the Commission, where it recommends structural changes, also to make recommendations about future electoral arrangements, including warding, number of councillors and electoral cycles.

Such proposals could be implemented only by statutory order.

Standard Spending Assessments

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will bring forward proposals to base local authority debt charge standard spending assessments on 1990-91 adjusted credit ceilings; and if he will make a statement on the discrepancies between the current notional debt figure and actual debt charge spending.

Mr. Baldry: We are at present considering the various representations which have been received in the course of the review of SSAs, including those for changes to the capital financing SSA, which were also discussed with the local authority associations.

The Secretary of State will announce his proposals for the distribution of revenue support grant for 1994-95 shortly. The announcement will include any proposals for the calculation of the capital financial element of SSAs for 1994-95. There will follow, as in previous years, a period of consultation.

Local Authorities (Management)

Mr. Clelland: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what action he plans to take following the publication of the report of the working party on the internal management of local authorities in England, entitled "Community Leadership and Representation: Unlocking the Potential".

Mr. Baldry: We are continuing to discuss the issues constructively with local government and will announce decisions as they are taken.

Energy Efficiency

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what new initiatives he is taking to promote energy efficiency for (a) households and (b) businesses; and what is his latest estimate of the expenditure involved in each of the above.

Mr. Yeo: On 26 July, my right hon. Friend announced the Government's proposals for completing Britain's CO_2 programme. The main energy efficiency elements include strengthening the Energy Efficiency Office's programmes of advice and information aimed at business, increasing the target for combined heat and power to 5,000 MW by the year 2000, increasing the resources devoted to the provision of information and encouragement to households, and reinforcing the work of the Energy Saving Trust. The EEO's budget to run its existing programmes and take forward these proposals in 1993-94 is £69·1 million.

Empty Property Purchases

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how much was spent of the £750 million made available by the Treasury at the time of the November 1992 autumn statement to buy up empty owner-occupied properties before the end of the financial year 1992-93; how much of the total was spent by local authorities and how much by housing associations; and how much of this money has subsequently been clawed back by the Treasury through reductions in funds made available by central Government for investment in housing.

Sir George Young: On 12 November 1992 the Secretary of State announced a £627 million programme to boost the housing market. Housing associations in England spent £577·14 million to purchase new, empty and repossessed homes to use for families in housing need and £19·86 million by giving cash incentives to associations' tenants to buy homes on the open market. Local authorities in England spent a total of £29·94 million for similar cash incentives for their own tenants.

These funds were made available and fully spent in 1992-93; the resources available for future years are determined annually in the public expenditure survey discussions.

A further £123 million was divided between Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland for similar housing measures and other capital projects, for which respective Secretaries of States were responsible.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Civil Service College

Mr. Forman: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement on the Civil Service college.

Mr. Waldegrave: We have now completed an evaluation of the Civil Service College as a next steps executive agency and considered its future. I have today placed a copy of the evaluation report in the Libraries of both Houses.

The college has had four very successful years since becoming an agency in 1989. Agency status within central Government has helped the college to provide top quality senior management and professional training focused on the particular needs of the civil service at a time of considerable change. We have concluded that this remains the best approach for a further period.

We shall continue to seek improvements in the college's operation and will review it again in four years under the normal procedures for executive agencies. In particular, we have decided to put the college on to a fully commercial footing by phasing out the central payment of £1·8 million a year from the Office of Public Service and Science. From 1995-96 the college will be required fully to cover its costs by revenue from its operations. In addition we are mounting a study of the college's suitability for trading fund status.

We are now reviewing the framework document of the college. When this is complete, it will then be presented to Parliament in the usual way.

EDUCATION

School Admissions (Appeals)

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will give figures, in total and by local education authority, on the number of parental appeals on school admission for the last year for which figures are available.

Mr. Robin Squire: In the 1991-92 academic year 37,676 appeals were lodged by parents against the non-admission of their children to the maintained school of their choice. The figures requested, by LEA area, are given in the table. In many cases appeals were withdrawn or settled before being heard by an appeals committee.

Grant-maintained Schools

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will give figures for the amount of transitional grant paid to date to each grant-maintained school in each local education authority area.

Mr. Robin Squire: The information requested has been placed in the Library.

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will list for each grant-maintained school which became grant maintained in September or October, the full-year value of (a) direct annual maintenance grant and (b) the central annual maintenance grant; and what is (b) as a percentage of (a) in each case.

Mr. Robin Squire: The information requested is given in the table.

Sex Education

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will arrange for his letter in answer to the questions listed in the Official Report, 5 November, column 493, to be published in the Official Report.

Mr. Forth: The text of the letter was as follows:

"I promised to write to you in response to two recent Parliamentary Questions about sex education. I am sorry that the strict timetable imposed by prorogation of Parliament meant that I was unable to answer fully at the time.

In Question No 296 you asked whether (a) abortion and (b) contraception will be considered as biological or other aspects of human sexual behaviour in our planned guidance to schools on sex education. That guidance will make clear that with effect from the beginning of the Autumn term 1994, the Order for National Curriculum science will require pupils at key stage 3 (aged 11-14) to study:

"life processes . . . growth, reproduction . . . particularly as they relate to human beings;" and the physical and emotional changes that take place during adolescence".

It follows that discussion of contraception or abortion will not be a statutory requirement of the National Curriculum in science. These topics would be candidates for inclusion instead in the programmes of sex education which all secondary schools will be required to provide. The detailed content of those programmmes will, however, be for the schools themselves to decide, in the light of the guidance we will be offering.

Turning to Question 297, you asked what definition will be given in our planned guidance to schools to help teachers distinguish between biological and other aspects of human sexual behaviour. As I have already explained, the Circular will remind schools of the statutory requirements of National Curriculum science. It will also offer schools advice and models of good practice to help them draw up their programmes of sex education. We will shortly be issuing a draft of the Circular for consultation.

I hope this is helpful."

Corporal Punishment

Mr. Spellar: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what cases are pending before the European Court of Human Rights regarding the inflicting of corporal punishment in private schools.

Mr. Forth: None.

Refugees

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what action he is taking to increase the places for refugees in English as a second language classes.

Mr. Boswell: The provision of tuition to improve the knowledge of English of refugees and others for whom English is not the language spoken at home is a matter for individual further education colleges, schools and local education authorities. The Further Education Funding Council has a duty to secure the provision of adequate facilities for the education of part-time students over compulsory school age and for full-time students aged 19 or over in respect of such courses.

Civil Servants

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will list for each civil service grade in his Department (a) the total number of persons employed and (b) the total number of women employed.

Mr. Boswell: The figures are as follows:

	Female	Male	Total
Grade 1	0	1	1
Grade 2	0	3	3
Grade 3	0	11	11
Grade 4	0	3	3
Grade 5	16	34	50
Grade 6	3	14	17
Grade 7	47	108	155
SEO and Equivalent	38	73	111
HEO and Equivalent	173	182	355
EO and Equivalent	293	189	482
AO and Equivalent	460	153	613
AA and Equivalent	231	111	342
Total	1,261	882	2,143

These figures reflect the number of staff in post and include 360 staff in the Teachers Pensions Agency.

PRIME MINISTER

Queen's Speech

Mr. Allen: To ask the Prime Minister how many copies of the background note on the Queen's Speech have been sold to the press.

The Prime Minister: The background notes on the Queen's Speech are available free of charge to the press.

As part of the Government's drive to make information more available to the public, a system operated on behalf of the Central Office of Information was initiated this year to enable individuals and organisations to obtain the background notes by facsimile transmission. Over 1,000 calls were made to the system.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make available to the hon. Members the background note to the Queen's Speech which was made available to the press before the Queen's Speech.

The Prime Minister: The notes have been placed in the Library of the House.

Security Services

Mr. Mark Robinson: To ask the Prime Minister what plans he has to change the vote accounting arrangements for the security and intelligence agencies, following the announcement of the intention to introduce new statutory arrangements for the secret intelligence service and GCHQ.

The Prime Minister: As part of its policy towards greater openness in security and intelligence matters, the Government intend to bring on to a single published vote the aggregate expenditure of all three agencies, much of which, including all the expenditure of GCHQ, has previously been carried on MoD and FCO Votes.

The new single intelligence vote will be fully open to scrutiny by the Comptroller and Auditor General, apart from limited restrictions to protect the identities of certain sources of information and the details of particularly sensitive operations.

The first main estimate for the new vote will cover expenditure in 1994-95, and will be presented to Parliament in March 1994.

WALES

Housing Association Rents

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his policy concerning rents for housing associations in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: It continues to be our policy to subsidise housing association rents by very considerable capital grants.

Farm Holdings

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many farm holdings were registered with his Department in September.

Mr. Redwood: In September 1993 there were some 37,000 names and addresses on the farm holdings list maintained by the Welsh Office.

Agriculture Agencies

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many staff were employed within his Department and within agencies accountable to him dealing with agriculture in September.

Mr. Redwood: At 30 September 1993 the number of staff dealing with agriculture in my Department and agencies was 808, including ADAS staff in Wales.

Historic Buildings and Monuments

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he intends to publish the Government's response to the second report from the Welsh Affairs Committee of Session 1992-93, House of Commons paper 403, on the preservation of historic buildings and ancient monuments.

Sir Wyn Roberts: I am pleased to announce that a response to the Welsh Affairs Committee report on the preservation of historic buildings and ancient monuments has been published today as Command Paper 2416. Copies are available in the Vote Office.

Valleys Programme

Mr. Richards: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he will publish the evaluation of the programme for the valleys.

Mr. Redwood: I have today published the report of the evaluation of the programme for the valleys 1988 to 1993 carried out by Victor Hausner and Associates, along with a statistical profile of the valleys produced by the Welsh Office. Copies have been placed in the Library of the House.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Sinn Fein

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland by what means his Department apprises itself of the policies and views of Sinn Fein.

Mr. Ancram: The main sources of information about the policies and views of Sinn Fein are public ones such as written documents and reports of interviews. The Department will also, from time to time, receive unsolicited second-hand accounts relevant to Sinn Fein's policies and views from members of the community, some of whom may have had contact with members of that party. Constituency matters from Sinn Fein councillors are dealt with on the same basis as inquiries from other elected representatives. There have been occasions when Ministers and/or officials have met council delegations which have included a Sinn Fein councillor to discuss constituency matters.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Police Establishment

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the police establishment for each police force area in England and Wales for April 1992 and for each month thereafter, including details of supernumerary posts.

Mr. Wardle: The information requested is set out in the tables.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what assessment he has made of the effect of the Asylum and Immigration Appeals Act 1993 on the number of asylum seekers whose claims he considers to be bogus.

Mr. Charles Wardle: It is too early to assess the effect of the Act, but we are monitoring progress carefully.

Sexual Offences

Mr. Ashton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will list the number of kerb-crawling prosecutions and cautions under the Sexual Offences Act 1985, for each year since it came into operation;

(2) if he will list the number of prosecutions for street soliciting by prostitutes in each year since 1985.

Mr. Maclean: The information is given in the tables.

Human Rights

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if the Government support the proposal that the European Community should become a signatory to the European convention of human rights; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I have been asked to reply.

All member states of the European Community are parties to the European convention on human rights. We see no need for the European Community, as a legal entity, to accede separately to the convention. The European Court of Justice applies the convention in cases coming before it which raise issues of human rights.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

EC Cultural Affairs Council

Ms Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if he will make a statement on the outcome of the EC Cultural Affairs Council on 5 November.

Mr. Brooke: EC Ministers of Culture met on 5 November 1993 in Brussels. They designated Stockholm as European City of Culture for 1998 and Weimar for 1999. Ljubljana and Nicosia were chosen to host the European cultural month in 1995.

Ministers held an exchange of views on the economic and job-creating aspects of culture. The Belgian Presidency made an oral report of the informal meeting of Culture Ministers in Antwerp on 19-20 September, and noted that the Commission would be looking again at the issue of fixed book pricing with the aim of finding pragmatic solutions for cross-border transactions within the same linguistic zone. It also noted that the Commission intended to set up an ad hoc group of representatives of the member states to assist it in inventorying the situation of the artist. Ministers also received information from the Commission about the campaign "Reading for Pleasure".

The Council adopted a resolution concerning the first century of European cinema. It adopted conclusions noting the Commission's communication of 23 July on the subject of the evaluation report on the MEDIA programme. It also held an exchange of views on GATT as it affected the audiovisual sector, after hearing information from the Commission about the most recent state of negotiations.

Ministers agreed a communiqué expressing their concern that artists in Sarajevo continue to express themselves and take part in European cultural exchanges. They invited the Commission to make a financial contribution to the 10th Sarajevo winter festival, as well as noting with approval the intention of some member states to engage in cultural and artistic initiatives as an expression of solidarity with Sarajevo.

Broadcasting Act 1990

Mr. James Hill: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what plans he has to amend the Broadcasting Act 1990.

Mr. Brooke: I have today announced that, following careful consideration of the representations that I have received, I have concluded that the present regulations on the ownership of ITV companies should be relaxed. Subject to parliamentary approval, I propose to make an order to amend the rules, so that an ITV company could hold two regional licences in areas with the largest advertising revenue, except in London. No one would be able to own more than two ITV regional licences and the limits on other holdings would continue.

The statutory provisions on regional broadcasting and the conditions on regional programmes attached to the Independent Television Commission's licences remain in force, even if there are changes in ownership. These provisions safeguard the interests of viewers and, in particular, regional programming, including news and current affairs, which will remain a valuable aspect of the ITV system.

For the longer term, we shall keep the ownership restrictions under review, and look at the wider questions of cross-media ownership.

Indemnity Undertakings

Mr. Ian Bruce: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how many indemnity undertakings were given by Departments under section 16 of the National Heritage Act 1980 for the six-month period ended 30 September; and what was the value of contingent liabilities in respect of such undertakings given at any time and which remained outstanding at 30 September.

Mr. Brooke: The information my hon. Friend requests is as follows:

In the six-month period ended 30 September 1993 the following undertakings to indemnify were given by the relevant Departments for items on loan to national and non-national institutions.

	Number
Department of National Heritage	601
Scottish Office Education Department	64
Welsh Office Education Department	26
Department of Education Northern Ireland	15

The value of contingent liabilities in respect of such undertakings given at any time and outstanding at 30 September 1993 are:

Department of National Heritage	1,669,460,665
Scottish Office Education Department	34,314,647
Welsh Office Education Department	30,467,604
Department of Education Northern Ireland	12,487,361

TRANSPORT

West Coast Main Line

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what response he has given to the report of the independent auditors in relation to the west coast main line.

Mr. Freeman: I expect to receive Hambros' report shortly on the scope for using private finance to renew the infrastructure of the west coast main line.

Mr. George: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he last met the director of the west coast main line to discuss investment and infrastructure requirements; and what was the outcome of these talks.

Mr. Freeman: I last met the director at the end of October. The study by consultants on the scope for using private finance to renew the infrastructure of the west coast main line was among the subjects discussed. Any decision on the way forward will be made in the light of Hambros' report, which I expect to receive shortly.

Civil Servants

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list for each civil service grade in his Department (a) the total number of persons employed and (b) the total number of women employed.

Mr. Norris: The current total staff and the number of women in the central Department and its executive agencies is summarised in the table.

A418

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the effect which the EC's Tern programme will have on his Department's proposals for the east-west route and the A418 west of Aylesbury-Wing bypass.

Mr. Key: The east-west route was accepted as part of the trans-European road network, TERN, by the Council of Ministers on 29 October. The A418 west of Aylesbury-wing bypass forms part of the route.

Inclusion in the TERN has no effect on the standards we propose for the route.

Targets

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish a table showing the targets and performance against targets in respect of (a) punctuality and (b) reliability of each of the divisions of British Rail serving the London area, and of London Underground and London Buses, in each month from January 1992.

Mr. Norris: The information requested is shown in the tables.

Road Contracts

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he has taken to improve control and project management of road contracts.

Mr. Key: A number of initiatives is in hand ranging from training in the techniques necessary for effective project management to the wider use of design and build forms of contract.

Disabled Persons Transport Advisory Committee

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he has received the seventh annual report of the Disabled Persons Transport Advisory Committee.

Mr. Freeman: The report has now been formally received by my right hon. Friend. Copies have today been placed in the Libraries of both Houses.

Marine Safety

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to receive from Lord Donaldson the report of the inquiry set up by him into aspects of marine safety.

Mr. Norris: My right hon. Friend expects to receive the report of the inquiry chaired by Lord Donaldson in the early part of next year.

MV Braer

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he has yet received the report from the Marine Accident Investigation Bureau on the grounding of the MV Braer off Shetland on 5 January; and when he expects the publication of the report.

Mr. Norris: The Secretary of State has not yet received the report of the chief inspector of marine accidents into the grounding of the Braer, but expects to do so before the end of the year. Publication will follow as soon as practicable thereafter.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Sheep Dips

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when she expects to be able to make a response to the Veterinary Products Committee report on organophosphorus sheep dips; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Soames: The Veterinary Products Committee met on 21 October to consider the future authorisation of organophosphorus sheep dip products. A statement will be made shortly about the committee's advice and the Government's response.

Civil Servants

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if she will list for each civil service grade in her Department (a) the total number of persons employed and (b) the total number of women employed.

Mr. Jack: The information set out as at 22 November 1993 relates to non-industrial staff in MAFF and its agencies.

	Total staff	Total number of women
Grade 1	1	0
Grade 2	6	1
Grade 3	27	2
Grade 4	12	0
Grade 5	119	12
Grade 6	163	16
Grade 7	927	162
SEO	983	177
HEO	1,923	575
EO	1,942	890
AO	2,798	1,796
AA	2,768	1,960
Total	11,669	5,591

The figures are given by grade equivalent and include all permanent staff, casuals and staff on temporary release. Part-time staff are counted as 1·0.

Live Animals (Transport)

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what discussions she is having to ensure a maximum eight-hour journey for the transport of live animals.

Mr. Soames: Negotiations are proceeding on Commission proposals for additional rules for the protection of animals during transport. The Commission examined the case for journey limits but concluded that they would be unenforceable.

Whales

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if she will make a statement on progress towards a southern ocean sanctuary for whales.

Mr. Jack: At the 45th meeting of the International Whaling Commission, held in Japan in May this year, the United Kingdom made clear its support for the concept of a whale sanctuary in the Southern ocean. A number of the IWC contracting parties argued that they needed more time to study some of the detailed aspects of the sanctuary approach, such as the definition of boundaries, matters of jurisdiction and future research plans for such a sanctuary. The Commission decided to endorse the concept of the sanctuary and agreed to work to resolve outstanding issues at a special intersessional working group with a view to taking a final decision at the 46th meeting of the Commission next May. The intersessional working group is to take place in Australia in February next year. The United Kingdom will attend and will play a full and positive part in the group's deliberations.

Farms

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many farm holdings were registered with her Department in September.

Mr. Jack: A total of 194,000 farms, names and addresses were on the farm holdings list maintained by the Department in 1993.

Agriculture Staff

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many staff were employed in her Department and within agencies accountable to her dealing with agriculture in September.

Mr. Jack: Approximately 8,000 of the staff employed by the Department and its agencies deal with agriculture-related matters. This figure excludes ADAS staff working in Wales who are covered by the Welsh Office Agricultural Department's reply.

Farm-saved Seeds

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations she has received on liability for royalty payments for farm-saved seeds in preparation for the November meeting of the EC Council of Agriculture Ministers; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Jack [holding answer 23 November 1993]: I have received a number of representations both from individual farmers and from some local branches of the National Farmers Union. The question of farm-saved seed is under current consideration as part of the draft EC proposal for a European plant variety rights scheme. The current proposals include a five-year, renewable, derogation that will enable farmers to continue saving seed of the varieties they use in this way at present without the payment of any royalty. For farm-saved seed of varieties not saved at present by individual farmers, a sensibly lower royalty will apply. Our aim in the negotiations will be to ensure that this principle is retained in the final regulation.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Welfare Benefits

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the taxation of welfare benefits, with particular reference to invalidity benefit.

Mr. Dorrell: It remains the Government's intention to bring invalidity benefit into taxation at a suitable opportunity.

Value Added Tax

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish a teble showing for each member state of the European Economic Community the rates levied by value added tax on food in shops, household fuel, children's clothing, books, newspapers and magazines, public transport, water and sewage services, newly constructed homes, second-hand homes and the standard of tax most recently adopted together with notes that outline the most important distinctions where different rates are charged within each category.

Sir John Cope: The information requested is shown in the table.

8. The lower rate applies to unprepared foodstuffs.
9. 3 per cent applies to ordinary bread, breadmaking flour and cereals, milk, cheese, eggs, fresh fruit and vegetables.
10. Food such as ice-cream, chocolate and confectionery, alcoholic and soft drinks, potato crisps are subject to the standard rate of 17·5 per cent.
11. The reduced rate applies coal and peat.
12. The standing charge is subject to 5·5 per cent and the actual supply of heating to 18·6 per cent.
13. Wood is subject to the reduced rate.
14. The following are subject to 9 per cent.: wood; electricity and gas for domestic and some industrial uses (excluding gas for domestic heating) and oil. Coal is subject to 12 per cent.
15. The 6 per cent. rate applies to gas and electricity; wood, oil and coal are subject to 12 per cent.
16. 5 per cent. applied to electricity and oil.
17. Fuel for business use is subject to the standard rate of 17·5 per cent. Domestic fuel will be subject to a temporary rate of 8 per cent. from 1 April 1994 and then to the standard rate from 1 April 1995.
18. Obscene and pornographic material is generally standard rated except in Portugal, where the increased rate applies (30 per cent. in the mainland and 21 per cent. in the autonomous regions of Madeira and the Azores archipelagoes).
19. Providing they are considered in the legislation covering these items to be of a cultural, education, recreational or sporting nature.
20. Magazines and newspapers which appear at least 50 times a year and whose aim is to educate or entertain the general public are subject to the zero rate.
21. 25 per cent. applies to magazines; 0 per cent. to newspapers.
22. Transport on regular services is exempt, but on chartered buses is taxable at 25 per cent.
23 0 per cent. applies to transport in one of the French overseas departments, including Corsica, or overseas territories, by ship or plane.
24. 7 per cent. applies to transport by rail (excluding funicular railways), in overhead system electric coaches in licensed passenger road transport services and taxis, and on ferries, provided that such transport either takes place within a town or does not exceed 50 kilometres in length. The reduced rate also applies to the transport of employees between their home and work place by employers in their own name and for their own account.

25. Exemption applies to transport between towns and less than 50 kilometres apart; 9 per cent. applies to transportation in certain vehicles; 12 per cent. applies to air passenger transport.
26. 6 per cent. applies to transport by rail, tramway or trolleybus, or on ships or ferries, as well as by means of taxi, and aircraft (if the place of departure and arrival are both in the Netherlands).
27. 0 per cent. applies to transport between Madeira, the Azores and mainland Portugal.
28. 0 per cent. applies to the following passenger transport: in any vehicle, ship or aircraft designed or adapted to carry not less than twelve passengers; by the Post Office; or on any scheduled flight.

31. The standard rate applies to the supply of water; the reduced rate to sewage services.
32. Exemption applies if supplied to joint owners or lessees of apartment buildings by a union of joint owners for the management of property.
33. 17·5 per cent. applies to supplies made to industry.
34. In general, sales of new housing are exempt except where they are sold by a building contractor.
35. 6 per cent. applies to housing for the handicapped; 12 per cent. applies to social housing.
36. There is the option to tax under certain conditions.
37. 4 per cent. applies to certain social housing.
38. 5 per cent. applies to certain constructions of housing by housing associations or local government bodies.
39. 3 per cent. applies to certain buildings defined as having official protection status; 6 per cent. applies to the joint supply dwellings and their garages and outbuildings.
40. The zero rate applies if sold by the constructor.
41. 12·5 per cent. applies if the property was developed since 31 October 1972 and if the input tax was entitled to be reclaimed.
42. The zero rate applies providing the building is listed and has been substantially reconstructed.

Charities

Mr. Burden: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what response he has made to the report of the Charities Tax Reform Group regarding the tax paid by charities in 1992; and if he will make a statement.

Sir John Cope: The hon. Member would not expect me to make a statement on taxation matters at this time.

Community Duties

Mr. Kinnock: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the policy of Her Majesty's Government towards encouraging employers to allow employees paid time off from work to permit them to fulfil elected and non-elected public and community duties on statutory bodies.

Mr. Dorrell: Employees who serve in a public capacity as specified in section 29 of the Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978 are generally entitled to reasonable time off work to carry out their duties. Whether they should be paid for such time off is for employers and employees to agree between themselves. However, we encourage employers who are able to assist employees to undertake these important duties by whatever means are appropriate to their circumstances.

Tax Fraud

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many prosecutions were brought in each of the last five years as the result of tax fraud; and how many of these related to false accounts and income returns.

Mr. Dorrell: I refer the hon. Member to the annual report of the board of Inland Revenue for 1992-93—Appendix 1, table 6—copies of which were laid before Parliament on 29 September 1993.

Manufacturing

Dr. Howells: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the latest gross domestic product figures for manufacturing in England, Scotland and Wales.

Mr. Nelson: Gross domestic product figures for manufacturing for England, Scotland and Wales for 1991 were published in the December 1992 issue of "Economic Trends".

More recent figures for United Kingdom manufacturing are available from the CSO database and can be accessed by the House of Commons Library.

The Scottish Office and Welsh Office publish their own quarterly series for manufacturing output. The latest Welsh figures were published on 13 October in a news release "Welsh Index of Production and Construction 2nd quarter 1993". Scottish figures were published on 10 November in a news release "Index of Production and Construction for Scotland for the second quarter 1993". These are also available from the House of Commons Library.

Similar information for England is not available.

Capital Allowances

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much the increase in first-year capital allowances for investment in plant and machinery which was announced in the autumn statement of 1992 to cover the period 1 November 1992 to the end of October 1993 cost in 1992-93; and how much it has cost so far in 1993-94.

Mr. Dorrell [holding answer 23 November 1993]: Available estimates of the direct revenue effects of enhanced capital allowances announced in the 1992 autumn statement are as follows:

1992-93	1993-94	1994-95	1995-96 (yield +ve/cost −ve)
nil	−200	−700	+50

The effects include enhanced allowances for industrial and agricultural buildings but the majority is accounted for by allowances for plant and machinery. The estimates are provisional. Information is not yet available from tax assessments for the relevant period.

EMPLOYMENT

Disabled People

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what plans the Government have to improve the employment prospects of disabled people.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The Government will continue to seek improved employment prospects for disabled people through a programme of educating and persuading employers as well as by providing wide-ranging and effective practical help. Specific plans include the introduction of "Access to Work" on 1 April 1994, which will provide more flexible employment help for a greater range of disabled people, for example, communication support for deaf people, and support workers for people with severe physical disabilities, mental illness or learning disabilities. We have also published a consultation document with proposals for improving the way in which the sheltered employment programme can help severely disabled people.

London University (Redundancies)

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list those colleges which are full schools of the university of London and have declined to pay redundant employees statutory redundancy pay in 1992 and 1993; and what action he proposes to take against colleges which have refused to reimburse his Department.

Miss Widdecombe: Disputes about entitlement to statutory redundancy payments are matters for the employer and employee(s) concerned, for determination by an industrial tribunal if necessary.

A statutory redundancy payment was made by the Department to a former employee of Goldsmiths' college in March 1993 following an award by an industrial tribunal. The provisions of the Employment Protection (Consolidation) Act 1978 enable the Department to seek recovery of the payment from the employer. The Department takes all reasonable steps to recover such debts.

ABB Transportation Ltd.

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many people made redundant by ABB Transportation Ltd. in York in the past three months have (a) claimed unemployment benefit, (b) been paid unemployment benefit, (c) had their unemployment benefit suspended and (d) had their unemployment benefit reinstated without loss of benefit.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service Agency under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from M. E. G. Fogden to Mr. Hugh Bayley, dated 24 November 1993:

As the Employment Service is an Executive Agency, the Secretary of State has asked me to write to you direct to respond to your Parliamentary Question to him about people made redundant by ABB Transportation Ltd. who had claimed unemployment benefit, been paid unemployment benefit, been suspended from payment of unemployment benefit, and whose unemployment benefit had been reinstated. This is something which falls within the responsibilities he has delegated to me as Chief Executive of the Agency.

Unfortunately, the information is not available. No records are kept on the number of clients claiming benefit who have been made redundant from a particular firm, or about the status of their claim. This information could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

I am sorry I cannot be of help on this occasion.

As decided by the Administration Committee of the House of Commons, Chief Executive replies to written Parliamentary Questions will now be published in the Official Report. I will also place a copy of this letter in the Library of the House.

Social Affairs Council

Mr. Duncan-Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the outcome of the EC Social Affairs Council held on 23 November.

Mr. David Hunt: I and the Minister of State for Employment attended the meeting of the Labour and Social Affairs Council held on 23 November.

Final agreement was reached on the draft directive on working time. The agreement retains all the key changes which the United Kingdom had secured in the earlier common position. In particular:

the right for individual workers to work more than 48 hours a week if they wish; that Sunday working should remain a matter for national law; and provision to allow company and plant agreements to derogate from the main provisions of the directive.

In the Government's view, however, the directive represents a misuse of the health and safety provisions of the Single European Act and accordingly the Government will be challenging the legal base of the directive in the European Court of Justice.

Final agreement was also reached on the draft directive on the protection of workers on board fishing vessels, following consideration of the European Parliament's comments.

The Council also reached a common position on the draft directive on the protection of young workers on which a political agreement to meet our concerns had been reached at the last Council. The common position confirms the United Kingdom's renewable option not to implement the key parts of articles 8 and 9 of the draft directive dealing with daily and weekly hours of work and restrictions on night work for 16 and 17-year-olds and ensures that young people below school leaving age can continue, as now, to undertake light work such as newspaper deliveries from the age of 13 on the same basis as at present.

The Council also discussed the draft directives on parental leave and on the burden of proof in the area of equal pay and equal treatment for women and men. On neither was an agreement reached. A number of member states, including the United Kingdom, continue to have difficulties with the proposals.

The Council also heard presentations from the Social Affairs Commissioner on his Green Paper on European social policy and on progress with the Commission's draft White Paper on growth, competitiveness and employment. He also reported that, on the draft directive on European works councils, the Commission had initiated the process of consultation under the agreement of the Eleven set out in the protocol to the Maastricht treaty. The Council was also given brief progress reports on the draft directives on non-standard employment and the posting of workers.

There was also a discussion on a proposed Community programme on social exclusion, to follow the current Poverty 3 programme. Opinions were divided on the timing of any new programme and the size of its budget.

Finally a declaration was agreed to mark the end of the European Year of Older People and Solidarity between Generations.

SCOTLAND

Farm Holdings

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many farm holdings were registered with his Department in September.

Sir Hector Monro: Including common grazings, the total of farm holdings recorded with the Scottish Office Agriculture and Fisheries Department on the agricultural census file on 22 November 1993 is 52,383. Since this file is continuously updated it is not possible to provide figures as at September. However, the September total is unlikely to be significantly different from the above quoted figure.

Agriculture Agencies

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many staff were employed within his Department and within agencies accountable to him dealing with agriculture in September.

Mr. Lang: At 1 October 1993 the number of staff employed within my Department and executive agencies dealing with agriculture was 1,046.

School Meals

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what are the results of the annual census of school meals in Scotland held in January 1993; and what were the corresponding 1992 results.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information is set out in the table. The number of pupils taking school meals has continued to increase, despite a fall in the number of pupils present on census day. Just over half the pupils present on census day took school meals with a further estimated 17·9 per cent. bringing their own food to school. Free meals formed 31 per cent. of the total meals provided. Cafeteria style meals remain more popular than two-course fixed meals.

[1]A number of pupils took neither school meals nor brought food to school. These pupils would generally either have gone home for lunch or have eaten out locally.

A detailed statement of the returns from education authorities from which these national figures are derived is being placed in the Library.

The following table shows, as a percentage of pupils attending their respective sectors, those primary and secondary pupils taking meals or bringing their own food.

Council Tax

Mr. Hutton: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many appeals against liability for the council tax have been made this year in Scotland; what is the average length of time taken to hear these appeals; and what proportion of appeals was successful.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 23 November 1993]: Scottish local authority finance departments have notified the Scottish Office of a total of six appeals against liability for the council tax, lodged in the period up to September 1993. All these appeals were withdrawn by the appellants.

Amkor Anam Europe Ltd.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how much money his Department has recovered in grant assistance from Amkor Anam Europe Ltd. following the closure of its Irvine plant in November 1992.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 23 November 1993]: I refer the hon. Member to my answer on 5 November, c. 241.

Maternity Benefits

Mr. Connarty: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will extend the provision of statutory maternity benefits to adoptive mothers.

Mr. Hague: I have been asked to reply.

Statutory maternity pay and maternity allowance provide a measure of earnings replacement to help working women give up work around the time of the birth in the interests of their own and their unborn baby's health. There are no plans to extend maternity benefits to mothers of adopted children.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Nuclear Reprocessing

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make it his policy to place on the agenda of the meeting between the European Community Foreign Affairs Council and the United States Government the proliferation consequences for global security policies of the planned expansion of reprocessing capacity at nuclear facilities in the EC.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The date and the agenda for the next meeting of the European Union Foreign Affairs Council and the United States Government have not yet been fixed.

Nuclear Weapons

Mr. Chisholm: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what pressure was exerted by United Kingdom representatives at the United Nations on delegates of the non-aligned movement in order to dissuade them from supporting that movement's resolution of November on the legality of nuclear weapons.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: None. We spoke to representatives of various countries about the proposed resolution and put to them our arguments against it.

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs by what means his Department keeps under review the prospects for entering British strategic nuclear weapons into multilateral disarmament negotiations.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: This is a matter primarily for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence. Our policy takes continually into account developments in the strategic environment, the effectiveness of measures designed to prevent the proliferation of nuclear weapons, and the need to maintain force levels sufficient to provide a credible minimum deterrent.

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what is his Department's position on the adoption of a policy of no first use of nuclear weapons by the United Kingdom;

(2) what consideration his Department is giving to the implications for (a) the United Kingdom and (b) NATO of the declaration of a policy of no first use of nuclear weapons by the United States of America.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence said in a speech on 16 November, we are deeply sceptical about the value of any such declaration, the implication of which would be that conventional aggression could be undertaken without fear of crossing the nuclear threshold.

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his assessment of the prospects of the Government entering British strategic nuclear weapons into multilateral nuclear disarmament negotiations.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: We see no immediate prospect of United Kingdom strategic nuclear weapons being entered into multilateral disarmament negotiations.

European Union

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he expects to publish a consolidated version of the treaty of Rome, as amended by the treaty of European Union, either together with or separate from the remaining parts of that treaty.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: A consolidated text of the treaty of Rome incorporating the amendments made by the treaty on European Union was published in the Official Journal of the European Communities (C244 Volume 35) on 31 August 1992. It has been available through HMSO outlets since that time. We have no present plans ourselves to publish a consolidated version of the treaty.

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the ways in which the United Kingdom has sought to honour its obligations under article VI of the non-proliferation treaty.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We have already announced significant reductions in our sub-strategic nuclear capability, including ending our role in deployment of Lance missile and nuclear artillery in Europe, ending our maritime tactical nuclear capability and a reduction of about 50 per cent. in the number of our nuclear free-fall bombs. In addition my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence announced on 16 November that each Trident submarine would carry no more than 96 warheads compared with the previous intention to carry no more than 128, and that the actual number might be significantly fewer. We believe that a comprehensive test ban and a convention prohibiting the production of fissile material for weapons purposes could, if widely applicable and effectively verifiable, make a valuable contribution to non-proliferation and we have made clear that we are prepared to work for the conclusion of such agreements.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is Her Majesty's Government's policy towards countries seeking to develop and deploy nuclear weapons for their own national self-defence.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: A total of 157 countries have already committed themselves to non-nuclear weapon status by acceding to the nuclear non-proliferation treaty as non-nuclear weapon states. We look to these states to honour their obligations under the treaty. We continue to urge the remaining 28 non-parties to the treaty to accede at the earliest possible date.

Mr. Chisholm: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the Government's attitude to the non-aligned movement's resolution on the legality of nuclear weapons submitted this month to the Disarmament Committee of the United Nations General Assembly.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The resolution was, in the end, not put to a vote. We believe anyway that the use of nuclear weapons would have to be judged as lawful or not in the light of the particular circumstances in which they were used and that therefore it would be wrong to burden the International Court of Justice with this hypothetical question.

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs by what means the declaration on the entry into force of the treaty on European Union made by the General Council of the European Community has been officially published and publicised in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: A copy of the declaration made by the European Council on the entry into force of the treaty on European Union has been deposited in the Library of the House, as has a copy of the report of the General Affairs Council on implementation of the treaty.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Scretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how he intends to implement the common foreign and security policy of the European Union in the interest of the United Kingdom.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: We will work with other member states to build on European political co-operation and ensure that intergovernmental co-operation under the common foreign and security policy works effectively. We will continue to press for an active common foreign and security policy in areas in which member states have important interests in common.

Argentina

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations his Department has received from (a) overseas Governments and (b) commercial companies with regard to the relaxation of the embargo on the sale of military equipment to Argentina.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Any discussions that take place with overseas Governments on the question of the sale of military equipment to Argentina are confidential. We are not aware of any approaches to the Department from commercial companies about a relaxation of the embargo on the sale of military equipment to Argentina.

Pakistan

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what further information he has received about Mr. Ghazanfer Ali in prison in Pakistan.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I wrote to the hon. Member for Bradford, West on 27 October with information on the three cases involving two murder charges and an illegal possession of firearms charge against Ghazanfer Ali. The cases have been further adjourned until 23 November, 7 and 11 December.

Government Communications Headquarters

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the situation at GCHQ arising from his recent meeting with civil service union leaders.

Mr. Hurd: I have had no such meeting. On 10 November, officials, including Sir Robin Butler, had a further meeting with the civil service unions. Various suggestions from both sides were discussed, but no agreement was reached.

Saudi Arabia

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations have been made to the Saudi Government to allow the same freedom of religion internally as that enjoyed by Saudi nationals in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We and our European Community partners consistently seek opportunities to discuss human rights, including freedom of worship, with the Saudi authorities, who can be in no doubt of the strength of our views on this issue. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs last did so during his visit to Saudi Arabia in September this year.

India

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next intends to meet the Indian Foreign Minister to discuss human rights in India.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: My right honourable Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs last met the Indian Foreign Minister in New Delhi on 15 November, when he discussed bilateral issues. There are no definite plans for their next meeting. He discussed human rights during meetings with the Indian Prime Minister and Home Minister in New Delhi on 15 November.

Hong Kong

Mr. Gale: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if Her Majesty's Government will give their support for the establishment of an endangered species task force in Hong Kong, under the auspices of the police and customs, to enforce domestic and international bans on trade in rhinoceros products; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: As a result of a recent review, the Hong Kong Government have decided to establish an endangered species protection liaison group with responsibility for information gathering, planning and co-ordination of enforcement operations and co-ordinating liaison with national and international agencies including non-governmental organisations.

We fully support these efforts by the Hong Kong Government to improve the enforcement of their endangered species legislation which includes a ban in trade in rhino products.

Human Rights

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he expects to issue his five-yearly report to the United Nations Human Rights Committee on British human rights; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The United Kingdom is due to submit its next report to the Human Rights Committee in August 1994.

European Institutes

Ms Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will give estimates for the number of jobs which will be created directly by each of the European institutes whose location was agreed at the European summit on 29 October.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Reliable estimates do not exist for staffing levels of all the institutions in question, although staff numbers will be constrained by budgetary limits. Jobs will not in all cases be fitted by new staff. We understand the position to be as follows:

European Environment Agency

The agency's first work programme will be agreed in mid-1994 and organisations will then be chosen as topic centres to carry out specific projects. Until then, it is not possible to estimate the number of jobs which could be created by the agency.

European Training Foundation

There is no information currently available about the likely staffing level of the European Training Foundation.

Office for Veterinary and Plant-health Inspection and Control

There is no information currently available about the likely staffing level of the Office for Veterinary and Plant-Health Inspection and Control.

European Monitoring Centre for Drugs and Drug Addiction

The Commission anticipates that the European Monitoring Centre for Drugs and Drug Addiction will create approximately 30 posts.

European Medicines Evaluation Agency

A report prepared for the Commission by independent consultants estimated that staffing levels would be up to 150 full-time staff in 1995 when the EMEA begins business, rising to some 250 by 1999.

Agency for Health and Safety at Work

There is no information currently available about the likely staffing level of the Agency for Health and Safety at Work.

European Monetary Institute/European Central Bank

It will be for the Council of the European Monetary Institute to decide on the number of staff employed in the Institute. The EMI's Council has not yet met to consider its staffing level.

Office for Harmonisation in the Internal Market

In 1990 the Commission, based on a study by consultants, estimated staff numbers at about 300.

Europol (and Europol Drugs Unit)

The Europol Drugs Unit is the pre-convention phase of Europol. Staffing numbers are still only estimates and cannot be clarified until 1 April 1994 when the Europol Drugs Unit moves out of its start-up phase. Estimates are that the Unit will start with about 30 members of staff, including support staff. This will be augmented by additional analysts, liaison officers and support staff as the work demands but is not expected to go beyond 60 to 70 in the pre-convention phase.

European Centre for the Development of Vocational Training (CEDEFOP)

Seventy six people are currently employed in CEDEFOP's Berlin seat. At the European Council on 29 October 1993 it was decided that CEDEFOP's seat should move to Thessaloniki. No change in staffing level is envisaged as a result of the move.

Plutonium Smuggling

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has received from his German counterpart on the evidence held against British citizen Albert Derbyshire on trial in Flensburg for smuggling plutonium from Russia.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Evidence against Mr. Derbyshire is available only to the prosecuting authorities and his defence lawyer. It is not available to foreign Governments. Mr. Derbyshire's guilt or innocence is a matter for the German courts and Mr. Derbyshire's lawyer.

COCOM

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) if he will make a statement on the future of COCOM;

(2) if he will make a statement on the matters discussed and decisions taken at the meeting of the co-ordinating committee on multilateral export controls held in The Hague on 16 November.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Representatives of the Governments participating in COCOM met in The Hague on 16 November. They agreed that COCOM should be terminated as soon as possible, but no later than 31 March 1994. There was also broad agreement that at the same time, new arrangements should be established to promote transparency and responsibility in the transfer of armaments and related dual use goods: the details of the new arrangements remain to be decided.

Civil Servants

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list for each civil service grade in his Department (a) the total number of persons employed and (b) the total number of women employed.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: As at 1 April 1993, the number of persons and the number of women employed in each grade within this Department, including agencies, was:

El Salvador

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what monitoring his Department is undertaking of the election process in El Salvador.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: We have appointed Dr. David Browning as the British Government's observer of the elections in El Salvador in March. He is there now, observing preparations, and will return for the elections. Our ambassador continues to monitor all aspects of the electoral process.

Western Sahara

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action his Department is undertaking to ensure the compliance of the relevant parties to the United States resolutions on the western Sahara.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We will continue to urge both sides to co-operate with the UN Secretary-General in implementing the UN settlement plan.

Indonesia

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations have been made to the Government of Indonesia concerning human rights in East Timor.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: In our contacts with the Indonesian authorities, and in the relevant international bodies, we and our European Community partners have, on numerous occasions, underlined our concern that human rights should be respected in East Timor. The matter was raised most recently on 23 November with the Indonesian Minister for Research and Technology during his visit to the United Kingdom.

Antarctica

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to bring forward legislation to repeal the Antarctic Minerals Act 1989 and to ratify the Antarctic environmental protocol; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: We intend that a provision to repeal the Antarctic Minerals Act 1989 should be included in a Bill to give effect to the environmental protection protocol to the Antarctic treaty. We hope that this Bill can be introduced at an early opportunity.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Fraud

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) if he will give (a) the number of staff engaged in his Department on fraud prevention work, (b) the amount of money saved as a result, (c) the unit cost ratio of cost to benefit and (d) the number of cases in which fraud was detected and the number of prosecutions which resulted in each of the last 10 years;

(2) if he will give (a) the number of people arrested for DSS fraud or abuse, (b) the number of cases where no further action was taken, (c) the number cautioned, (d) the number of people charged by the police, (e) the number of cases sent to the Crown prosecution service, (f) the number of cases discontinued by the Crown prosecution service, (g) the number of cases completed in the magistrates court, (h) the number of convictions and (i) the number acquitted at court, for each year since 1979;

(3) what is the target for fraud savings in his Department for 1993-94 and 1994-95; how these figures are arrived at; if he will break them down into amounts of (a) sector fraud and (b) organised fraud, and give the amounts for each of the main benefits, the multiplier used and any other relevant factors contributing to the target figure; and what percentage and amount of the figure will come from housing benefit payments;

(4) if he will give details of the various multipliers used by his Department in calculating fraud savings and the circumstances in which these are applied.

Mr. Hague: The administration of benefit fraud is a matter for Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member with such information as is available.

Letter from Michael Bichard to Mr. Donald Dewar, dated 24 November 1993:

As Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency, it is my responsibility to answer questions about relevant operational matters. I am therefore replying to your recent Parliamentary Questions to the Secretary of State for Social Security asking about benefit fraud.

The full range of information requested is not available in every instance but I hope that you will find the following helpful. It may be helpful if I deal with each question in turn.

Your first question asks about the number of staff employed on fraud prevention and the results achieved.

From October this year I have established a new security Branch in Leeds with a responsibility to ensure a co-ordinated and strategic approach to fraud and security matters, and to protect programme expenditure against fraud and abuse.

The Department of Social Security's strategy for combatting fraud is based on three principles:

PREVENTION minimising/eliminating opportunities for Fraud

DETECTION catching those who try to cheat the system

DETERRENCE persuading potential fraudsters that it is wrong and not worth the risk.

Along with their other duties, staff in many parts of the Department and its Agencies are concerned with fraud prevention. For example, the way in which claims for benefit are processed, or payments are made, can help to protect the system against abuse. Resources devoted to this general anti-fraud work are not separately identified.

However, figures for the specialist fraud commands within the Benefits Agency are available. As at 31 March 1993 Sector Fraud employed 2,837 staff in the prevention and detection of fraud and abuse. Organised Fraud, a specialist unit set up to investigate suspected organised fraud, employed about 240.

In the year ending 31 March 1993 sector Fraud recorded total savings of £516 million, made up of weekly benefit savings of £491 million, and instrument of payment savings of £25 million, at a cost of £64·7 million. In the same period Organised Fraud recorded total savings of £42 million and cost £7·7 million.

The fraud organisation was set up in its present form only in January 1991 and although it is constantly refining the way in which statistics are maintained, figures for the number of cases in which fraud was detected. However, I am able to tell you from the sector fraud figures available that in the year ending 31 March 1992 approximately 250,000 cases were successfully investigated and resulted in a saving of public funds. In the same year 4,379 prosecutions were undertaken. In the year ending 31 March 1993 the figures were approximately 270,000 investigations and 5,239 prosecutions.

The prosecutions undertaken in the last ten years are as follows:

	Number
1983-84	8,997
1984-85	6,702
1985-86	6,679
1986-87	6,603
1987-88	7,231
1988-89	8,222
1989-90	8,671
1990-91	7,911
1991-92	[1]4,379
1992-93	5,814

[1] Figures are not available for organised fraud for 1991-92.

The Department operates a selective and humane prosecution policy. It is felt that it is more important to check the abuse of the system than to mount expensive prosecutions where, having full regard to the nature of the offence and the debt involved, it would not be cost effective to do so. Steps are being taken to strike a better balance between the benefit savings achieved and the prosecutions undertaken.

Your second question asks about cases which were considered for prosecution by the Department or the Police.

In the year ending 31 March 1993 Organised Fraud's activities led to the arrest of 1,400 people, of whom 575 were subsequently prosecuted. Of these 575 prosecutions, 556 (97 per cent.) were successful with over 200 receiving custodial sentences ranging from six months to eight years.

Police arrest is a very extreme measure normally used only in dealing with criminals involved in organised fraud, and has little or no relevance to the work of sector fraud and the customers of the Benefits Agency with whom they come into contact in the course of their investigations.

The Department's policy towards fraud is to detect it rapidly, investigate it efficiently and to prosecute offenders where appropriate. Prosecutions are handled by the laying of information and summons. I have quoted our prosecution figures since 1983-84 above.

I regret that statistics on arrests are not kept in a way which would enable me to answer your detailed enquiry.

Your third and fourth questions ask about the targets set for fraud savings, how these figures have been arrived at and details of the multipliers used in calculating them.

Instrument of Payment savings are not subject to any multiplier and all such savings are recorded at face value.

A multiplier of 32 weeks is applied to the amount of weekly Benefit Savings recorded as a result of other successful fraud investigations or interventions. This single multiplier is currently applied to all benefits payable by the Department and reflects the anticipated average period for which claims could be expected to run in the absence of a successful fraud intervention.

Given the nature of the work of Organised Fraud, no formal target is set for that organisation. Although Organised Fraud do achieve and record benefit savings its role has a large element of prevention and a target in monetary terms is not appropriate.

The target set for the Sector Fraud organisation is based mainly on previous years' achievements using empirical data and is set by the Secretary of State taking into account the resources which are available for the anti-fraud effort.

The target for 1993-94 is £557 million and early indications are that the target will be achieved. The target for 1994-95 has not been finalised but is likely to be higher than this year.

The targets are set as a global figure and are not broken down into the various benefits.

I would draw your attention to the Report "Fighting Fraud in 1992-93" which gives fuller detail of the fraud effort for that year.

I hope you find this reply helpful. A copy will appear in the Official Report and a copy will be placed in the Library.

Maxwell Insolvency Practitioners

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when the Government will respond to the Fourth Report of the Social Security Select Committee of Session 1992-93 on the work of the Maxwell insolvency practitioners, HC 835; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hague: The Government's response to the Select Committee's report is published today. We welcome the Committee's continued interest in the Maxwell affair and share its view that this is an exceptional case. We also welcome the Committee's recognition of the value of the measures we have taken in response to the plight of the Maxwell pensioners, which have ensured that pensions have been kept in payment while work to recover the missing pension fund assets continues.

The Government recognise that the pension scheme trustees and the liquidators of Bishopsgate Investment Management Ltd. have had to undertaken a vast amount of work in unravelling the huge amount of complex information surrounding pension scheme transactions in order to establish claims against employers and others. This work has now been largely completed. Writs have been issued against some financial institutions.

The Government strongly support the initiative taken by the Maxwell Pensioners Trust to promote an overall settlement to the disputes. A speedy settlement must be in everyone's best interests, especially the pensioners.

Chief Adjudication Officer

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he will publish the ninth annual report of the Chief Adjudication Officer; and if he will make a statment.

Mr. Lilley: The report is being published today. The report's findings point to an improvement in some areas of adjudication, particularly on many of the benefits administered in Benefits Agency districts. Standards of adjudication within the child benefit centre, the Newcastle pensions directorate and the overseas benefit directorate remain high. The report also acknowledges the contribution that the Employment Service's quality control package has made to initiatives aimed at improving adjudication.

But in other areas standards are disappointing. I have accordingly sought assurances from the chief executives of the Employment Service Agency and the Benefits Agency that work is in hand urgently to address the weaknesses identified. I am pleased to note that numerous initiatives are already in place, including, in the Employment Service, a working group on the evidence needed to establish entitlement and, in the Benefits Agency, the requirement that district business plans are specific about adjudication standards.

I am satisfied that both the Employment Service and the Benefits Agency are committed to better standards of adjudication and the increased emphasis on quality in agency business plans for 1993-94 and I look forward to progress in coming years. The chief adjudication officer has commented in his report on the commitment of senior management to improving adjudication standards and welcomes all measures designed to effect such improvements.

Eleven recommendations to address certain of the problems identified in the report have been made by the chief adjudication officer. These recommendations are being considered and a formal response will be made in due course.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Nominal Rental Charges

Mr. Allen: To ask the Chairman of the Finance and Services Committee what consideration has been given to calculating nominal rental charges for hon. Members' offices and for the rifle range; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Channon: None.

Members' Rooms

Mr. Allen: To ask the Chairman of the Accommodation and Works Committee how many hon. Members have more than one room in the parliamentary precincts.

Mr. Ray Powell: Five.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Business (Ethnic Minorities)

5. Ms Abbott: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans he has to help ethnic minority business.

Mr. Sainsbury: All the schemes and support funded by my Department to assist businesses are available to ethnic minority businesses.

Exports

15. Mr. Evennett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he last met the Confederation of British Industry to discuss exports; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Needham: When my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade addressed the CBI's annual conference on 15 November he outlined the major improvements he has been making to the Department's export promotion efforts.

Deregulation

17. Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the progress of his deregulation proposals.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for High Peak (Mr. Hendry).

34. Mr. Steen: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many officials are employed in deregulation duties in his Department.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: At present 50 people, including secondees from the private sector, are employed in the deregulation unit. In addition, officials in all Government Departments are reviewing regulations for which they are responsible.

Exports (Japan)

19. Dr. Spink: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the current level of exports to Japan.

Mr. Needham: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave earlier today to my hon. Friend the Member for Gosport (Mr. Viggers).

Paper Recycling

21. Mr. Battle: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what proposals his Department has for supporting the recycling paper and cardboard industry.

Mr. McLoughlin: The producer responsibility initiative launched by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment and myself is beginning to result in actions which should help to sustain the recycling infrastructure for paper and board. We are continuing to press the EC Commission to expedite consideration of industries' complaints concerning the German packaging ordinance.

Steel Subsidies

23. Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what recent discussions he has had with his EC counterparts with a view to eliminating state subsidies throughout the steel industry.

Mr. Sainsbury: At the Industry Council on 18 November, I stressed the importance of eliminating operating cost subsidies throughout the EC steel industry. The Council was unable to reach agreement on six requests for derogations from the steel state aids code. The formal conclusions of the 21 September Industry Council had confirmed the obligation to apply this code, and made particular reference to eliminating cost subsidies.

Trade (Eastern Europe)

24. Ms Quin: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what new measures he is proposing to take to increase trade between the United Kingdom and eastern Europe.

Mr. Needham: My Department already provides a range of services to encourage greater trade between the United Kingdom and eastern Europe, including the former Soviet Union. The measures include support for outward missions—sometimes led ministerially—and participation in overseas trade fairs as well as the provision of general and specific information and advice about the markets and the opportunities in them.

The major reorganisation of DTI export services earlier this year has enhanced the services provided by the Department. Each of the six major markets in eastern Europe—those in the United Kingdom's list of the top 80 United Kingdom export markets—is now served by a dedicated desk officer. In addition, five of the export promoters—private sector secondees—taken on by the Department are already working closely with the relevant market branch to help United Kingdom companies find business in the region.

A detailed list of all DTI assistance to exporters is included in the British Overseas Trade Board annual report 1992-93. A copy has been placed in the Library of the House.

Manufacturing Industry

25. Mr. Corbett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what plans he has to meet the Engineering Employers Federation to discuss policies designed to improve capital investment in manufacturing industry; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Heseltine: I met representatives of the EEF earlier this year to discuss their proposals for improving the competitiveness of United Kingdom manufacturing. The federation continues to have frequent contact with Ministers and senior officials in my Department.

Recession

26. Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is his Department's assessment of the effects of the recent recession on business and employment in south-east England.

Mr. Sainsbury: The recession affected all parts of the country, including the south-east. Its impact on the service sector was noticeable in the south-east where service industries are a significant element in the regional economy.

Exports (Non-tariff Barriers)

27. Mr. Stephen: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what action he is taking to protect British companies against non-tariff barriers to their exports.

Mr. Needham: A prime objective of the current GATT Uruguay round market access negotiations is the substantial reduction or elimination of non-tariff barriers by all participants. The Government fully support this objective and the European Commission, which negotiates on behalf of the European Community, continues to press trading partners for major concessions on non-tariff barriers.

Small Businesses (Regulation)

28. Mr. Deva: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assessment has been made of the damage to small companies by excessive regulation.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: This is impossible to quantify at the moment. Our analysis of existing regulations is not yet complete. We have, however, received a great deal of evidence showing that the cumulative burden of regulation diverts the money and time of small firms management into unproductive channels.

Business Link

29. Mr. Trend: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what progress has been made with business link; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin: Business links are open in Birmingham and Leicester, where local companies have a single point of access to a wide range of business support services. Plans have been approved in principle for the development of business links in 17 areas which will lead to a further 50 business link outlets. By the end of this Parliament I expect to see in place a national network of more than 200 business links.

Telecommunications Licences

30. Mrs. Mahon: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is his policy on the issue of new licences for telecommunications operations.

Mr. McLoughlin: The Government's policy on the issue of new licences for telecommunications operations continues to be based on the 1991 White Paper "Competition and Choice: Telecommunications Policy for the 1990s" (Cm 1461). Class licences, which do not require an individual application, cover the provision of a wide range of telecoms services, while applications for individual licences are considered on their merits.

Aerospace Industry

31. Mr. Gallie: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what steps he is taking to achieve open and fair markets for the British aerospace industry.

Mr. Sainsbury: My Department is liaising actively with the Commission, our European partners, and the United Kingdom aerospace industry on the GATT civil aerospace negotiations in order to bring about a more open international market for civil aircraft, engines, and equipment.

Single Market

32. Mr. Ian Taylor: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what discussions he has had with the Confederation of British Industry about progress of the single market.

Mr. Needham: The President of the Board of Trade attended and addresed the CBI national conference on 15 November. Officials have frequent and intensive discussions with the CBI about ensuring the proper functioning of the single market.

Foam-filled Furniture

33. Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he has received further representations from firms manufacturing foam and foam-filled furniture about the dangers of low-quality imports.

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what representations he has had from United Kingdom furniture manufacturers about the risks from imported foam-filled furniture.

Mr. McLoughlin: Three identifiable businesses responding to the recent consultation on the Furniture and Furnishings (Fire) (Safety) Regulations 1988, as amended, as part of my Department's deregulation initiative review alleged that some imported foam-filled furniture does not comply with the regulations. The regulations apply to all domestic upholstered furniture intended for supply to the United Kingdom market, and accordingly local authority trading standards officers, who have day-to-day responsibility for enforcement of the legislation, have powers to deal with any non-complying furniture, whatever its country of manufacture.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what changes his Department is considering to existing legislation on the use of fire-retardant foam in furniture.

Mr. McLoughlin [holding answer 23 November 1993]: The Furniture and Furnishings (Fire) (Safety) Regulations 1988, as amended, which include requirements for the use of fire retardant foam in domestic upholstered furniture, are being considered as part of the overall review of legislation under the deregulation initiative announced by my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade in February this year. In considering whether any changes to these regulations are necessary my Department will take account of the responses to the recently completed consultation with individual businesses, trade associations, local authorities, fire prevention, medical and consumer interests.

RECHAR 2

35. Mr. William O'Brien: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the Government's approach to Rechar 2.

Mr. Sainsbury: The European Commission circulated a Green Paper in June this year on the "Future of European Structural Funds Community Initiatives". We anticipate discussion will take place on this in a forthcoming Council of Ministers.

Gas (Competition)

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he last met the Director General of Gas Supply to discuss competition in the gas industry.

Mr. Eggar: I last met the new Director General on 28 October to discuss a range of issues.

Car Dealing

Mr. Cousins: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when the trading practices of car manufacturers with regard to car dealerships and car retailing were last reviewed by his Department; what conclusions were reached; and when he next proposes to review this matter again.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: These matters were investigated by the Monopolies and Mergers Commission in its report on the supply of new motor cars within the United Kingdom, published in February 1992.

The report concluded, inter alia, that a complex monopoly situation existed, arising from the selective and exclusive distribution system used by most car suppliers in the United Kingdom. The MMC identified a number of restrictions imposed by suppliers in their agreements with dealers which might be expected to operate against the public interest.

The Director General of Fair Trading and Department of Trade and Industry have negotiated with the major car suppliers with a view to concluding an undertaking on the MMC's recommendations. My right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade is currently considering options for taking forward action on this report.

Anthrax Vaccine

Mr. Cousins: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the volume and value of anthrax vaccine exports each year from 1987.

Mr. Needham: The information requested is not available from official sources because the United Kingdom trade classification does not separately identify anthrax vaccines. The manufacturers of anthrax vaccines in the United Kingdom report no exports during the last five years. Information prior to that could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Sellafield

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when his Department received a copy of the environmental statement for the proposed Sellafield mixed oxide nuclear fuel plant from British Nuclear Fuels plc.

Mr. Eggar: My Department receives communications from British Nuclear Fuels plc on a wide range of issues. These have included a copy of the published environmental statement for the proposed plant referred to by the hon. Member.

Energy Policy

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will place in the Library a copy of the speech on energy policy made to a conference in London on 17 November by the Minister of Energy.

Mr. Eggar: I have today placed a copy of my speech of 17 November in the Library of the House.

EC Internal Market Council

Ms Quin: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the outcome of the EC Internal Market Council of 11 November.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the matters discussed and the decisions taken, indicating the voting record of member states, at the European Trade Council on 11 November.

Mr. Needham: My noble Friend the Minister for Consumer Affairs and Small Firms attended the second Internal Market Council of the Belgian Presidency in Brussels on 11 November.

The Council formally adopted without change all three food additive common positions—colours, additives and sweeteners—agreed at the Internal Market Council on 27 September. It also agreed a common position on equipment for use in explosive atmospheres.

A common position was adopted unanimously on the amendment to directive 83/189/EEC on the provision of information on technical standards and regulations.

A common position was adopted on the footwear labelling directive which will allow manufacturers a choice between pictograms and textual labelling. Germany voted against and the Netherlands abstained.

A resolution for a more global approach to the problems of small and medium-sized enterprises was agreed in principle. The resolution also commits the Council to hold an annual debate on enterprise policy in the Community, particularly with regard to SMEs. A wide-ranging televised open debate included discussion on improving SMEs' access to finance and Community R and D programmes.

The Council was unable to reach agreement on a Presidency compromise proposal on the language regime for the Community Trade Mark Office to implement the European Council decision on a five language regime. The Presidency is to reflect further on the matter.

The Commission presented a proposal for a new regulation laying down improved measures to prohibit the import, transit or export of counterfeit or pirated goods. The Presidency agreed that the regulation would, if possible, be discussed at the 16 December Internal Market Council.

The Commission circulated new implementation figures and highlighted the overall improvement in implementation of single market measures this year. The United Kingdom is in second place with implementation of 91·5 per cent., two points behind Denmark.

The next formal meeting of the Council will take place on 16 December.

Wind Power

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how his Department's energy technology support unit was represented at the conference on wind power development in rural areas held in Stoneleigh on 11 November.

Mr. Eggar: The "Wind Energy On Your Farm" conference, held at Stoneleigh on 11 November 1993, was sponsored by the energy technology support unit on behalf of this Department.

One of the presentations to the conference was given by an ETSU representative.

Civil Servants

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list for each civil service grade in his Department (a) the total number of persons employed and (b) the total number of women employed.

Mr. Eggar: The figures for the Department, including its executive agencies and the former Department of Energy, as at 2 October 1993, are:

Grade level	Total number of employees	Total number of women
Grade 1	2	0
Grade 2	13	0
Grade 3	54	6
Grade 4	15	2
Grade 5	284	38
Grade 6	384	44
Grade 7	1,155	168
SEO	1,073	170
HEO	2,028	586
EO	2,324	1,004
AO	3,187	2,035
AA	2,573	1,755
Industrial	157	10
Total	13,249	5,818

Copper

Mr. William Ross: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will publish a table to show the volume and value of (a) copper tubing and (b) copper pipe connectors imported into the United Kingdom in each of the last three years for which figures are available.

Mr. Needham: The available information is given in the following table.

United Kingdom imports of copper tubing and copper pipe connectors

	1990	1991	1992
Copper tubing[1]
Volume (thousand metric tonnes)	41·4	40·6	40·5
Value (£ million)	104·8	93·0	87·9
Copper pipe connectors[2]

National Newspapers

Mr. Allen: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will refer the concentration of ownership of national newspapers to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: No. The Director General of Fair Trading recently considered the structure and characteristics of the market for newspapers in the context of allegations of predatory pricing and abuse of market power by News International. He announced on 14 October that he would not be initiating formal action under the competition legislation.

Fireworks

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what percentage of fireworks sold in Britain was manufactured abroad for each year since 1980; and which countries are the main exporters of fireworks to Britain.

Mr. Needham: The information requested is not available.

Bills (Payment)

Mrs. Roche: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many representations have been received by his Department urging him to legislate for the payment of bills by fixed dates.

Mr. McLoughlin: This information is not available. Representations have been received from individual small businesses and from other interested organisations seeking action to reduce the incidence of late payment, including legislation for a statutory maximum credit period, a statutory right to interest on overdue commercial debt or a combination of these.

Manufacturing

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what are the current growth areas in manufacturing industry; what volume of business is involved; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury: Manufacturing output in the third quarter of 1993 was 1·6 per cent. higher than in the same period of 1992. The performance of individual broad sectors, and their relative sizes, is shown in the table.

Sector		Weights in Index of Production[1]	Change in output Q3/92 to Q3/93 (Per cent.)
DF:	Coke, ref petrol and nuclear fuels	23	−0·4
DG:	Chemicals and manmade fibres	86	3·5
DJ:	Basic metals and metal products	74	−2·4
DK DM:	Engineering and allied industries	302	2·5
DA:	Food, drink and tobacco	110	−1·0
DB DC:	Textiles, leather and clothing	47	0·7
DD DN:	Other manufacturing	202	2·9
D:	All Manufacturing	844	1·6

Fire Safety

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what changes his Department is considering to existing legislation on the need for children's nightwear to be fire retardant.

Mr. McLoughlin [holding answer 23 November 1993]: The Nightwear (Safety) Regulations 1985, which include requirements for children's nightwear to be fire retardant, are being considered as part of the overall review of legislation under the deregulation initiative announced by my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade in February this year. In considering whether any changes to these regulations are necessary my Department will take account of the responses to the recently completed consultation with individual businesses, trade associations, local authorities, fire prevention, medical and consumer interests.

DEFENCE

Equipment Contracts

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list all orders for fuses, ammunition and other equipment placed by or on behalf of his Department with Gebruder Junshans of Germany, A. S. Raufoss of Norway, Fratelli Borletti of Italy and the royal ordnance factory, Blackburn, from 1975 to date, giving in each case the value of the order, the type of fuse, ammunition, or other equipment concerned whether the order had been subject to competitive tendering, allocation or negotiation without competitive tendering, the dates on which the orders were placed, when they were completed and if any part of the order has still to be delivered.

Mr. Aitken: I will write to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what steps are taken by his Department to cancel contracts and otherwise to discipline suppliers and manufacturers of equipment where there is evidence that such contracts have been gained by bribery, corruption or other breaches of procurement rules.

Mr. Aitken: If it is proven that the award of any MOD contract has resulted directly from bribery, corruption or other irregular practices, my Department has the legal right to cancel it if it is still in existence, and would normally do so. My Department would also take any other action against the contractor concerned which was appropriate to the circumstances of the case, including seeking full financial restitution and considering the basis of any future dealings with them.

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the posts held by Mr. Gordon Foxley, with dates and the responsibilities which each post entailed.

Mr. Aitken: I will write to the hon. Gentleman.

Indonesia

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what representations he has made to the Government of Indonesia in regard to the restrictions on movement of indigenous people imposed by the Indonesian authorities prior to and during the visit by the United Kingdom military attaché in Jakarta to East Timor in early November.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I have been asked to reply.

We are not aware of any restrictions on movement of the indigenous people imposed in connection with the recent visit to East Timor of defence attachés based in Jakarta.

HEALTH

NHS Estate

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the total number of acres owned by the national health service estate for each year since 1979.

Mr. Sackville: The available information is shown in the table:

Estimated acres owned by the national health service

	Land area Acres
1988-89	41,654
1989-90	41,617
1990-91	41,296
1991-92	40,508

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the total value of the national health service estate for each year since 1979 at 1993 prices.

Mr. Sackville: The following valuations for the total value of the national health service estate are the only figures available, based on exercises undertaken by the Valuation Office Agency. Figures for 1987 and 1989 have been converted to price levels prevailing at the time of the 1 April 1992 valuation.

Valuation date	Amount £
25 June 1987	22,260,000,000
31 December 1989	22,770,000,000
1 April 1992	21,447,463,000

Source: Valuation Office Agency.
Note: Figures for 1987 and 1989 are represented at 1992 prices.

Hospital Waiting Lists

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many patients for each of the four regional health authorities covering the Greater London area have been waiting for over 12 months, 18 months and 24 months for in-patient hospital treatment at the latest available date.

Dr. Mawhinney: Information on waiting times for the four Thames regional health authorities which cover the London area is given in "Hospital Waiting List Statistics: England", published twice yearly. The latest published figures are for March 1993. In addition provisional figures for the quarter ending 30 September 1993 were published on 1 November, in press release H93/1036. Copies of both documents are available in the Library.

Midwives

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations she has received from the Royal College of Midwives about midwives travelling alone at night to clients' houses; and what steps are being taken to ensure that employing health authorities adopt safe working procedures.

Mr. Sackville: We have received no such representations.

Food Safety

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether regulations on food safety are being reconsidered under the Government's new proposals for deregulation.

Mr. Sackville: Yes. As part of the Government's deregulation initiative and in conjunction with the Department, the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food issued the "Food Law Deregulation Plan" on 14 September, copies of which are available in the Library. The plan was drawn up following consultation with industry, enforcers and consumers. Its aim is to move to a less regulatory system of food law by removing from business, requirements that are no longer justified, whilst maintaining essential standards of food safety and consumer protection.

Bureaucracy

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps she intends to take to reduce bureaucracy within NHS hospitals and trusts.

Dr. Mawhinney: It is expected that after 1 April 1995 virtually all national health service hospital care will be provided by trusts. As trusts have to compete for contracts from purchasing authorities for the provision of care, their management should have the most cost-effective structure possible which is compatible with the proper discharge of their function.

Creuzfeldt Jakob Dementia

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will establish a scheme of no fault compensation for those who have contracted Creuzfeldt Jakob disease as a result of human growth hormone treatment, and for their families; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Sackville: No. I refer the hon. Member to the reply that my hon. Friend the Member for Suffolk, South (Mr. Yeo) gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Faversham (Sir R. Moate) on 27 May at column 671.

"Making London Worse"

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action she proposes to take in respect of the publication "Making London Worse" by the Greater London Association of Community Health Councils.

Dr. Mawhinney: The Greater London Association of Community Health Councils recently published a report. We welcome the views of any informed contributor such as the association on the process of developing London's health services through positive change. The Government policy framework is set out in "Making London Better."

Adoptive Mothers

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans she has to extend the provision of statutory maternity benefits to adoptive mothers.

Mr. Hague: I ahve been asked to reply. Statutory maternity pay and maternity allowance provide a measure of earnings replacement to help working women give up work around the time of the birth in the interests of their own and their unborn baby's health. There are no plans to extend maternity benefits to mothers of adopted children.

Written Answers to Questions

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

"A New Framework for Local Justice"

Mr. Tracey: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what is his assessment of the costs of implementing the decisions under the White Paper, "A New Framework for Local Justice".

Mr. John M. Taylor: The cost of implementing the White Paper reforms will largely depend on decisions taken locally by magistrates courts committees. However, we estimate the cost of implementing the package of reforms to be in the region of £5 million. These transitional costs will be more than offset in due course through increased efficiency, but in the meantime the Government will ensure that the overall funding of the service takes account of any additional costs.

Chief Justices' Clerks

Mr. Tracey: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what is his assessment of the cost of the establishment of the office of chief justices' clerk across the country.

Mr. John M. Taylor: The cost of the establishment of the post of chief justices' clerk will largely depend on decisions taken locally by magistrates courts committees, and by the size of particular areas and organisations. The indicative start-up costs of the changes planned for the magistrates courts were referred to in the Government's White Paper "A New Framework for Local Justice" as around £5 million. It is expected that some of the costs attributable to the appointment of chief justices' clerks will be met by a reallocation of resources rather than additional expenditure. Inquiries made in several areas where shadow chief justices' clerks have already been appointed indicate that the resulting savings can exceed the costs.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Nuclear Weapons

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proposals his Department has for achieving further progress towards the goals set out in article VI of the non-proliferation treaty.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We have demonstrated our readiness to reduce our nuclear force levels wherever we can. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for defence announced on 16 November that each Trident submarine would carry no more than 96 warheads compared with the previous intention to carry no more than 128, and that the actual number might be significantly fewer. We believe that a comprehensive test ban and a convention prohibiting the production of fissile material for weapons purposes could, if widely applicable and effectively verifiable, make a valuable contribution to non-proliferation and we have made clear that we are prepared to work for the conclusion of such agreements.

Mr. Amanullah Khan

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many times to date, since May 1990, Mr. Amanullah Khan, a Pakistani national, has applied to enter the United Kingdom as a visitor; and how many times any such applications have been (a) granted and (b) refused.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: In the absence of any information in London about visa applications by Mr. Amanullah Khan, I have asked posts in the sub-continent to let me have a report. I shall arrange for the hon. Member to receive a substantive reply from the migration and visa correspondence unit of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office as soon as possible.

Medical Precursors

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the question of lifting the ban on the importation of medical precursors into Serbia and Montenegro was last discussed by the United Nations Security Council sanctions committee; what decision was taken; and what was the position of Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The question of lifting the ban on the importing of medical precursors into Serbia and Montenegro was last discussed by the United Nations sanctions committee on 21 May 1993 following an approach to the committee by the Government of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. Agreement in the committee could not be reached.

The United Kingdom Government representative to the sanctions committee has never raised an objection to applications put to the committee for imports of medical precursors, but as the committee works on the basis of consensus we recognise that if any member of the committee wishes to hold or block a request they have the right to do so.

Bosnia

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what recent communications he has received from the Bosnian Muslim authorities; what replies he has given; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The only recent communication we have had with the Bosnian Government was about the know-how fund. We welcome the opportunity to meet representatives from all the Bosnian parties at the European Union meeting in Geneva on 29 November.

Gas

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the importation of gas from Russia to Serbia was last discussed by the United Nations Security Council sanctions committee; what was the result of that discussion; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The importing of gas from Russia to Serbia was last discussed at the United Nations sanctions committee meeting on 23 September 1993. The application was for gas to produce fertilisers. The committee blocked the request as it considered the gas an input to industry.

The question of the export of energy-related items to the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia for humanitarian purposes has been regularly discussed by the sanctions committee. The committee has ruled that it will consider applications for these items only when full details of the stocks of such items currently held by the Serbians are provided to the committee. Despite receiving this request in October 1992 the Serbians have yet to provide such details. No imports have therefore been agreed.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Overseas Visits

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how many visits abroad he has made during 1993; and what was (a) the cost to the taxpayer and (b) the purpose of each visit.

Mr. Brooke: During 1993 I have twice visited Paris, on the first occasion accompanying the chairman of the Arts Council to look at French approaches to public architecture and participative public education about it, the second to open the British Tourist Authority's "Maison de la Grande Bretagne". The cost of these visits was £536·10 and £516·09 respectively. I have also been to Brussels for two meetings of EC culture Ministers; the cost of the first of these visits was £701·95 and of the second will be in the region of £700.

TRANSPORT

Road Traffic Forecasts

Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he next proposes to review his Department's national road traffic forecasts.

Mr. Key: The current forecasts, published in 1989, remain the Government's best view of the likely future growth in traffic. The forecasts and the methodology behind them are, however, kept under regular review. The Department is currently commissioning research to examine possible improvements to the methodology, and has made arrangements for experts in traffic modelling and other relevant fields to provide advice for the same purpose.

Rail Privatisation

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he is taking to encourage employees of BR to bid for franchises on management buy-out for services in East Anglia.

Mr. Freeman: Financial assistance will be available towards the costs of formulating MEBO bids. British Rail will reimburse costs on a scale of 85 per cent. of the first £10,000 of costs and 75 per cent. of the remainder, up to a maximum of £100,000 for each bid team.

While the Railways Act 1993 enables BR to be franchisee, it also empowers the franchising director not to invite BR to bid if he considers that desirable for the purpose, inter alia, of promoting the award of franchises to MEBOs.

Vehicle Excise Duty

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what estimate he has made of the number of people who evade vehicle excise duty each year; and what is the cost of this evasion to Her Majesty's Treasury.

Mr. Key: The number of unlicensed vehicles in use on the public roads at the end of December 1992 was estimated at just under 1·3 million. The latest information indicates that over 96 per cent. of VED payable is collected. The revenue loss to the Exchequer through VED evasion for 1992-93 was estimated at around £130 million.

Sir Christopher Foster

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport on what criteria Sir Christopher Foster was appointed to the Board of Railtrack; at what salary; how many days work per week is involved; and for how long the appointment will last.

Mr. Freeman: My right hon. Friend announced on 16 November the names of a number of prospective non-executive members of the Railtrack board, including Sir Christopher Foster. They are to be appointed when the company is incorporated at the end of February 1994. Sir Christopher has extensive relevant experience in transport economics, and has recently been special adviser to my right hon. Friend on rail privatisation, a position which terminated upon the announcement of his forthcoming appointment to Railtrack. His terms of appointment will be settled in due course, when the formal appointment is made.

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what remuneration has been paid by his Department to Sir Christopher Foster in each of the past 10 years.

Mr. Freeman: Sir Christopher Foster was a special adviser to the Secretary of State from 1 June 1992 until 16 November 1993. During that time his employers, Coopers and Lybrand, were paid at a rate of £5,000 per annum for his services.

Coopers and Lybrand

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he has taken to satisfy himself that there is no conflict of interest between Sir Christopher Foster's role as adviser to his Department and his position as a director of Coopers and Lybrand.

Mr. Freeman: Sir Christopher Foster ceased to be my right hon. Friend's special adviser on 16 November. The need to avoid potential conflicts of interest was covered in the terms of his original appointment.

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will make a statement on the progress of the consultancy contract awarded to Coopers and Lybrand, to establish a charging regime for track users under the proposed reorganisation and privatisation of British Rail;

(2) if he will list the consultancy commissions, and value thereof, of contracts awarded to Coopers and Lybrand in connection with the re-organisation and proposed privatisation of British Rail.

Mr. Freeman: Good progress has been made. Detailed proposals on the structure of access charges and calculation methods have been made and are being implemented. The breakdown of contract costs is a matter of commercial confidentiality. As I said in my answer of 3 November to the Member for Devon, North (Mr. Harvey), the Department has paid approximately £1·6 million to Coopers and Lybrand for work on access and charging since December 1991. Sums for the most recent work have yet to be settled.

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) how many of the contracts awarded to Coopers and Lybrand in connection with the reorganisation and proposed privatisation of British Rail were (a) on the basis of competitive tendering and (b) by invitation;

(2) from what sources his Department sought advice on Coopers and Lybrand's suitability to carry out that work where consultancy contracts were awarded to Coopers and Lybrand in connection with re-organisation and proposed privatisation of British Rail on the basis of invitation.

Mr. Freeman: Two contracts have been awarded to Coopers and Lybrand in this connection on the basis of competitive tendering. Following the completion of work under the first contract, further work was carried out by invitation between April and August this year on an interim basis while a second tendering exercise was carried out. Coopers and Lybrand's suitability for this interim contract was determined by the Department's evaluation of their work on access and charging up to that point.

Vehicle Weights

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what action is being taken by his Department to determine how many roads are capable of supporting a gross vehicle weight of 18 tonnes.

Mr. Key: The design of road pavements is related to the amount of wear and tear caused by the different types of vehicle. Current design standards take account of both current and agreed future changes in gross vehicle weight limits. The Department's roads are already capable of supporting a gross vehicle weight of 18 tonnes.

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) how many road bridges in the United Kingdom are not capable of supporting a gross vehicle weight of 18 tonnes;

(2) what action is being taken by his Department to determine how many road bridges are capable of supporting a gross vehicle weight of 18 tonnes; and what proportion of these are owned by British Rail;

(3) how many road bridges in the United Kingdom will require strengthening in order to safely take coaches with gross vehicle weight of 18 tonnes; and what proportion of these are owned by British Rail.

Mr. Key: In 1988 the Department commenced a programme of assessing its structures on the English trunk road and motorway network in accordance with the bridge assessment code which covers the effects of higher vehicle and axle weights which will be permitted in the United Kingdom from 1999, including those of 18 tonne two-axled vehicles. To date approximately 700 structures have been assessed as being unable to carry the future loading in full. When all assessments have been completed, it is expected that approximately 1,100 structures will be shown to require strengthening. The strengthening of structures carrying the English trunk road and motorway network is programmed to be completed by the end of 1988. Very few structures carrying the English trunk road and motorway network are owned by British Rail, and none of them is expected to need strengthening.

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what considerations underlie the maintenance of the gross vehicle weight limit for coaches of 17 tonnes; and what consideration has been given to raising it to 18 tonnes.

Mr. Key: The main considerations in setting weight limits for all classes of vehicle are road wear and the strength of bridges. The agreement reached in the European Community in 1989 on gross weights for coaches on international journeys was based on the use of an 11·5 tonne rear-drive-axle. We are at present engaged in an exercise to assess and upgrade all the bridges in the United Kingdom to accept this heavier axle load. We therefore have a derogation from the directive to retain our existing axle limit of 10·5 tonnes until 1999.

Increasing the gross weight to 18 tonnes while retaining the existing maximum rear axle load would result in all the additional weight going on the front axle. That weight is effectively limited at present by the availability of suitable tyres for safe operation. Furthermore, such a vehicle would have to depend on perfect load distribution to avoid overloading either axle. We cannot therefore now increase gross weights.

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to exclude the weight of safety equipment, including TELMA and double glazing, when calculating the gross vehicle weight for coaches; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Key: Our weight limits are designed to protect the infrastructure and bridges in particular. The weight of a vehicle will be felt on a bridge regardless of whether certain equipment is included in a definition of weight or not. Consequently we cannot exclude the weight of any equipment, safety related or otherwise, from the gross weight of the vehicle.

British Rail Managers

Ms Glenda Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many British Rail managers, having taken early retirement, have been re-employed on short-term or consultancy contracts by British Rail or associated rail organisations, during 1992-93.

Mr. Freeman: The information is not readily available in the form requested.

British Rail has re-engaged some retired staff but only on a limited basis and for specific short term talks tapping their knowledge and experience.

Schools (Road Safety)

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what are the existing guidelines regarding car parking restrictions outside schools; how the restrictions are enforced; what changes are planned to ensure more effective road safety outside schools; and in what timescale.

Mr. Key: Traffic conditions outside schools vary widely, from busy main roads to quiet back streets. Our advice to local authorities is that road safety measures need to be tailored to the individual circumstances. Such measures may include traffic calming techniques or 20 mph speed limits. Mandatory parking or stopping restrictions may sometimes be appropriate and enforcement of them would be the responsibility of the police, except in London where increasingly the boroughs are taking this on. In most cases however advisory "keep clear" markings on the road are sufficiently effective. Comparatively few accidents happen outside school entrances, and we have no plans for new central initiatives on this subject.

Passengers (London)

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish a table showing his Department's latest estimate of the number of passengers travelling into, out of and within London each day on (a) each of the divisions of British Rail, (b) London Underground and (c) London Buses; and what are the comparable figures for each of the past 10 years.

Mr. Norris: The available information is given in the following tables.

In table 1, it is not possible to split the bus and underground figures to show the number of journeys into and out of London.

The figures in table 2 do not include journeys which did not terminate in central London, and cannot be split to show the number of passengers who started their journey outside London. The numbers leaving central London are likely to be very similar to those arriving.

Factory Ships

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what inspections he has made of Russian Klondyke factory ships in United Kingdom coastal waters;

(2) what assessment he has made of the risks to human life of Russian Klondyke factory ships.

Mr. Norris: As with other merchant vessels, these factory ships are liable to inspection as part of the port state control regime when they are in port. Ships at sea are not usually inspected not least because of the problems of access. Following recent incidents it has become clear that there is cause for concern about these particular vessels. and my Department is taking special steps to carry out an intensified programme of inspections of these vessels this week if weather conditions permit. We shall also be considering what further steps can and should be taken to ensure that these vessels do not pose a danger in terms either of potential calls on our rescue services, or as a pollution threat to the United Kingdom coastline.

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what assessment he has made of the risks of oil spillage from Russian Klondyke factory ships; and if he will make a statement;

(2) how many Russian Klondyke factory ships are currently in United Kingdom coastal waters;

(3) how many Klondyke factory ships in each of the last five years have required assistance from (a) the coastguard rescue, (b) the Lerwick lifeboat and (c) Lerwick harbour.

Mr. Norris: On 22 November 1993, 98 Klondykers were known to be in United Kingdom waters. Of these about 60 are Russian.

In each of the last five years the number of occasions when assistance was given to Klondyke factory ships by (a) coastguard, (b) Lerwick lifeboat, and (c) Lerwick harbour was:

	1989	1990	1991	1992	1993
(a)	2	8	8	7	16
(b)	1	0	4	1	9
(c)	1	0	0	1	3

On the basis of eight incidents in the last four years resulting in pollution from Klondykers followjng accidents the risk is significantly greater than for other types of ship in United Kingdom waters.

Inspections carried out on these vessels when they are in port have included consideration of their compliance with the international convention for the prevention of pollution from ships. These inspections have not indicated a particular risk of illegal oil discharges from these vessels.

PRIME MINISTER

Dartmouth (Visit)

Mr. Steen: To ask the Prime Minister if he will pay an official visit to Dartmouth, South Devon.

Mr. Newton: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has no immediate plans to do so.

Nuclear Tests (Radiation)

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make a statement on the current position on his consideration of the report by the National Radiological Protection Board into the effects of radiation on British service personnel involved in nuclear tests.

The Prime Minister: I understand that a follow-up report by the National Radiological Protection Board—NRPB—on cancer and mortality among nuclear test veterans is now undergoing peer review prior to publication. The Government know of no new evidence to change the position from the previous NRPB report, which showed that the total incidence of death and malignant disease among test veterans has been no greater than among people generally. We will of course study the follow-up report once it is published.

Identity Cards

Mr. Spellar: To ask the Prime Minister which Department will be conducting the investigation into the feasibility of a national identity card scheme.

The Prime Minister: The Government keep the question of a national identity card under review. The Department of Social Security is considering whether identity cards can contribute to the fight against benefit payment fraud.

Letters

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Prime Minister how many officials in his office are currently involved in drafting replies to letters for him to sign.

The Prime Minister: Officials provide drafts as necessary.

Higher and Further Education

Mr. Madel: To ask the Prime Minister what proposals he has to introduce a national awards scheme to recognise outstanding achievement by higher and further education institutions.

The Prime Minister: I am pleased to inform the House that Her Majesty the Queen has given her approval to the introduction of a national awards scheme to be known as the Queen's anniversary prizes for higher and further education.

The proposal for these prizes was initiated by the Royal Anniversary Trust. This trust was formed to fund certain celebrations of the fortieth anniversary of the Queen's accession in 1992. The awards scheme will be funded and operated by that trust, using the residue of money remaining in it at the end of 1992, in collaboration with Her Majesty's Government.

The purpose of the scheme is to recognise projects of the widest scope which are judged to be of outstanding excellence in service and benefit to the nation. It will be held every two years commencing in 1994, when applications will be sought in January. The prizes will be presented by her Majesty the Queen at a ceremony, which on the first occasion will be in February 1995.

The scheme is a free-standing initiative but obviously draws much on the experience of the existing Queen's awards arrangements. There are, of course, other awards schemes for further and higher education institutions and there continues to be a place for them in their particular fields. This new and distinctive scheme complements those activities and usefully provides a new focus for a vital part of the nation's endeavour.

The Government regard it as essential that the substantial expansion of further and higher education opportunities should be accompanied by increases in attainment and quality. I pay tribute to the many colleges and universities across the country which continue to work hard for these ends. Success brings its own reward, but it is right that particular excellence should receive particular recognition.

Engagements

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 25 November.

The Lord President: I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister is attending the Anglo-German summit in Cologne.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Patents

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what criteria are being adopted by the Patent Office to determine whether there is a significant inventive step in establishing the structure and function of any given gene; and what will be the arrangements for informing the research community that patent applications in this area will no longer be considered.

Mr. McLoughlin: The Patents Act 1977 requires the Patent Office to assess whether an invention is obvious to a skilled person or involves an inventive step. The Patent Office must make a judgment based on all the information submitted by the applicant for a patent and what is known about a particular area of technology. In making any judgment in a case relating to a particular gene the degree of difficulty in locating it would be a factor to be taken into account in assessing whether isolation of a gene amounted to an invention.

Until such time as the existing law is modified or appropriate case law has been established by the courts it would be wrong for the Patent Office to circumscribe the ability of companies or individuals to apply for patents relating to genes.

Inntrepreneur Estates Ltd.

Mr. Wareing: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assessment he has made of the extent to which assurances given to him by Inntrepreneur Estates Ltd. about its treatment of lessees since 1991 are being met; and what action he is taking to monitor compliance.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: The assurances were given to Ministers in 1991 by all major brewers. They related to the sympathetic treatment of tenants who might have real difficulties in taking on a long-term lease, such as those nearing retirement, and to the introduction of independent arbitration procedures. None of the representations made to my Department has revealed that the assurances are not being met, but the Department has, where appropriate, sought IEL's comments on particular cases.

Mr. Wareing: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what recent representations he has received about the activities of Inntrepreneur Estates Ltd; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: My officials and I have received a number of letters from, and on behalf of, Inntrepreneur lessees. My officials held a meeting with representatives of the National Association of Inntrepreneur Lessees (NAIL) on 23 September. As the hon. Member knows, following my meeting with him on 22 July, I met him again on 1 November, together with a representative of NAIL, to discuss these matters.

Mr. Wareing: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many representations he has received expressing concern at the policies of Inntrepreneur Estates Ltd. has within the brewing industry; what has been the thrust of such representations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to him on 5 July 1993, Official Report, column 35. Since answering this question 54 letters have been received from, or on behalf of, Inntrepreneur lessees. In addition, as the hon. Member is aware, I met him and a representative of the National Association of Inntrepreneur Lessees earlier this month. These representations have mainly been about rent levels.

Mr. Wareing: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what recent discussions he has held with Inntrepreneur Estates Ltd with a view to bringing about a meeting between them and representatives of the National Association of Inntrepreneur Lessees; and what response he has received.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: As the hon. Member is aware from my letter to him of 22 November, I wrote to Mr. R. G. Williams, chairman and managing director of Grand Metropolitan Estates Ltd, which manages the property arm of Inntrepreneur Estates Limited, about the possibility of the company meeting representatives of the National Association of Intrepreneur Lessees.

Mr. Williams has explained that his company does not propose to meet NAIL, although it has met with individual IEL lessees and a legal representative of theirs. He also explained that the company will be initiating meetings with individual hon. Members who have expressed an interest in IEL matters.

Brewery Industry

Mr. Wareing: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what recent discussions he has held with Sir Allen Sheppard, chairman of Grand Metropolitan Estates, in respect of developments in the brewery industry; what issues were discussed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: My right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade has had no recent discussions with Sir Allen Sheppard in respect of developments in the brewing industry. Sponsorship of this industry is of course the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Minister for Agriculture.

Mr. Wareing: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what information he has on the number of public house closures since the Supply of Beer (Tied Estate) Order 1989 was introduced; how many of these were Inntrepreneur lessees; when he intends to review the operation of the Beer Orders; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: Neither my Department nor the Office of Fair Trading has any information on the number of public house closures or the former ownership of closed houses. Such information is not required to monitor compliance with the Beer Orders.

I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to him on 27 May 1993, Official Report, column 694.

Economic Development, Merseyside

Mr. Wareing: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list the persons and organisations on Merseyside he has met during the current year to discuss economic development issues.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: My right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade has this year met representatives of a number of organisations on Merseyside concerned with economic development, ranging from the Merseyside development corporation to the Mersey Partnership.

Victoria Street Offices

Mr. Byers: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when his Department vacated the offices at 1-16 Victoria street, London; and what future plans there are for their use.

Mr. Eggar: My Department vacated 1-19 Victoria street in September 1991. On our future plans, I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, North (Mr. Greenway) on 4 November 1993, Official Report, column 349.

Mr. Byers: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the rent and other associated costs in 1993-94 for 1-19 Victoria street, London.

Mr. Eggar: The expenditure on rent, rates and associated costs in 1-19 Victoria street will be £1·5 million in 1993-94.

Nuclear Industry

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he will announce the timetable for the review of the nuclear industry.

Mr. Eggar: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I made to the hon. Member for Clackmannan (Mr. O'Neill) on 20 October 1993, Official Report, column 245.

Car Industry

Mr. Cousins: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many people were employed in (a) car retailing and (b) car repairing and servicing in 1990, 1991 and 1992; and what is the estimated size of car dealers networks in each of those years.

Mr. Sainsbury: The latest figures available from the census of employment records 211,200 people employed in the retail distribution of motor vehicles and components in 1991 and 171,000 in the repair and servicing of motor vehicles. This compares with 210,200 and 193,000 respectively in 1989. No figures are available for 1990 or 1992. Published statistics are not available on the size of car dealer networks.

Post Office Privatisation

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many officials, by grade, in his Department are currently working on the privatisation of the Post Office.

Mr. McLoughlin: Officials working primarily on the Post Office review and the privatisation of Parcelforce are as follows: 1·5 grade 5s; 2·5 grade 7s; 1 HEO; 1 HEO(D); 0·5 personal secretary and 2 AAs. Higher grade officials are also involved in these matters as necessary.

Telecommunications Industry

Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on competition in the telecommunications industry.

Mr. McLoughlin: The Government continue to base their telecommunications policy on the 1991 White Paper, "Competition and Choice: Telecommunications Policy for the 1990s", Cm 1461. We are firmly committed to greater competition and liberalisation in telecoms. These policies have created a vigorous sector to the benefit of both business and residential customers.

Consumer Affairs Council

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what matters were discussed and what decisions taken at the Consumer Affairs Council in Brussels on 19 November.

Mr. McLoughlin: The Council discussed the draft timeshare directive, and agreed on a common position by a qualified majority vote.

Indonesia

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what guarantees were received from the Government of Indonesia concerning the military uses of exports from Britain of vehicles, planes and other military equipment.

Mr. Needham [holding answer 24 November 1993]: Each export licence application is treated on its merits on a case-by-case basis. Her Majesty's Government's policy on the export of defence equipment is based on the right of sovereign states to their own self defence in accordance with article 51 of the UN charter.

Her Majesty's Government has no reason to believe that military goods exported under licence to Indonesia have been used for internal security purposes. We have received assurances from the Indonesian Government as recently as this summer that the Hawk aircraft, for example, will not be used for internal security purposes.

Konver Funding

Mr. Burns: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he expects to announce his decisions on the bids for Konver funding by Essex county council and others; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury: The United Kingdom Konver programme committee met on 24 November. I plan to announce the decisions early in December.

DEFENCE

Depleted Uranium

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many types of gun or cannon his Department deploys which can fire depleted uranium bullets or shells.

Mr. Hanley: The British Armed Forces are currently equipped with two kinds of ammunition containing depleted uranium: 120mm tank ammunition and 20mm ammunition for the Royal Navy's Vulcan Phalanx point defence weapons system.

Firepower Measurements

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if his Department measures the explosive firepower of the United Kingdom's nuclear weapons in terms of megaton equivalents.

Mr. Aitken: The explosive power of the United Kingdom's nuclear weapons is measured in kilotonne and megatonne equivalents.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the megaton equivalent of a (a) 10 kilotonne, (b) 20 kilotonne, (c) 100 kilotonne and (d) 200 kilotonne nuclear warhead.

Mr. Aitken: One kilotonne is equivalent to 0·001 megatonnes.

Departmental Land, Plymouth

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the names and addresses of the sites owned by the Ministry of Defence within the Plymouth city boundary and indicate their current uses.

Mr. Hanley: A list of the freehold sites in the Plymouth area together with their current use is as follows:

Ministry of Defence freehold sites in Plymouth

Site/establishment	Current use
The Royal Citadel	29 Commando Regiment (Royal Artillery)
Millbay Park	Sports ground used by Service personnel from the Royal Citadel
Manadon	Royal Naval Engineering College
Bowden Park	Sports ground used by Service personnel from RNEC Manadon
Ernesettle	Royal Naval Armament Depot
Bull Point, St. Budeaux	Royal Naval Armament Depot and Royal Naval sports pitches
Western King	Public open space (let to Plymouth City Council)
HM Naval Base	Operational Naval Base including North Yard, South Yard, Morice Yard, Goschen Yard, HMS Defiance, Weston Mill area and other minor sites
Keyham Sports Ground	Royal Naval Sports Ground
HMS Drake	Shore based Royal Naval accommodation
Various married quarter sites throughout the Plymouth area	Residential accommodation for married Service personnel and their families
Fort Staddon	Royal Naval Wireless Station
Staddon Heights	Army training area and public open space
Radford Woods, Plymstock	Former Royal Naval Oil Fuel Depot
Barton Road, Turnchapel	Former Royal Naval Oil Fuel Depot
Mount Batten	Former Royal Air Force Station
Mount Wise, Devonport	HQ Flag Officer Plymouth
RNH Stonehouse, Plymouth	Royal Naval Hospital
Brickfields, Devonport	Royal Naval Sports Grounds
Rectory, Devonport	Services Rugby Ground
Royal William Yard, Stonehouse	Former Naval Stores Depot
Stonehouse Barracks	HQ 3 Brigade Royal Marines
Seaton Barracks	Commando Logistic Regiment and Royal Marine Training Area
RM Coypool	Commando Logistic Regiment, Royal Marines
RM Turnchapel	539 Assault Squadron, Royal Marines

Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what Ministry of Defence land and buildings in Plymouth he expects to be surplus to MOD requirement in the next five years and to be disposed of to the private sector.

Mr. Hanley: The following surplus sites are expected to be sold over the next five years:

Former RAF Mount Batten
Royal William Yard
Western King Open Space
Former oil fuel depots at Radford Woods, Plymstock and at Barton Road, Turnchapel
Royal Naval Hospital, Stonehouse
Hamoaze House
Seymour House
26 residential properties

A number of small sites are also expected to be sold.

The rationalisation of MOD landholdings and the early sale of surplus land and buildings is a key priority. Opportunities for release of future sites in Plymouth will be kept under review.

Housing, Scotland

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the number of houses owned by his Department in (a) Dundee and (b) Scotland; how many of these houses are currently empty; and how many of these houses which have been empty for (i) one to two years, (ii) two to three years and (iii) more than three years.

Mr. Hanley: As at 30 September 1993, MOD owned 63 married quarters in Dundee, of which 27 were vacant, and 6,504 married quarters in Scotland, of which 731 were vacant, as follows:

Married quarters vacant	Dundee	Scotland
Less than 1 year	6	596
Between 1-2 years	0	101
Over 2 years	21	34

Our statistics do not separately identify those properties which have been vacant for more than three years.

The majority of the vacant quarters were either undergoing or awaiting major maintenance work or modernisation, already allocated to service families who were due to move in shortly, or held for units returning from overseas. Following various studies, it has now been decided to sell a site in Dundee which contains 21 properties vacated because of structural problems.

MOD also owned 238 civilian houses throughout Scotland, of which 16 had been vacant for less then six months and 47 for over six months. Fifty-four of the vacant civilian houses were leased properties awaiting early return to Dumbarton district council.

In addition 80 vacant service married quarters and 29 vacant civilian houses were in the process of being sold.

Equipment Sales

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what sums have been earned from sales of defence equipment to those countries whose Governments have received directly or indirectly substantial repayments of tax as a result of the exercise of sovereign immunity during each of the last seven years.

Mr. Aitken: It has been the practice of successive Governments not to reveal details of sales of defence equipment. Information relating to the value of such sales is published in table 1.11 of "UK Defence Statistics". A copy of the 1993 edition is available in the House Library.

Winter Supplies

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what information he has on the adequacy of supplies of winter uniforms and equipment to British forces under United Nations command in Vitez, Gorni Vakuf and surrounding areas.

Mr. Hanley: Adequate supplies of clothing and equipment for the British troops are held in Bosnia and all personnel have at least the same sort of cold weather clothing as those in Germany including winter underwear and gloves. Although over 80 per cent. of troops deployed in the former Yugoslavia have their full complement of cold weather clothing some troops in Vitez have yet to be issued with the enhanced package due to the closure of the supply route between Vitez and Split by fighting between the rival factions and by bad weather. Movement along the route has now commenced following negotiations with local military commanders and the remaining clothing supplies for the British troops will be a high priority.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT ADMINISTRATION

Priorities

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what are his Department's overseas development priorities for this parliamentary session.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The Overseas Development Administration's priority objectives for the current financial year are set out in the Foreign and Commonwealth Office departmental report 1993, Cm 2202.

My right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development described ODA's priority objectives for 1994-95 in a speech she made to the Royal Institute of International Affairs on 18 October. Copies of the report and the speech are in the Libraries of the House.

Forests

Mr. William Powell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps the Government is taking to promote the implementation of the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development forest principles internationally.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: On 13 September my noble Friend Baroness Chalker of Wallasey and the Indian Minister of Environment and Forests, Kamal Nath, signed a memorandum of understanding establishing an Indo-British forestry initiative to work towards improved international co-operation on forest issues. The United Kingdom and India will together promote progress on the implementation of the UNCED forest principles and the success of the United Nations Commission on Sustainable Development's review of forestry in 1995.

My noble Friend Baroness Chalker of Wallasey has written to the chairman of the United Nations Commission on Sustainable Development, Ambassador Razali, and the United Nations Under-Secretary-General for Policy Co-ordination and Sustainable Development, Mr. Desai, proposing that the United Kingdom and India should jointly host an international workshop in 1994 to prepare for this review.

EDUCATION

Grant-maintained Schools

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will list the specific purpose grants given to grant-maintained schools in south Yorkshire for each financial year since 1991-92, including the current year; and what was the purpose of each grant.

Mr. Robin Squire: The following self governing schools in South Yorkshire have received special purpose grants—SPGs:

School	Amount paid (£) for each financial year 1992-93	1993-94
Clifford C E First School, Sheffield
SPG (Transitional)	21,834	—
SPG (Development)	2,915	4,985
SPG (Restructuring)	11,136	—
SPG (VAT)	1,044	4,141
SPG (Premises)	—	920
All Saints RC School, Sheffield
SPG (Transitional)	—	59,640
SPG (Development)	—	24,490
SPG (VAT)	—	[1]31,391
Notre Dame School, Sheffield
SPG (Transitional)	—	50,610
SPG (Development)	—	22,436
SPG (Restructuring)	—	8,652
SPG (VAT)	—	[1]28,664
St. John Fisher RC (VA) Primary, Sheffield
SPG (Transitional)	—	24,338
SPG (Development)	—	4,863
SPG (VAT)	—	4,298

[1] Provisional figures to be finalised.

The purpose of each of the SPGs is as follows:

Special Purpose Grant (Transitional)
Available to help with the costs incurred as a result of the school's acquisition of self governing status.

Special Purpose Grant (Development)
Available to fund management training, staff development and implementation of the national curriculum.

Special Purpose Grant (Restructuring)
Available to help with essential staff restructuring which involves costs arising from premature retirement, redundancy or voluntary severance of teaching staff.

Special Purpose Grant (VAT)
Compensates for the payment of VAT on supplies and services, which self governing schools may not claim back.

Special Purpose Grant (Premises)
Assists self governing schools with the additional cost of school premises insurance.

Schools (Newspapers and Books)

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how much was spent by London schools on newspapers and books in the last available year.

Mr. Robin Squire: The information is not collected centrally in the form requested. The 33 inner and outer London local education authorities spent a total of over £61 million on books and equipment in nursery, primary, secondary and special schools in 1991-92, the latest year for which figures are available.

University College, Dearne Valley

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for Education when he expects the proposed university college to be situated on the Dearne valley to be in operation.

Mr. Boswell: This is a matter for those involved in the project. I understand that the University of Sheffield is considering its plans in the light of consultation with the Higher Education Funding Council for England.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Fish Conservation

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if she will make it her policy to take steps to suspend the Sea Fish Conservation Act 1993, and replace it with the proposals put forward by the National Federation of Fisheries Organisations; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Jack: I have given very careful consideration to the proposals put forward by the National Federation of Fishermen's Organisations but I shall not make a statement until the High Court has delivered its judgment in the federation's judicial review proceeding. The changes to fisheries policy covered the NFFO document "Conservation: An Alternative Approach" would not require the suspension of the Sea Fish (Conservation) Act 1993.

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if she will make a statement about bovine spongiform encephalopathy.

Mr. Soames: A further progress report on BSE in Great Britain for the period up to 29 October is available today. I have arranged for copies to be placed in the Library of the House. The report details increasingly firm evidence that the ruminant feed ban is effective in controlling the epidemic in the way which has been predicted. The number of suspect cases of BSE reported in the last three months is 12·7 per cent. below that for the same period last year, 10,270 cases in 1993 compared with 11,759 cases in 1992. There is also a dramatic reduction in the number of cases occurring in younger animals.

Wind Energy

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how her Department was represented at the conference on wind energy opportunities on farms held in Stoneleigh on 11 November.

Mr. Jack: The conference was attended by an ADAS officer and an assistant regional planning advisor.

Meat Inspection

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what savings she expects the new meat inspection rules to bring to the meat industry; what supervision will be carried out to ensure standards are maintained; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Soames: The introduction of the new poultry meat inspection system will result in reductions in poultry meat inspection costs estimated in July 1993 at £1·75 million. There will however be costs associated with the employment and training of poultry inspection assistants which the industry will be expected to bear.

Poultry inspection assistants will work under the supervision of the official veterinarian of a member of his team who will ensure standards are maintained.

Premiums and Arable Area Payments

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what were the dates of payment of sheep and beef premium and arable area payments including set-aside for 1993 and 1994.

Mr. Jack: In England payments under the 1993 sheep annual premium scheme started on 5 October 1993 and 77 per cent. of claims had been paid by 19 November. Advance payments under the 1993 beef special premium scheme began in the middle of November and for the 1993 suckler cow premium scheme are expected to start in January. The remainder of the premium due for both these schemes will be paid between April and June 1994.

The first advance oilseeds payments under the 1992-93 arable area payments scheme were made on 26 August 1993 and over 99 per cent. of claims had been paid by 30 September. Payments for oilseeds, cereals, proteins and set aside started on 20 October 1993. Payments under the 1994 sheep annual premium scheme and the 1993-94 arable area payments scheme are not due until next year.

Dr. Strang: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if she will now publish county-based figures with respect for the arable area payments scheme.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The information can be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Wastes (Sea Disposal)

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if she will make a statement on the matters discussed and decisions taken at the meeting of the London convention on sea disposal of wastes, held in London on 8 to 12 November; and if she will place in the Library a copy of the final declaration and the statement made by the United Kingdom to the meeting.

Mr. Jack: The consultative meeting of the London convention held on 8 to 12 November considered and adopted four resolutions in furtherance of the process of amending the convention. These resolutions established: a ban on the disposal of radioactive wastes at sea; a ban on the sea disposal of industrial wastes; a ban with some exemptions, on the incineration of wastes at sea; a commitment to undertake a thorough review of the other provisions of the convention.

The United Kingdom fully supported the resolutions on industrial waste, incineration and the amendment process.

We abstained from the vote on the disposal of radioactive wastes and are currently considering the implications of the decisions on this matter. The United Kingdom delegation made no formal declaration or statement to the meeting but we were able to emphasise the United Kingdom's desire to see practical steps taken and properly applied to ensure protection of the marine environment and was able to report that, in advance of the present amendments, the United Kingdom had already terminated all dumping of industrial wastes and incineration at sea.

Drift Net Fishing

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what initiatives she is planning to take at the European Council of Fisheries Ministers meeting on 22 November to ensure that other member states do not extend the phase-out period for drift net fishing.

Mr. Jack: No mention was made of drift nets at the Fisheries Council on 22 November. The derogation permitting a limited use by France of drift nets up to 5 km long expires on 31 December 1993 unless the Commission makes a proposal to extend the derogation, and the Council accepts it. Should any such proposal be made, I will scrutinise it very closely to see whether the requirement in the regulation, that no ecological risk would be involved, is fully met.

Beef

Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if she will list for each month for the last two years the average market price of beef together with the tonnage going into intervention in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Jack: The information requested is set out in the table:

United Kingdom intervention intake and beef prices October 1991 to September 1993

	Intervention intake in tonnes	Prices in pence per kilogramm (liveweight)
1991
November	14,662	95·07

July	0	121·49
August	0	122·61
September	380	111·53
October	475	112·51

Note: The price given is the cattle reference price. This liveweight price indicates the price for cattle paid by the wholesaler and received by the producer.

Animal Diseases

Dr. Strang: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many farms have been placed under movement restrictions as a consequence of the recent outbreak of (a) brucellosis and (b) warble fly; in which counties the herds infected are located; and how many are affected in each of those counties by each of those infections.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: One farm in Gywnedd, where brucellosis infection has been confirmed following culture of the relevant organism, has been placed under movement restrictions. Two farms in Cheshire where cattle have reacted positively to the serological test for brucellosis have also been placed under movement restrictions.

Thirty-nine premises in the following counties were placed under movement restrictions between April and July 1993 following confirmation of warbles infestation in imported cattle. Treatment notices were served on all farms within 3km of the above premises this autumn resulting in a further 1,490 farms placed under restriction pending treatment.

County	Number
Avon	2
Ayrshire	1
Bedfordshire	1
Cheshire	8
Cornwall	1
Devon	2
Dorset	1
Dyfed	1
Gloucestershire	1
Hampshire	2
Kent	1
Lancashire	1
Lothian	1
Oxfordshire	1
Shropshire	3
Somerset	6
Staffordshire	1
West Sussex	1
Worcestershire	1

Dr. Strang: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many cattle in total have tested positive for (a) brucellosis and (b) warble fly; how many of these were infected before entering the United Kingdom; how many have contracted the disease in this country; from which countries the infected cattle originated; and what known risks there were in those countries of brucellosis or warble fly which could be calculated to present a danger if animals were to be imported into the United Kingdom.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Since 1 September 1993, 21 cattle in Great Britain have reacted positively to serological tests for brucellosis. Disease has been confirmed by culture in nine animals, one of which was imported from France. Detailed epidemiological investigations to determine the source of infection are continuing. We understand that a small number of cattle herds in France are infected with brucellosis and are under restriction. However, all cattle imported into the United Kingdom from all member states must originate from officially brucellosis-free herds—as defined in Community rules—and must be tested negative for brucellosis within the 30 days prior to export.

Two hundred and twenty-one cattle imported from France between January and July 1993 proved to be infested with warble fly. The annual United Kingdom serum survey for warble fly currently being undertaken has so far disclosed four positive reactions. One of these animals was imported from France: the origin of the other three animals is at present unknown. There is a high incidence of warble fly in France, in common with a number of other member states. It is a legal requirement that all cattle imported into the United Kingdom, except those for immediate slaughter, must be treated within 24 hours of arrive for warble fly.

Dr. Strang: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many cattle infected with brucellosis have been slaughtered; and how many humans have been infected by the disease; and by what means the disease was transmitted from cattle to humans.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Since 1 September 1993, 15 cattle which reacted positively to the serological test for brucellosis have been slaughtered, in nine of which the disease was confirmed; no humans have been infected. In the past, humans caught the disease by direct contact with infected cattle or by consumption of unpasteurised milk or milk products. There is no risk of infection from the consumption of pasteurised milk or milk products or from meat.

Dr. Strang: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what are the estimated costs incurred by her Department in connection with arrangements for containing the risk from the presence of animals tested positive to foot and mouth, equine viral ateritis, warble fly and brucellosis, tracking down and testing the infected animals, publicising each threat, slaughtering the affected animals and compensating the losses where eligible; and what additional costs were incurred.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The information can be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Dr. Strang: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what has been the total cost in both nominal and real terms for each year since 1979 to her Department of programmes for tackling animal diseases imported into the United Kingdom which had previously been deemed to be eradicated.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Compensation paid to farmers by Agriculture Departments following compulsory slaughter of their stock for the diseases specified was, for the years indicated, as follows:

	1981 £	1984 £	1986 £	1987 £	1992 £
Foot and Mouth Disease	91,414	—	—	—	—
Newcastle Disease	—	816,325	—	—	—
Classical Swine Fever	—	—	451,435	276,525	—
Avian Influenza	—	—	—	—	6,202

Estimation of other expenditure specifically associated with these disease outbreaks would involve the Department in disproportionate costs.

New Forest (Hunting)

Mr. Meale: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if she will provide details of the terms and conditions of the licences issued by the Forestry Commission to the New Forest buckhounds allowing them to hunt in the New Forest.

Mr. Jack: A copy of the permit issued by the Forestry Commission to the New Forest buckhounds for the 1992-93 season is already in the Library of the House. The permit for the 1993-94 season has the same terms and conditions.

NORTHERN IRELAND

NHS Staff

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the number of (a) administrative and clerical staff, (b) managerial staff and (c) nursing and midwifery staff employed in the NHS in each year since 1989.

Mr. Ancram: The information is as follows:

	1989	1990	1991	1992	1993
Administrative and Clerical	[1]6,066	5,939	6,200	6,568	6,671
Managerial	[2]—	497	723	926	950
Nursing and Midwifery	17,667	17,829	17,454	16,826	15,825

Notes: Figures are expressed in whole time equivalent.
[1]Includes managerial staff.
[2]Not available.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the total salary costs for (a) administrative and clerical staff, (b) managerial staff and (c) nursing and midwifery staff employed in the NHS in each year since 1989.

Mr. Ancram: Total salary costs are as follows:

	1989-90 £	1990-91 £	1991-92 £	1992-93 £
Administrative and clerical	46,818,579	52,828,708	59,612,780	68,802,552
Managerial	8,884,824	13,341,551	19,322,078	21,838,204
Nursing and midwifery	190,911,768	205,822,687	227,698,352	242,791,513

This information is not available in the form requested for the financial year 1988-89.

HEALTH

Private Ambulance Services

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what recent representations she has received with regard to the regulation of private ambulance services; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Sackville: None.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what disciplinary action has been taken against those officials of the Guy's—St. Thomas's National Health Service Trust responsible for the awarding of a contract to Belmont ambulance service.

Mr. Sackville: This is a matter for the Guy's and St. Thomas's hospital trust. The hon. Member may wish to contact Lord Hayhoe, the chairman, for details.

Lost Working Days

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will provide a table showing different categories of sickness, ill health and injury and the number of working days lost for each category in 1992-93.

Mr. Sackville: There is no information available centrally on the breakdown of working days lost by health related disease. The hon. Gentleman may wish to contact the Confederation of British Industry for details of its survey.

Suicide

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the latest available figures for the number of officially recorded suicides in the United Kingdom showing men and women separately for (a) all persons aged 18 years and over, (b) all persons aged 30 to 55 years, (c) all persons aged 18 years and over who were unemployed at the date of suicide and (d) all persons aged 30 to 55 years who were unemployed at the date of suicide.

Mr. Sackville: Information on the number of people who have been recorded as having committed suicide and who were unemployed is not available. At death registration informants are asked for last occupation rather than employment status of the deceased.

The table shows suicide deaths ICD E950-E959[1] by sex for ages 18 and over and 30 to 55 years for England and Wales for 1992. Data for 1992 are provisional.

[1] International Classification of Disease Code Ninth Revision.

Information relating to Scotland and Northern Ireland are matters for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland and my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

Civil Servants

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list for each civil service grade in her Department (a) the total number of persons employed and (b) the total number of women employed.

Mr. Sackville: The information shows the position on 1 November 1993:

Total number of staff employed in the Department of Health

Grade (including grade equivalents)	Total	Women
Grade 1	3	0
Grade 2	8	0
Grade 3	25	5
Grade 4	28	11
Grade 5	211	79
Grade 6	135	45
Grade 7	571	151
SEO	413	121
HEO(D)	22	11
HEO	716	329
AT	8	4
EO	966	560
AO	1,376	1,003
AA	580	345
Others	178	79
TOTALS	5,240	2,743

Notes:

1. Professional grades have been shown under their equivalent unified grade.
2. The "Others" category relates to youth treatment service direct care staff and YTS industrial staff.
3. Casual members of staff have been excluded. In addition, the following staff have been excluded because they are not currently being paid by the Department:
   on loan to other government departments;
   on maternity leave of more than three months;
   on unpaid career breaks/study leave.

Community Care

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans she has to amend the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Bowis: Provisions relating to community care in England and Wales were contained in part III of the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990. We have no plans to amend those provisions.

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether her Department is conducting research into the budget allocation between the national health service and social services as set out in the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990.

Mr. Bowis: No. The Act does not set out budgets for the national health service or for social services.

GP Services

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the expenditure per head of population in each family health services authority area on general practitioner services, separately identifying general practitioner fund-holders in 1990-91 and 1991-92, in cash and standard prices; and what expenditure per head was attributable to expenditure on behalf of the under five, five to 15, 16 to 64, and 64 plus years age groups.

Dr. Mawhinney: This information is not available centrally.

Mr. Rooker: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will bring forward proposals to amend the contract between family health services authorities and general practitioners so that patients are able to make formal complaints about the staff employed by general practitioners.

Dr. Mawhinney: The contract to which the hon. Member refers is the statutory arrangement—known as the terms of service—under which general practitioners provide general medical services for the national health service. Where staff employed by a GP carry out duties within the terms of service on the GP's behalf, complaints about the performance of those duties can already be made using the formal complaints procedure. Professor Alan Wilson of Leeds university is chairing a full review of national health service complaints systems which is due to report at the turn of the year.

Birth Statistics

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many live births have been recorded (a) per region and (b) per hospital for each year over the last 10 years.

Mr. Sackville: The numbers of live births by usual residence of mother for health regions in England, and for Wales, are shown in the table. Information on the number of live births per hospital could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many still births have been recorded in the United Kingdom (a) per region and (b) per hospital; and what percentage they have been of live births over the past 10 years.

Mr. Sackville: The information for England and Wales per region for 1991 and 1992 is shown in the table. The information relating to still births recorded by region for the years 1982-1990 is available from the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys annual reference volume DH3 mortality statistics, perinatal and infant: social and biological factors, table 7b, copies of which are available in the Library.

Information on the number of still births per hospital could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Information relating to Scotland and Northern Ireland are matters for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland and my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

Newham General Hospital

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make a statement on the procedure to be followed, and bodies responsible for any decision, for the closure of Newham general hospital (a) as a directly managed unit or (b) as a trust within the national health service.

Mr. Sackville: There is a statutory requirement for district health authorities and family health services authorities to consult community health councils over any proposals to make substantial variations in the provision of local health services. Where a variation in service is the consequence of a decision taken by a national health service trust the responsibility for consultation remains with the DHA or FHSA. Ministers reserve to themselves the final decision where a closure is contested.

We are not aware of any closure proposal affecting Newham general hospital.

NHS Bed Bureaux

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if she will publish a table showing the volume of work undertaken by NHS bed bureaux for each year since 1989;

(2) if she will publish a table showing every bed bureau operating within the NHS and the location of each for each year since 1989.

Mr. Sackville: This information is not available centrally. Arrangements made by health authorities and trusts for coping with particularly high levels of admissions to hospital will vary according to local circumstances.

Anti-depressant Drugs

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will publish a table showing (a) total and (b) per capita expenditure on anti-depressant drugs in each family health services authority area; and for each NHS region, during 1992-93.

Dr. Mawhinney: Information for the calendar year 1992 is shown in the table. The cost information is in terms of net ingredient cost, that is the basic cost of the drugs before discount and excluding dispensing costs and fees.

The antidepressant drugs are those shown in section 4.3 of the "British National Formulary".

[1] These data have been selected using code 756.0 of the International Classification of Disease (9th Revision). This code covers anomalies of the skull and face bones and includes cranio synostosis. The data presented are taken from the National Congenital Malformation Notification Scheme. This scheme is voluntary and includes all malformations identified at or within 10 days of birth. The system may not be very effective in identifying all cases of cranio synostosis as many cases do not become apparent for some months.

Nannies

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will bring forward proposals to require the registration of nannies as suggested by the Professional Association of Nursery Nurses; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Bowis: No. Parents who employ a nanny to care for their children in their own home are responsible for making the arrangements and are well placed to ensure that the nanny is taking good care of their children.

Asthma

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the expenditure on general practitioner prescribed anti-asthma medication and preparations in each family health services authority area in 1992-93; and if he will express that as an expenditure figure per head.

Dr. Mawhinney: Information for the calendar year 1992 is shown in the table. The cost information is in terms of net ingredient cost, that is, the basic cost of the drugs before discount and excluding dispensing costs and fees.

The drugs used for the treatment of asthma are those shown in the following "British National Formulary" sections:

Residential Care Homes

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proportion of the budget allocated to community care is being spent on (a) residential nursing homes and (b) nursing homes by each separate health authority.

Mr. Bowis: This information is not available centrally.

Private Patients

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many private patients have been using national health service paid beds in each of the four regional health authorities covering the Greater London area for the first 10 months of 1993.

Mr. Sackville: This information is not available centrally. The hon. Member may wish to contact the chairmen of the four Thames regional health authorities for details.

NHS Management Executive

Mr. Galbraith: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will give the number of people employed by the NHS management executive for each year since its inception.

Mr. Sackville: I refer the hon. Member to the reply my hon. Friend the Minister for Health gave the hon. Member for Bristol, South (Ms Primarolo) on 25 May 1993 at column 506.

Scarborough Health Services

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what capital developments have been implemented by the Scarborough and North East Yorkshire health trust since its establishment.

Mr. Sackville: The Department collects information on schemes costing over £1 million. No scheme of that value has been implemented since the establishment of the trust. The hon. member may wish to contact the trust chairman, Mr. Tom Pindar, for details on any scheme costing £1 million or less.

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many full-time equivalent (a) medical, (b) nursing, (c) administrative and clinical and (d) other staff were employed (i) by Scarborough health authority on 1 April 1990 and 1 April 1991 and (ii) by Scarborough health authority and Scarborough and North East Yorkshire health trust on 1 April 1992 and 1 April 1993.

Dr. Mawhinney: The information available is shown in the table.

Staff groups within Scarborough district health authority and North East Yorkshire health national health service trust 1989-92 (whole time equivalent)

	September 1989	September 1990	September 1991	September 1992
Medical and Dental	60	60	70	130
Nursing and Midwifery	890	940	970	990
Administrative and Clerical	220	240	n/a	270
Others	540	560	210	610
Total	1,710	1,790	1,250	1,990

Notes:
All figures are rounded to the nearest 10.
n/a—Indicates that the figures are not available.
The 1991 "Others" figure only includes direct care staff not included elsewhere, no management/support staff are included.
The 1992 "Administrative and Clerical" and "Others" field will not include any management/support staff from Scarborough DHA.
The "Medical and Dental" figures include consultants and associated specialists in 1992 only.

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the HCHS revenue budget allocated to Scarborough health authority in 1990-91, 1991-92, 1992-93 and 1993-94; and what budget would have been awarded to the authority in each of these years if his Department's and Yorkshire Health's capitation funding formulae had been applied in full.

Mr. Sackville: Revenue allocations to district health authorities are the responsibility of regional health authorities and detailed information is not available centrally. The hon. Member may wish to contact Sir Brian Askew, chairman of Yorkshire regional health authority for details.

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of people presenting themselves at the accident and emergency department at Scarborough district were attended to within five minutes in each month of 1993.

Mr. Sackville: This information is not available centrally. The hon. Member may wish to contact Mr. Tom Pindar, the chairman of Scarborough and North East Yorkshire Healthcare NHS trust for details.

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what rewards and incentives beyond the pre-existing Whitley Council arrangements have been introduced for the staff at Scarborough district hospital since the creation of the Scarborough and North East Yorkshire health trust.

Mr. Sackville: This information is not available centrally. The hon. Member may wish to contact Mr. Tom Pindar, chairman of the Scarborough and North East Yorkshire Healthcare national health service trust for details.

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what surplus or deficit on HCHS revenue spending was achieved by Scarborough health authority in 1990-91 and 1991-92 and by Scarborough and North East Yorkshire health trust in 1992-93.

Mr. Sackville: The Scarborough health authority recorded a deficit of £924,000 in 1990-91 and a surplus of £29,512 in 1991-92 on hospital community health services revenue spending. The figure for 1990-91 is not comparable with the figures for 1991-92 because of the introduction of capital charges and changes to accounting policies following the introduction of the internal market. Scarborough and North East Yorkshire health trust recorded a deficit of £528,000 in 1992-93.

Oxendon House, Leighton Buzzard

Mr. Madel: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what discussions her Department has had with Bedfordshire county council about the future of Oxendon house, Leighton Buzzard, Bedfordshire; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Bowis: The Department has been kept informed about recent developments in relation to Bedfordshire county council's children's home, Oxendon house. I understand that the acting principal of the home has been arrested and charged by the police and that four other members of staff have been suspended. Following advice from the social services inspectorate, the county council is conducting an investigation into allegations of inappropriate therapies and restraint techniques and the general culture of the home. Meanwhile the home has been closed, the children relocated and 45 members of staff have been given leave of absence.

The social services inspectorate is continuing to monitor the situation.

NHS Salaries

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list the total salary costs for (a) administrative and clerical staff, (b) managerial staff and (c) nursing and midwifery staff employed in the national health service in each region in each year since 1989.

Dr. Mawhinney: Analysis of salaries and wages costs for hospital and community health services—HCHS—in England are shown in the tables. The figures for 1992-93 are provisional.

Notes:

1. Salaries and wages costs incurred by family health services authorities are excluded as corresponding costs are not identified on the same basis.
2. Managerial staff consists of general and senior managers, the main reason for the increase has been the reclassification of some staff in professional and administrative groups into these grades.

Juvenile Offenders

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many additional secure accommodation places have been made available for juveniles since 1991.

Mr. Bowis: Two new secure units have opened since 1 January 1992, providing a total of 18 secure places. Local authorities are currently engaged in a capital programme to provide additional secure places for juvenile remands.

Mersey Health Services

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list all the members of each hospital trust in the Mersey region giving their addresses and professional or other background.

Dr. Mawhinney: I refer the hon. Member to the reply my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, West (Mr. Sackville) gave the Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Howarth) on 20 July 1993 at column 121.

The private address of a trust non-executive director is a personal matter and it is not appropriate to release this information.

An announcement will be made shortly concerning national health service trust chairmen and non-executive directors who have been appointed in the fourth wave.

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list (a) the hospitals she has visited and (b) the persons and organisations she has met during the course of the current year in the Mersey region, in order to discuss national health service matters; and the dates on which the meetings took place.

Mr. Sackville: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State visited Mersey region on 26 July as part of a programme of visits to regions throughout the country. My right hon. Friend visited Ashworth hospital, Alder Hey children's hospital and Aintree Park group practice, where she met a cross-section of staff and discussed a range of different subjects.

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what arrangements she has made to ensure adequate financing of the intensive care unit at the Alder Hey children's hospital, Liverpool; and if she will make a statement.

Dr. Mawhinney: Purchasers are responsible for ensuring the availability of a comprehensive range of services, within available resources taking account of the priorities set by Government. It is for them to decide, in discussion with the management of the hospital, on the level of funding for the intensive care unit.

Purchasers will be using the recent report "The Care of Critically Ill Children" from the British Paediatric Association to undertake an immediate review of their requirements for paediatric intensive care. The Alder Hey children's hospital provides excellent services for the people of Mersey, where the provision of paediatric intensive care beds exceeds the recommendations of the report. Copies of the BPA report will be placed in the Library.

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will visit Broadgreen hospital, Liverpool, to discuss with staff and representatives of Liverpool East community health council the proposed closure of the accident and emergency unit.

Mr. Sackville: On 16 September I announced that a decision had been taken to agree to the closure of the accident and emergency department at Broadgreen hospital. The decision was based on our assessment of the best, long-term interests of the people of Liverpool and followed a period of public consultation on the proposal. All correspondence on this matter was seen, including the response from Liverpool East community health council, and I met with a delegation of Members of Parliament from Liverpool, before the decision was made. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has no plans to visit Broadgreen hospital.

Benzodiazepine

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action has been taken by her Department to discourage the over-prescribing of benzodiazepines; what plans she has to restrict represcribing; if she will bring forward proposals for legislation; and if she will make a statement.

Dr. Mawhinney: Advice from the Committee on Safety of Medicines—CSM—concerning the prescribing of benzodiazepines was given to doctors in "Current Problems Number 21" in January 1988, copies of the relevant pages will be placed in the Library. This strongly emphasised the dangers of dependence with benzodiazepines and advised doctors to limit their use to short-term relief—two to four weeks only—of anxiety and insomnia that is severe, disabling, or subjecting the individual to extreme distress. Similar advice is given in the "British National Formulary", which the Department issues free to all prescribing doctors twice a year.

Following the publication of the "Health of the Nation" White Paper, the "Mental Illness Key Area Handbook", published in January 1993, suggested that family health services authorities should agree with general practitioners local targets for reducing benzodiozepine prescriptions. We also intend to circulate a copy of the Mental Health Foundation's publication, "Guidelines for the prevention and treatment of benzodiazepines dependence" to all family health services authorities in the near future, copies of which will be placed in the Library. We have no plans to introduce legislation in this area.

Intensive Care

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what investigations she has carried out into the circumstances which led to the deaths of three Manchester patients following 50-mile ambulance journeys to Blackpool; and what steps she is taking to ensure that there are sufficient intensive care resources in Manchester and Liverpool hospitals to prevent such circumstances from arising in the future;

(2) how many cases involving intensive care treatment in (a) the Liverpool and (b) the Manchester areas have been diverted to hospitals in other areas in each of the past six months; to which areas they have been diverted; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Sackville: Information on the number of diverted intensive care cases is not available centrally. Purchasers of health care are responsible for ensuring the availability of a comprehensive range of services. It is for them to decide, in discussion with providers, how best to meet the need for intensive care facilities within available resources.

It would be inappropriate to comment on the circumstances of the deaths of the three Manchester patients before any possible inquest is held. We understand that North Western regional health authority is holding discussions with district health authorities to establish whether the level of provision of intensive care beds in Manchester matches demand.

The Government are currently funding a study by the Royal College of Anaesthetists into access to intensive care.

Mr. Stanley Clarke

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the response time by the London ambulance service in respect of pensioner Stanley Clarke from Lancashire who collapsed and died of a suspected heart attack in Woolworth's store, Old road, Chingford; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Sackville: This information is not available centrally. The hon. Member may wish to contact, Mr. Martin Gorham, chief executive of the London ambulance service, for details.

Fireworks

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people in Britain were injured by fireworks for each year since 1980; and what percentage of those injured for each year were under 16 years old.

Mr. McLoughlin: I have been asked to reply.

The number of fireworks injuries recorded at hospital accident and emergency departments from the DTI's annual national fireworks survey, carried out for the 21 days before bonfire night, the night itself, and the seven days following, since 1980, are as follows:

Year	Total number of injuries	Percentage of those injured under 16 years old Per cent.
1980	555	70·1
1981	681	67·5
1982	626	66·1

NATIONAL FINANCE

Inward Investment

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proposals he has to bring investments by or on behalf of foreign Governments in British industry within the national tax structure as being a commercial activity.

Mr. Dorrell: I have noted the hon. Member's suggestion.

Advance Corporation Tax

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what sums have been repaid by the Inland Revenue in the five years to March 1993 on account of sovereign immunity and by way of advance corporation tax rebates on dividend payments or on sums assumed to be dividend payments either directly or indirectly to the Government of Kuwait or to any bank managing funds on its behalf in respect of shareholdings or other investments in British companies;

(2) what sums have been repaid by the Inland Revenue in the five years to March 1993 on account of sovereign immunity and by way of advance corporation tax rebates on dividend payments to either the Government of Brunei or to any bank or financial institution managing funds on its behalf in respect of shareholdings or other investments in British companies;

(3) what sums have been repaid by the Inland Revenue in the five years to March 1993 on account of sovereign immunity and by way of advance corporation tax rebates on dividend payments to the Government of Abu Dhabi or to any bank or financial institution managing funds on its behalf in respect of shareholdings or other investments in British companies;

(4) what sums have been repaid by the Inland Revenue in the five years to March 1993 on account of sovereign immunity and by way of advance corporation tax rebates on dividend payments to the Government of Singapore or to any bank or financial institution managing funds on its behalf in respect of shareholdings or other investments in British business;

(5) what sums have been repaid by the Inland Revenue in the five years to March 1993 on account of sovereign immunity and by way of advance corporation tax rebates on dividend payments or on sums assumed to be dividend payments either directly or indirectly to the Government of Singapore.

(6) how much has been paid by the Inland Revenue in the five years to March 1993 in the current financial year in respect of advance corporation tax rebates on dividend payments to the Government of Qatar or to any financial institution or company managing funds invested in British business on its behalf.

Mr. Dorrell: The normal rules of Revenue confidentiality preclude the provision of information about the affairs of named individuals or entities.

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the total sum repaid through the exercise of sovereign immunity in respect of the repayment of advance corporation tax relating to dividend payments to foreign Governments or to banks and financial institutions managing investments and shareholdings in British business on behalf of those Governments during each of the last seven years.

Mr. Dorrell: The approximate amount of tax credits paid on dividends—excluding those paid direct by the payer of the dividends—on sovereign immunity grounds in the years requested is as follows:

	£ million
1986-87	116
1987-88	147
1988-89	154
1989-90	147
1990-91	138
1991-92	164
1992-93	116

Loan Repayment

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) how much of the 10 billion ecu loan arranged in September 1992 has been repaid; and what was the sterling value of that amount which has been repaid on the basis of exchange rates (a) at the time the loan was arranged, (b) immediately after the devaluation of September 1992 and (c) at the time it was repaid;

(2) how much of the 10 billion ecu loan arranged in September 1992 has been repaid; and what was the sterling value of that amount which remains outstanding on the basis of exchange rates (a) at the time the loan was arranged, (b) immediately after the devaluation of September 1992 and (c) at current exchange rates;

(3) how much of the 10 billion ecu loan arranged in September 1992 has been drawn down; and what was the sterling value of that amount (a) when the loan was arranged, (b) immediately after the devaluation of September 1992 and (c) on the basis of current exchange rates;

(4) what was the sterling value of the 10 billion ecu loan facility arranged in September 1992 (a) when it was arranged in September 1992, (b) after the devaluation of September 1992 and (c) at current exchange rates.

Mr. Nelson: The 10 billion ecu borrowing programme, announced on 3 September 1992, had three elements: an ecu 5 billion multi-currency revolving credit facility, arranged and drawn down in deutschmarks in various amounts over the month of September 1992; a DM 5 billion bond issued in October 1992; and a US$ 3 billion bond issued in December 1992.

The actual amount of the multi-currency drawing was DM 9,944,550,000. The sterling value of this facility when it was arranged—3 September 1992—was equivalent to £3,554,798,928, and at end-September 1992 was equivalent to £3,962,761,506. The same sum in deutschmarks was the equivalent of £3,936,564,801 at the exchange rate as at the close of business in London on 23 November 1993.

DM 5 billion as at end October 1992 was equivalent to £2,073,656,271 and, on present valuation as defined above, was equivalent to £1,979,257,383. US$ 3 billion as at end December 1992 was equivalent to £1,980,198,020 and, on present valuation as defined above, was equivalent to £2,025,931,929. None of this borrowing has been repaid.

Taxation

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will add to the table given in the Official Report, of 3 November, column 255, estimating the tax liabilities in 1994-95 for the given income ranges showing the effect of all tax changes including those announced in the 1993 Budget and including both indirect taxation and intermediate taxation.

Mr. Dorrell: Information on average changes in income tax and national insurance contribution liabilities is given in the tables. The figures for 1994-95 assume statutory indexation of allowances and thresholds and include measures already announced in the March 1993 Budget. It is not possible to provide an equivalent analysis of the other taxes.

Civil Servants

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list for each civil service grade in his Departments (a) the total number of persons employed and (b) the total number of women employed.

Sir John Cope: Information on the staffing in the Chancellor of the Exchequer's departments, as at 1 April 1993, is set out in the attached tabled.

Staffing of Chancellor of the Exchequer's departments: Numbers by grade and by women employed in grade at 1 April 1993

VAT

Mr. Riddick: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many claims by do-it-yourself house-builders for refund of value-added tax under the provisions of Customs and Excise notice No. 719 were met in whole or in part during the years ended 31 December 1991 and 31 December 1992 and the half-year ended 30 June 1993.

Sir John Cope: The number of claims for refund of VAT by do-it-yourself house-builders met in whole or in part is as follows:

	Number
1 January to 31 December 1991	9,515
1 January to 31 December 1992	10,896
1 January to 30 June 1993	5,060

Private Electricity Supply Companies

Sir David Steel: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer under what authority private electricity supply companies may charge customers who pay bills in monthly instalments the new rate of VAT prospectively, to cover all instalments up to next April.

Sir John Cope: For VAT purposes, supplies of electricity are treated as taking place each time a payment is received by the supplier or a tax invoice is issued by him, whichever is the earlier. The rate of tax to be charged will normally be the rate in force at that time. Consumers should not be charged VAT on any payments made by them before 1 April 1994.

EC Trade Deficit

Mr. Cash: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to correct the trade deficit with EC partners; what is his current policy on the pound/deutschmark exchange rate; if he will make it his policy to allow the rate to float; and what has been his policy on the exchange rate in the last three months.

Mr. Nelson: The balance of trade with European countries reflects a range of factors, including the effects of the recession in continental Europe. The key to United Kingdom producers' future success both as exporters and in competition with imports in domestic markets is their ability to keep costs down and quality high. The Government have facilitated this by getting inflation down to its lowest level for a generation.

I have no specific target for the pound/deutschmark exchange rate nor for the sterling exchange rate index. But the exchange rate and domestic indicators, including the growth of the money supply and the behaviour of asset prices, are taken into account in guiding monetary policy.

WALES

Queensferry Roundabout

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many representations he has had concerning his proposals to widen the highway Queensferry-Aston-Ewloe roundabout.

Sir Wyn Roberts: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the statement of results of the public consultation and reasons for the choice of the preferred route for the proposed A494 trunk road, River Dee to Ewloe improvement, a copy of which has been sent to him.

Council House Sales

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many council houses were sold, giving the amount of cash gained by their sale, in 1990, 1991, 1992 and for the current year.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The number of local authority dwellings sold and their total selling prices are given in the table.

Sales of local authority dwellings in Wales[1]

	Number of sales	Total selling prices £ millions
1990	6,377	81·4
1991	3,642	52·7
1992	2,767	43·2
January-June 1993	1,170	18·1

[1] Excludes new town sales.

Buckley-Clwyd Relief Road

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he proposes to authorise the construction of the Buckley-Clwyd inner relief road; what is its likely cost; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Wyn Roberts: This is a Clwyd county council scheme. The council has made a side roads order for the scheme and submitted it to my right hon. Friend for confirmation. The objection period expires on 26 November after which date a decision will be taken on whether an inquiry is necessary. I have no details on the cost of this scheme.

School Building Works

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) if he will make a statement concerning the prospect for the modernisation of the Llay Park county primary school, Llay, Clwyd;

(2) if he will make a statement concerning the prospects and timetable for the building extension project for Hope high school, Clwyd.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Matters relating to the prospect of building works are for the local education authority and the school concerned.

Clwyd Alyn Estate

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will visit the Clwyd Alyn housing association estate at Garden City, Deeside.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Arrangements for my forthcoming visit to the Alyn and Deeside district have yet to be agreed.

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what moneys he has made available to Clwyd Alyn housing association to enable it to modernise its garden city estate; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Housing for Wales has agreed to provide up to £2·5 million of grant funding. Together with private finance, this is expected to meet the eligible costs to Clwyd Alyn housing association of works on the houses on the garden city estate.

Roads Projects

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the start date and what is the cost, respectively, of the roads projects on Deeside at (a) A550 Shotwick-Woodbank-Drome corner, (b) the Aston Hill road widening, (c) the Ewloe roundabout interchange and (d) the new River Dee crossing scheme; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Wyn Roberts: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the 1993 Supplement to "Roads in Wales: Progress and Plans for the 1990s".

Wind Energy

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how his Department was represented at the conference on development of wind energy in rural communities held at Stoneleigh on 11 November.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The Department was not represented at the conference.

Alltami Bypass

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what plans he has for a bypass of Alltami, near Mold; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Plans for the improvement of the A494 trunk road between Mold and Ewloe are shown in the 1933 supplement to "Roads in Wales, Progress and Plans for the 1990s". The scheme is shown in the long term with construction not likely to begin before April 1999. The hon. Gentleman may wish to be aware that the public will be consulted on alternative routes and a consultation exercise is planned for early in the new year.

Health Service Staff

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the total salary costs for (a) administrative and clerical staff, (b) managerial staff and (c) nursing and midwifery staff employed in the national health service in each year since 1989.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The information requested is as follows:

	1989-90 £000s	1990-91 £000s	1991-92 £000s
a. Administrative and Clerical	64,001	73,218	84,648
b. Managerial	6,479	9,207	16,849
c. Nursing	338,195	364,485	402,503

Source: Health Authorities' Annual Accounts.

Notes:

i. Figures include expenditure by Health Authorities, the Welsh Health Common Services Authority and the Health Promotion Authority for Wales but exclude that of Family Health Services Authorities whose corresponding costs are not identifiable on the same basis.

ii. It should be noted that over the period senior managers' terms and conditions of service have been extended to second and third level managers and some senior nurses and other professional staff have transferred to the senior management grades. The introduction of Project 2000 nursing reforms has led to the reclassification of student nurses from salaried nurses to bursaried students; and there has also been a growth in the number of healthcare assistants who are paid on local pay scales and are not classified as nursing staff.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the number of (a) administrative and clerical staff, (b) managerial staff and (c) nursing and midwifery staff employed in the NHS in each year since 1989.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The information, which relates to the whole-time equivalent of staff employed as at 30 September, is as follows:

	Administrative and Clerical		Nursing and Midwifery
	Managerial[1]	Other	Other	Learners[2]	Total
1989	187	7,378	24,919	3,118	28,037
1990	416	7,653	25,018	3,075	28,093
1991	683	8,050	25,028	2,934	27,962
1992	848	8,347	25,451	1,970	27,421
1993	1,028	8,577	25,206	1,033	26,239

Notes:

Includes staff employed by the Welsh Health Common Services Authority and those Family Health Service Authorities using District Health Authority payroll systems.

The use of locally devised payscales from 1991 onwards may affect the comparability of figures as these staff cannot be allocated centrally to a specific staff group and are not, therefore, included above.

[1] General managers, senior managers and managers. The growth in the number of these staff arises partly from the extension in 1989 of senior manager terms and conditions of service to second and third level managers including some managers in staff groups other than administrative and clerical.

[2] Since the autumn of 1991 student nurses have been classified as students and are no longer included in the NHS staff figures. Staff numbers shown in the table in 1992 and 1993 are students finishing pre Project 2000 courses. There were some 1,800 Project 2000 student nurses at September 1993.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Crime, North West

9. Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the recent crime figures for the North West.

Mr. Howard: Notifiable offences recorded by the police in the north west region rose by 2·6 per cent. in the 12 months ending June 1993 compared with an increase of 3·8 per cent. for England and Wales as a whole.

Police Reform

13. Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what reaction he has had to his announcement on reform of the police force on the basis of the Sheehy report.

Mr. Charles Wardle: My right hon. and learned Friend has received widespread support for the broad thrust of his proposals.

Prison Population

14. Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many persons are detained in prisons; and what the figures were five and 10 years previously.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: On Friday 19 November 1993 there were 47,360 prisoners in prison service accommodation and 28 in police cells, giving a total of 47,388 in prisons in custody.

Only end of month figures are available for the earlier years. The figure for 30 November 1988 was 50,365, including 1,025 in police cells. The figure for 30 November 1983 was 43,895, including 531 in police cells.

Prison Ships

15. Mr. Hutton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement about his policy towards the use of prison ships.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Marine detention facilities are one of the options being considered as part of prison service contingency planning. The aim is to identify options for coping with levels of prisoner population that exceed available prison accommodation.

Intimidation of Witnesses

16. Mr. Butler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received regarding the intimidation of witnesses; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: There is a deep seated public concern, reflected in correspondence I have received and in more general reports, about the intimidation of witnesses and other citizens who assist the police in the fight against crime. We intend to meet that concern by inviting Parliament to approve a new offence of witness intimidation intended to supplement the existing criminal law in this area.

Crime Prevention

17. Mr. Hawkins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what research his Department has conducted into the effectiveness of custodial sentences in preventing crime.

Mr. Maclean: The research and statistics department of the Home Office regularly publishes material which is relevant to the consideration of the effectiveness of sentencing.

A recent Home Office study of 193 burglars given community service orders in 1987 produced results suggesting that imprisoning them for one year could have prevented between three and 13 crimes per burglar.

Crime (Research)

18. Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what investigations he has carried out into the causes of crime; and what conclusions he has come to.

Mr. Maclean: The Home Office research and planning unit has carried out a number of research studies, which have dealt with the predictors of offending. They show that the reasons why people become offenders are complex and wide ranging.

Right to Silence

19. Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress he has made on his plans to abolish the right to silence.

Mr. Maclean: I intend to bring forward legislation which will allow the courts to draw proper inferences from a defendant's silence, either when questioned by the police or during the trial.

Police Bureaucracy

20. Mr. Booth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many police officers will be returned to operational duties by his plans to cut paperwork and to reduce the number of police middle managers.

Mr. Charles Wardle: This will be for individual chief constables to determine in the light of the particular circumstances of their own forces. But my right hon. and learned Friend has made it possible for some 5,300 police officers to be redeployed to front line operational police duties.

New Prisons

21. Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many new prisons he plans to have built in the next five years.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The new prison at Doncaster is due to be completed and opened in April 1994. Six new prisons are to be built under the private sector design, control and finance initiative announced on 2 September.

Sheehy Report

22. Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received regarding his response to the Sheehy report on police pay and responsibilities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Charles Wardle: I refer the hon. Member to the oral reply given earlier today to the hon. Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury (Mr. Clifton-Brown).

Capital Punishment

23. Mr. David Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to reintroduce capital punishment for the murder of a policeman.

Mr. Maclean: We have no such plans. Matters relating to capital punishment are traditionally decided by a free vote in Parliament with Members voting in accordance with their own judgment of the issues involved.

Police, Derbyshire

24. Mr. Skinner: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has any plans to increase the number of police officers in Derbyshire.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Derbyshire, in common with all other police authorities, has made an application for extra officers. Decisions on these applications will be made when the level of police funding in 1994-95 has been decided.

Mr. Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list those who received enbargoed copies of the report by Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary on the Derbyshire constabulary prior to its publication on 16 November; and on what dates copies were forwarded to each of the hon. Members representing parliamentary constituencies within Derbyshire.

Mr. Charles Wardle: I understand that in accordance with normal practice, Her Majesty's inspector of constabulary sent embargoed copies of the report to the police authority and the force. Reports by Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary are not routinely sent to hon. Members but copies are placed in the Library on the day of publication.

Immigration (Carriers' Liability)

25. Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the operation of the Immigration (Carriers' Liability) Act 1987.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The Immigration (Carriers' Liability) Act 1987 has an important effect in reducing the number of people who are able to travel to the United Kingdom without proper documents. Our strategy for its operation combines extensive training and guidance for carriers with the vigorous pursuit of charges incurred.

Country Sports

26. Sir Michael Grylls: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action he is taking to uphold the right to take part in lawful country sports; and if he will make a statement.

27. Mr. Hargreaves: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what progress he has made in drawing up plans to prevent the disruption of legal country sports.

Mr. Charles Wardle: We will introduce in the Criminal Justice Bill, to be brought forward this session, a criminal offence of aggravated trespass to ensure that the police have the necessary powers to prevent or to deal with those trespassers who seek to obstruct or disrupt a lawful activity.

Police, Northumbria

28. Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what submission has been made to him for extra police officers in the Northumbria police authority area for 1994-95.

Mr. Charles Wardle: My right hon. and learned Friend has received an application from the Northumbria police authority for 80 additional police posts for 1994-95.

Summer Time

29. Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he now intends to introduce double summer time.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply given to a question from the hon. Member for Bournemouth, East (Mr. Atkinson) on 4 November 1993 at column 363.

Shamrock Farms (Primates)

Mr. Hanson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action he has taken in the case of the conditions and handling of imported primates by Shamrock Farms, Brighton.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The actions I required to be taken following the investigation last year were set out in the reply given to a question from my right hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North (Sir J. Wheeler) on 2 December 1992 at columns 215-16. The further action which I took to monitor progress in implementing my requirements, was described in reply to a question from my hon. Friend the Member for Brighton, Kemptown (Mr. Bowden) on 1 April 1993 at column 383-84. Since then, I have continued to receive regular reports from the Animals (Scientific Procedures) inspectorate, and these show that satisfactory progress is being made in accordance with my instructions.

Crime Statistics, London

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many criminal offences were recorded by the police in Lewisham in (a) 1985 and (b) 1992; and how many in each case resulted in a conviction.

Mr. Maclean: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to her question on 18 October 1993 at columns 143-44.

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department for each year since 1985 how many (a) rapes, (b) burglaries in dwellings, (c) thefts from vehicles and (d) incidents of domestic violence were recorded by the police in Lewisham; and how many of these resulted in a conviction.

Mr. Maclean: The available information relates to notifiable offences recorded by the police and is given in the table. It is not possible to link recorded crime statistics with convictions, as the information collected on convictions is compiled on a different basis.

Police Establishment

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the police establishment for each sector within the Metropolitan police force for April 1992 and for each month thereafter, including details of supernumerary posts.

Mr. Charles Wardle: I will write to the hon. Member.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many officers there are in each rank of the police force; and how many are (a) women, (b) black and (c) Asian.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Table 1 gives the numbers of women officers and of officers from ethnic minorities in the police service as at 31 August 1993, the latest date for which this information is available.

More detailed data on officers from ethnic minority groups is collected only annually. Table 2 gives numbers of black and Asian officers, reported by police forces as at 31 December 1992.

Extradition

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the number of extradition cases in which the British Government are now involved which seek the return of a British national to the United Kingdom to face criminal charges.

Mr. Maclean: The Government are currently seeking the extradition of 37 British nationals to the United Kingdom to face criminal charges. This does not include people whose return is sought from the Republic of Ireland under arrangements for the mutual backing of warrants.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement of the proposals by the EC Justice Ministers at Limelette, Belgium, on 27-28 September, to draw up a new convention on extradition.

Mr. Maclean: At the Limelette meeting, EC Justice Ministers agreed a declaration instructing the judicial co-operation working group on criminal matters to continue with work initiated during the United Kingdom"s presidency of the European Community to find ways of improving and simplifying extradition arrangements between the Twelve which are at present conducted mainly under the 1957 European convention on extradition. The group was invited to examine and report to Ministers in a year on a number of possible measures which, if adopted, would streamline extradition between the Twelve, and on whether such measures might be incorporated in a new convention between the Twelve.

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people were extradited to the United Kingdom from countries overseas in each of the last five years.

Mr. Maclean: The information is given in the table. It does not include people returned from the Republic of Ireland under arrangements for the mutual backing of warrants.

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the present position of the Sri Lankan Tamils at present detained at Harmondsworth detention centre, stating how long each person has been detained at this centre, what is the reason for their being detained there and when he expects a decision regarding their case to be arrived at.

Mr. Charles Wardle: On 23 November five Sri Lankan citizens were detained at Harmondsworth detention centre. Three had been held since July—14, 16 and 24 respectively—one since 21 August and one since 6 October. The reason for detention in each case was that the immigration service was not satisfied the applicant would comply with conditions of temporary admission. Four of the applicants have been refused asylum and await determination of their appeals. A decision on the one remaining appliction will be taken as soon as possible.

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many Sri Lankan Tamils are at present detained in prison in England and Wales awaiting adjudicators' decisions as to their status and right to remain in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Charles Wardle: None.

Hunting (Prosecutions)

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the number of (a) cases brought against and (b) successful prosecutions of (i) hunt saboteurs for violence against hunters and hunt followers and (ii) hunters and hunt followers for violence against hunt saboteurs in each year since 1990.

Mr. Maclean: This information is not collected centrally.

Civil Servants

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list for each civil service grade in his Department (a) the total number of persons employed and (b) the total number of women employed.

Mr. Howard: The information requested is set out as follows. The figures represent staff in the Home Office and its agencies on 22 November 1993 including those on loan or outward secondment.

Mr. Anthony Stock

Mr. Jonathan Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he intends to make a statement concerning the conviction of Mr. Anthony Stock for robbery.

Mr. Maclean: On 24 November my right hon. and learned Friend referred Mr. Stock's conviction to the Court of Appeal under section 17(1)(a) of the Criminal Appeal Act 1968.

Metropolitan Police Housing

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many residential properties are owned by the Metropolitan police; and how many of these are currently empty.

Mr. Charles Wardle: I understand that, as at 31 October 1993, the receiver to the Metropolitan police district owned 2,241 residential properties for police purposes.

A total of 323 were leased to housing associations and 148 were vacant. Of the 148 vacancies, 69 were allocated to officers who had not taken occupation; 34 were vacant for sale on the open market; 29 were vacant and available for allocation; and 16 were vacant for building works.

Policy Records

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether personal or police records for which his Department has responsibility have been transferred to the far east for the purpose of making microfiche copies.

Mr. Charles Wardle: No. But we have not ruled out the possibility that work on the computerisation of criminal records currently held on microfiche might be carried out in the far east or anywhere else, provided that rigorous safeguards for security and confidentiality are in place. We expect to announce our decision on this matter next spring.

Juvenile Crime

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what were the most common crimes committed by juveniles in Lewisham in each year since 1985; and of those juveniles convicted of an offence over this period what was the average sentence served.

Mr. Maclean: Information available centrally on juveniles aged 10 to under 17 years within the Lewisham area is given in the tables.

Racial Offences

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what initiatives he has pursued to help combat racial attacks.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The Government have on many occasions expressed their abhorrence of racial violence and harassment and fully supports police efforts to tackle racially motivated crime.

In 1989 the inter-departmental racial attacks group, chaired by the Home Office, produced its first report stressing the importance of dealing with racial attacks as a priority task and recommending a multi-agency approach to combatting racial crimes. The report was distributed to all local authorities and to all police forces, and the implementation of the recommendations by forces has been monitored by Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary.

A follow-up report was published in January 1992, which detailed progress made so far, noted good practice, and proposed how the police and local agencies might further develop their response to racial attacks and harassment.

National and local police training addresses the issue of radical attacks, as part of a wider programme of race awareness training. The Home Office funds the specialist support unit in police-community and race relations training, which deals among other matters with racial attacks training for police trainers.

Each year the Home Office sponsors the Holly Royde seminar on community and race relations which brings together police officers from forces across the country with the purpose of addressing community and race relations issues in an operational context and developing action plans for implementation in forces.

Other initiatives include:

the establishment in 1988 of a Home Office-funded pilot multi-agency project in Newham, East London, which produced a report in 1991 providing a detailed understanding of the practice of multi-agency co-ordination; the production of a crime prevention leaflet on racial attacks in several different ethnic minority languages, and encouragement of reporting of incidents through poster campaigns;

Home Office sponsored research on victimisation in east London and Manchester.

The Home Affairs Committee is conducting an inquiry into racial attacks and harassment. I gave evidence in July. Future Government action will be informed by the Committee's recommendations.

Mr. Betts: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many individuals have been prosecuted to date under part III of the Public Order Act 1986—racial hatred—for offences committed at a designated football match.

Mr. Maclean: Court proceedings data collected centrally do not detail the circumstances and/or the venue where the offence took place.

Prisoners (Home Leave)

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the Government's policy towards home leave for violent or dangerous prisoners.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The Government fully recognise and share public concern that prisoners who present a risk to public safety should not be released on home leave. Steps to tighten the existing procedures governing the grant of home leave were introduced in October 1992 to ensure that no prisoner who is eligible to be considered for an initial period of home leave should be recommended for release into the community before a detailed and thorough risk assessment of his or her potential danger to the public has been carried out. This is particularly important in the case of any offender with violent or dangerous propensities or antecedents.

Guidance to governors on the operation of home leave, including the risk assessment procedure is contained in "Circular Instruction 43/92", a copy of which is held in the House of Commons Library.

The prison service is presently conducting a review of the operation of the home leave and temporary release schemes. The working group undertaking the review is tasked with ensuring that public safety is not compromised by offenders being allowed leave as part of their gradual re-integration into society. It includes representatives from the police and probation services, and from Victim Support as well as the prison service. The working group's programme of work is nearing completion following which we shall study its report and any recommendations it may make, with great care.

Young Offenders

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will initiate a full trial into a scheme for young offenders to receive training at sea on the vessel Excelsior, at Lowestoft, for periods of up to three months, to be deducted from their sentences if they passed the training satisfactorily.

Mr. Maclean: Funds are available through the probation supervision grants scheme for voluntary organisations providing sail and similarly challenging training to operate projects designed to strengthen the range and content of programmes for the supervision of offenders who are serving sentences in the community. I see a number of benefits from this approach, and will want to test the effectiveness of this kind of training and consider the scope for integrating it into other sentences. We are discussing with a number of probation services the extent to which offenders could participate in Excelsior Sailing Trust activities, which could be funded under the scheme.

Fast Response Cars

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many fast response police cars are currently in use in the metropolis; for which main purposes they are used; how many officers are directly involved in driving them; what is the cost; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Charles Wardle: I understand that 339 fast response cars are presently used by the Metropolitan police. The main purpose of such vehicles is to respond to emergency calls. They are also used for general patrol duties. A total of 2,077 officers have authority to drive these vehicles. The approximate total annual cost for the purchase, maintenance and other running costs is £2·94 million.

Prisoners' Families (Visits)

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the commitment by the Prison Service to pay for the travel costs of prisoners' families to make a second visit each month to their family member in prison where such families are eligible to receive public funds for such travel.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for these matters have been delegated to the director general of the prison service who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Derek Lewis to Mrs. Bridget Prentice, dated 25 November 1993:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about the position regarding the proposed extension of the Assisted Visits scheme to cover the second statutory monthly visit.

The White Paper "Custody, Care and Justice" included a commitment to consider extensions of the scheme as resources permit. We also have indicated in the Prison Service Business plan that the extension should take place this financial year.

No final decision on this matter has been taken. It will be necessary to do so in the light of the resources available to the Prison Service. I am afraid that it is not yet possible to say when it will be possible to finance the second visit per month. You may be assured, however, that we are well aware of the need to maintain close prisoner and family ties and the importance which prisoners and their families attach to visits.

Prison National Standards

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the document concerning the prison national standards will be published.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the director general of the prison service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Derek Lewis to Mr. Tom Cox, dated 25 November 1993.

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about when the document concerning the Prison National Standards will be published.

Drafting work on a Code of Standards for the Prison Service is nearing completion and we expect to publish it shortly.

Dangerous Dogs

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will bring forward proposals to amend the Dangerous Dogs Act 1991 to enable owners of relevant breeds to remove their dogs' muzzles to allow them to drink or to receive veterinary attention in a public place, especially if this is within a private motor vehicle.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The Government do not intend to weaken protection afforded by the Dangerous Dogs Act 1991. Recent tragic events have shown how wrong this would be.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many fatalities there have been due to dog attacks since Royal Assent was given to the Dangerous Dogs Act 1991; if he will name the breed of each dog involved; and whether it was registered under the Act;

(2) if he will make a statement on the future of the Dangerous Dogs Act 1991 following the recent death in Cleveland.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The tragic events in Cleveland underline the need for the strict provisions in the Dangerous Dogs Act, and how right the Government have been not to heed those who have sought to weaken it.

I understand that the dog involved in the Cleveland attack was identified by a veterinary surgeon as being a pit bull terrier type, with some mastiff or bull mastiff qualities. It has not been registered under the Act.

In other words, it fell within the Act's definition of a dog of the type known as a pit bull terrier.

I am aware of one other fatal injury caused by dogs since the coming into force of the Dangerous Dogs Act on 12 August 1991. This occurred in November 1991, and involved an attack on a boy by his family's pets, a Lakeland terrier, a great dane and a German shepherd, none of which are required to be registered under the Act.

Security Service

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if the Director General of the Security Service is on performance-related pay.

Mr. Howard: No.

Criminal Compensation

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received respecting recent changes in criminal compensation rules; what has been the nature of these representations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: Since announcing last November our intention to replace the present criminal injuries compensation scheme with a tariff scheme next year we have received representations and comment from a number of hon. Members, the Criminal Injuries Compensation Board, representative bodies of the legal profession, Victim Support local schemes and the national office, the Trades Union Congress and members of the public.

The representations have covered a range of issues, the main ones being the rationale for the change, the scope of the new arrangements, the way in which the new scheme will be administered and the appeal arrangements.

Ministerial Letters

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many officials are currently involved in drafting replies to letters for Ministers in his Department to sign.

Mr. Howard: The information requested could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. Many officials are involved as part of their normal duties in drafting replies for Ministers.

"A False Sense of Security"

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what response he has made to the document, "A False Sense of Security" published by the Children's Society, a copy of which has been sent to him; and what initiatives or policy changes he intends to put forward in response to that report.

Mr. Maclean: The second report of The Children's Society's advisory committee on young offenders, "A False Sense of Security", will be launched at a one day conference organised by The Children's Society today, 25 November 1993, at which I shall be giving a keynote address. My right hon. and learned Friend and I will be giving careful consideration to the contents of the report.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Industrial Injuries Benefit

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will provide (a) an estimate of the total number of claims expected for prescribed disease D12—coal miners' chronic bronchitis and emphysema—in each of the first three years following its prescription, (b) an estimate of the total number of awards expected for prescribed disease D12 in each of the first three years following its prescription and (c) an estimate of the total annual expenditure, pursuant to such awards over each of the three years in question.

Mr. Scott: The number of claims cannot be predicted with any certainty but operational plans have provided for handling 80,000-90,000 claims in the first year following prescription. The estimated total annual benefit cost is £6 million, based on the assumption that around 9,000 benefit awards will be made, nearly all in the first year. The numbers of new claims and awards in second and subsequent years are expected to be small.

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many industrial disablement claims for asbestos-related diseases referred to special medical boards, and the numbers in which the diseases were diagnosed in each year since 1991 in the same format as tables given in reply to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. Burden) of 28 January 1992, Official Report, columns 514-16.

Mr. Scott: The information is in the table.

Disability Living Allowance

Mr. Chisholm: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what percentage of disability living allowance claims this year have been (a) successful at the initial stage, (b) successful at the review stage and (c) successful on appeal.

Mr. Scott: In the period from 1 April 1993 to 31 October 1993 inclusive:

(a) 50 per cent. of new claims were successful.

(b) 46 per cent. of reviews (for whatever reason), were successful; and

(c) 44 per cent. of appeals decided were successful.

The figures relating to reviews and appeals do not necessarily relate to claims made during the relevant period. Reviews may be requested for reasons other than dissatisfaction with the result of a claim, for example, changes of circumstances.

Civil Servants

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list for each civil service grade in his Department (a) the total number of persons employed and (b) the total number of women employed.

Mr. Scott: The number of permanent staff employed by the Department, including its agencies, on 31 October 1993 was as follows:

Grade (including equivalent professional and other grades)	Total staff[1]	Number of women[1]
Grade 1	1	0
Grade 2	4	0
Grade 3	14	2
Grade 4	12	4
Grade 5	122	30

Administrative Officer	45,716	34,367
Administrative Assistant	15,469	10,719
Others	160	114
TOTAL	94,895	63,672

[1] Including part-time staff paid for more than 10 hours a week.

Notes:
1. Total of 94,895 equates to 88,435 full-time equivalent staff.
2. The table excludes:
   i) staff on loan or secondment and not being paid by the Department
   ii) staff on unpaid leave for more than three months or on unpaid maternity leave
   iii) casual staff.

Pensions

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will show as a table for each EU member state the level in pound sterling of the basic state pension, the SERPS or mandatory private pension and a total of both for an employee on national average earnings, married in a one-income household with no dependent children at time of retirement from the latest figures available.

Mr. Hague: The information requested is not available and could be obtained only at disproportinate cost. However the report of a study commissioned by the Department last year—the Watsons report—contains this information for six EC member states, including the United Kingdom. A copy of that report is in the Library.

Quarry House

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will give to the nearest £5,000 the value of the carpet in the entrance area of Quarry house, headquarters of his management executive.

Mr. Burt: The cost of the carpet linking the two courtyards within Quarry house was £15,000. This was part of the Quarry house project and a contribution to the Percent of Art initiative.

Vaccine Damage Compensation

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) in how many applications for vaccine compensation the reason has been given that there is insufficient documentary evidence;

(2) if he will list the number of cases in which applications for vaccine compensation have been rejected; and if he will provide the reasons why applications have been rejected in each case;

(3) in how many cases involving applications for vaccine compensation medical examinations have been carried out.

Mr. Hague: The information requested is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to undertake a comprehensive review of the vaccine compensation scheme.

Mr. Hague: We keep the vaccine damage payments scheme under constant review.

Media Interviews

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will publish the guidelines governing when media interviews dealing with the administration and efficiency of the Benefits Agency are given by officials of the agency and when by Ministers.

Mr. Scott: There are no such guidelines. Each request for interview is considered in the light of the relevant circumstances.

Child Support Agency

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make it his policy to remove from the Child Support Agency the powers to overturn clean break divorce settlements which have been established by courts or agreements; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Burt: Clean break settlements concern the financial affairs of former partners. There can be no clean break between parents and their children, and calculation of maintenance by the agency is based on the current needs of children, and the current income and outgoings of their parents. The formula which the agency uses to assess maintenance does take account of the practical consequences of such settlements, since the current housing costs of absent parents are allowed for in calculating their maintenance liability, and capital settlements may affect the assessable income both of absent parents and of parents with care. Where the practical outcome is that an absent parent has higher costs or lower income, his maintenance liability will consequently be less.

The operation of the Child Support Agency is being kept under review.

Sickness and Invalidity Benefit

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what numbers of new claimants have been accepted for (a) sickness benefit and (b) invalidity benefit in each of the past 12 months.

Mr. Scott: The information is not available in the form requested. The table shows the number of claims made to sickness and invalidity benefit for each month in Great Britain.

Month	Number of Sickness Benefit and Invalidity Benefit claims
November 1992	94,000
December 1992	79,000
January 1993	95,000
February 1993	90,000
March 1993	101,000
April 1993	90,000
May 1993	85,000
June 1993	94,000
July 1993	92,000
August 1993	88,000
September 1993	92,000
October 1993	91,000

Notes:
1. Figures are based on a 100 per cent. clerical count, rounded to the nearest thousand and are subject to amendment.
2. Separate figures are not available for Sickness Benefit and Invalidity Benefit.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what are the criteria according to which people are considered eligible to receive invalidity benefit with particular reference to ME—myalgic encephalomyelitis—sufferers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: Invalidity benefit is payable to people who remain incapable of work when their entitlement to sickness benefit or statutory sick pay ends, and who have satisfied the national insurance contribution conditions which apply to sickness benefit. Entitlement does not depend on the nature of a person's incapacity, and people suffering from ME qualify in the same way as other claimants if they satisfy these conditions.

Correspondence

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many officials in his Department are currently involved in drafting replies to letters for Ministers in his Department to sign.

Mr. Hague: The ministerial correspondence section, which allocates correspondence and ensures accuracy of drafts, comprises 15 staff.

It is part of the responsibility of most executive grade officers in the Department to produce draft replies to correspondence on issues within their area of responsibility. It is therefore impossible to quantify the number involved in producing drafts.

Disability Legislation

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what proposals he has to introduce anti-discrimination legislation on behalf of disabled people; what representations he has received on this subject; what his response has been; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: The Government have no plans to introduce such legislation. A number of organisations of and for disabled people and the all-party disablement group have made representations. While the Government share the aim of ending discrimination against disabled people, they do not see comprehensive legislation as the appropriate vehicle for doing so. At the Prime Minister's request, I am working with members of the all-party disablement group, to identify areas for further action where discrimination could be eliminated at little or no cost.

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will publish the management structure of the NHS management executive (a) before and (b) after the post of special project director was created.

Mr. Stewart: The post of special project director is outwith the management structure of the NHS Management Executive, reporting direct to the Chief Executive, NHS in Scotland.

EMPLOYMENT

Part-time Workers

Mr. Hanson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many part-time workers were in employment in (a) June 1993 and (b) June 1992.

Miss Widdecombe: The available information is as follows:

Part-time workforce in employment in Great Britain: Seasonally adjusted (thousands)

	Number
June 1992	6,683
June 1993	6,769

Employment Training

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the job entry rate for employment training leavers in each region.

Miss Widdecombe: The latest information available is in the following table:

Percentage of all leavers from employment training during the period April 1992 to January 1993 going into a job

Region	Percentage into a job[1]
South East	28
London	26
Eastern	30
South West	32
West Midlands	30
East Midlands	38
Yorkshire and Humberside	36
NW, Greater Manchester	33
North West	35
Northern	31
Wales	39
Scotland	34

Source: ET National Follow-up Survey.

[1] Into a Job includes full-time work, part-time work and self employment three months after leaving.

Training and Enterprise Councils (Secondments)

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many civil servants from his Department on secondment to training and enterprise councils have (a) applied for and (b) been accepted under the voluntary early retirement scheme; and of those, how many are now working permanently for the TEC to which they were seconded; and if he will make a statement.

Miss Widdecombe: Applications for voluntary early retirement were received from 171 staff on secondment to training and enterprise councils. A total of 153 were accepted. No information is available on the number, if any, now working permanently for the TEC to which they were seconded.

Correspondence

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many officials are currently involved in his Department in drafting replies to letters for Ministers to sign.

Miss Widdecombe: We do not keep a record of the number of officials currently involved in drafting ministerial replies and this information can be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Health and Safety Publications

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will reverse the decision of the Health and Safety Executive to award the contract for the distribution of official health and safety publications to Promotion Logics and Dillons bookstores; what assessment he has made of the level of public access to these publications and the competitive effect on other bookstores; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: This is a matter for the Health and Safety Executive but I understand the hon. Gentleman's concerns. I have already made inquiries and once these are complete I will write to him.

SCOTLAND

NHS Management Executive

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether it is the normal practice for posts in the NHS management executive to be advertised; and if he will list the exceptions there have been to such practice in recent years.

Mr. Stewart: Apart from the post of the chief executive, the only senior posts in the management executive to be advertised in recent years have been those of director of finance, director of operations and director of human resources.

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will conduct an investigation into the circumstances of Mr. Lawrence Peterken's dismissal as general manager of Greater Glasgow health board and his subsequent appointment to the post of special projects director with the NHS management executive.

Mr. Stewart: My right hon. Friend has already instituted such an investigation.

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish the job description and the terms and conditions under which the job of national health service management executive special projects director was offered to Mr. Peterken's.

Mr. Stewart: Mr. Peterken's duties will be to examine a number of issues that flow from the reforms that have been introduced in the NHS in the last few years. He will be employed on the terms and conditions applicable to general managers of health boards.

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland at what stage his views were sought on the appointment of Mr. Laurence Peterken's to the post of special projects director with the NHS Management Executive.

Mr. Stewart: This appointment was made by the Chief Executive, NHS in Scotland, after consulting my right hon. Friend and my noble and learned Friend.

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish the management structure of the NHS Management Executive (a) before and (b) after the post of special project director was created.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The post of special project director is outwith the management structure of the NHS Management Executive, Reporting direct to the Chief Executive, NHS in Scotland.

Forestry Commission

Sir David Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many representations the review group has received on the subject of the privatisation of the Forestry Commission.

Mr. Lang: More than 340 organisations and 1,450 individuals have made submissions or offered comment direct to the Forestry review group. Comment has also been addressed to Ministers and officials in the other departments represented on the group. The majority of letters are concerned about the effect that privatisation might have on access to woodlands, security of timber supplies and the environment.

Sir Thomas Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement about the future of the Forestry Commission.

Sir Hector Monro: Forestry Ministers have asked the forestry review group to review the effectiveness of the current incentives for forestry investment, in accordance with the manifesto commitment, and options for the ownership and management of Forestry Commission woodlands, and to make proposals for changes which would improve the effectiveness of the delivery of the Government's forestry policy objectives, having regard to the Government's other economic and environmental policies.

My right hon. Friend does not wish to make any statement about the future of the Forestry Commission until Ministers have received and studied the advice of the review group.

Mr. Tipping: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what arrangements exist for the making of submissions to him from local people, organisations and local authorities in respect of which areas of Forestry Commission land should not be privatised.

Sir Hector Monro: Forestry Ministers have asked the forestry review group to review options for the ownership and management of Forestry Commission woodlands, and to make proposals for changes which would improve the effectiveness of the delivery of the Government's forestry policy objectives, having regard to the Government's other economic and environmental policies.

Once they have received and considered the advice of the review group they will decide what further action, if any, should be taken.

In the meantime, individuals and interested bodies are welcome to address comments on the work of the review group to its Secretary:

Young Persons Secure Accommodation

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many places in secure accommodation there are for persons aged under 16 years in Scotland; and where they were located, in each year since 1986.

Mr. Stewart: The number of secure places in Scotland formally approved by the Secretary of State since 1986 is as follows:

	Number
Rossie school Montrose	25
St. Mary's Kenmure school Glasgow	24
Kerelaw school Stevenston	24 (18 in 1986-1988)

	Number
Howdenhall children's unit Edinburgh	5
Rimbleton house Glenrothes	2
Brodie youth care centre Polmont (formerly Weedingshall)	2 (0 in 1986; 1 in 1987-89)
Hightrees assessment centre Closeburn (formerly Closeburn)	2 (0 in 1986)

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how much direct central Government support is paid towards the cost of the secure accommodation for persons aged under 16 years in each financial year since 1986 in (a) Rossie school, Montrose, (b) St. Mary's Kenmure school, Glasgow, (c) Kerelaw school, Stevenson, (d) Howdenhall children's unit, Edinburgh, (e) Rumbleton house, Glenrothes, (f) Weedingshall youth care centre, Polmont and (g) Closeburn assessment centre, Closeburn.

Mr. Stewart: Capital grants were paid by the Secretary of State towards secure accommodation as follows:

	1986-87 £	1987-88 £	1988-89 £	1989-90 £	1990-91 £	1991-92 £	1992-93 £
Rossie school	68,396	71,448	69,770	36,626	41,336	59,139	64,152
St Mary's Kenmure school	9,560	165,483	—	21,177	37,064	60,074	109,459
Weedingshall youth care centre (now Brodie)	—	—	—	63,000	—	—	—
Howdenhall centre	—	—	—	—	—	—	[1]106,718

Note:
[1] Part of total grant offer of £1,139,784.

Until 1990 the Secretary of State paid grants towards the revenue costs of Rossie and St Mary's schools, but specific information on these payments is not readily available.

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish the average annual cost of keeping a person in the accommodation units at (a) Rossie school, (b) St. Mary's Kenmure school, Glasgow, (c) Kerelaw school, Stevenson, (d) Howdenhall children's unit, Edinburgh, (e) Rumbleton house, Glenrothes, (f) Weedingshall youth care centre, Polmont and (g) Closeburn assessment centre, Closeburn; and what proportion of such cost is met by direct Government grant.

Mr. Stewart: The annual cost of keeping a person in the secure units (based on current weekly bed-rate figures) is as follows:

Rossie school	59,696
St. Mary's Kenmure	56,940
Kerelaw school	65,780
Howdenhall children's unit	58,500
Rimbleton house	60,060
Weedingshall youth care centre (now Brodie)	74,270
Closeburn assessment centre (now Hightrees)	77,168

The Scottish Office does not pay grants to assist with revenue costs.

List D Schools

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish the amount of central Government financial support paid to list D category schools in Scotland in each of the five years preceding their abolition from 1 April 1986; and if he will express that central Government support as a percentage of the total cost of these schools in each year.

Mr. Stewart: The Secretary of State paid grants towards the capital costs of those schools up to 1986 as follows:

1981-82	366,476
1982-83	229,599
1983-84	227,005
1984-85	308,269
1985-86	354,684

At the same time, the Secretary of State paid grants towards the revenue costs of the schools but specific information is not readily available on the percentage of final current expenditure which these grants met.

Health Service Staff

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the number of (a) administrative and clerical staff, (b) managerial staff and (c) nursing and midwifery staff employed in the NHS in each year since 1989.

Mr. Stewart: The information requested for the NHS in Scotland is as follows:

	September 1989	September 1990	September [1]1991	September [1]1992	March [1]1993
(a) Head count
Nursing and midwifery[2]	74,949	74,573	75,068	73,605	71,506
Managerial staff[3,5]	800	1,072	1,315	1,678	1,834
Administrative and clerical[4]	16,617	17,136	17,679	18,584	18,677
(b) Whole-time equivalent
Nursing and midwifery[2]	64,452·3	63,687·2	63,503·0	61,652·0	60,252·5
Managerial staff[3,5]	797·6	1,064·5	1,301·3	1,661·6	1,810·2
Administrative and clerical[4]	14,425·3	14,859·3	15,282·8	15,978·0	16,125·8

Notes:
[1] 1991, 1992, 1993 figures include the State Hospital, Carstairs.
[2] Nursing and midwifery staff include qualified, unqualified and in training nurses. The decrease of numbers between 1991, 1992 and 1993 is wholly accounted for by a decrease in and transfer out of NHS employment of those in training: in particular, Project 2000 student nurses, who are excluded from the figures, are not directly employed by the NHS.
[3] 1989 data include administrative and clerical staff on grade 18 and above; 1990-1992 data include grades 7 and above.
[4] Excludes managerial staff. Includes control assistants and ambulance officers.
[5] The increase in numbers in this group is partially accounted for by the transfer of some professional staff to senior manager grades.

Former NHS Workers

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to make use of the experience of former NHS workers

Mr. Stewart: The Scottish Office has for many years made use of experience of staff previously employed in the NHS and I expect this practice to continue.

Health Board Managers

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what experience of the health service is required of applicants for the post of general manager of a health board.

Mr. Stewart: This is a matter for the recruiting health board itself to consider.

Greater Glasgow Health Board

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent communications he has had with Mr. Bill Fyfe, chairman of Greater Glasgow health board; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stewart: My noble and learned Friend met health board chairmen, including Mr. Fyfe, on 5 November. In addition, my right hon. Friend spoke to Mr. Fyfe by telephone on Wednesday 24 November.

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland which firms have been chosen to do public relations work for Greater Glasgow health board; and what has been the total value of this contract.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 23 November 1993]: Firms employed by Greater Glasgow health board in 1992-93 and 1993-94 (to 31 October 1993) are Faulds, Michael Kelly Associates Limited, Proscot, Alan Clark Associates and PR Consultants (Scotland), with a total spend of £534,954·40 in 1992-93 and £168,624·38 in 1993-94 to date.

Local Authority Boundaries

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received from (a) Musselburgh and (b) Prestonpans in favour of putting those two towns in separate local authority areas; and how many representations he has received opposing the creation of such a boundary.

Mr. Stewart: Since publication of the White Paper, "Shaping the Future—The New Council", a total of 29 individual letters from Musselburgh and two from Prestonpans have expressed concern over the restructuring proposals for these areas. In addition, a number of representations from outwith these areas have expressed concern over the problems to which the White Paper boundaries would give rise in Prestonpans.

Melrose Bypass

Sir David Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the finishing of construction of the proposed Melrose bypass.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 23 November 1993]: I am currently considering the report of the public local inquiry into the proposal for the Melrose bypass phase 3 and a decision will be issued as soon as possible.

ENVIRONMENT

Countryside Survey

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he published the survey of the countryside commissioned by his Department; how many copies were printed; to whom they have been distributed; and what policy proposals he intends to develop arising from the findings of the report.

Mr. Yeo: The results of Countryside Survey 1990 were published by the Department on 17 November in a main report and a summary report. 1,500 copies of the main report and 3,300 copies of the summary report have been printed. The reports have been distributed to the 150 guests at the launch, representing Government Departments, non-departmental public bodies, non-governmental organisations, research institutions, industry, academia and the press. Wider distribution of 1,000 copies of the summary report to include local authorities is in progress. Copies have been deposited in the House Library and are also available from my Department's publications sales unit priced at £12 for the main report and £6 for the summary report.

Countryside survey 1990 reports on the 12-year period leading up to 1990. Since 1990 the Government have set in place a range of positive policy measures in the countryside. These include the introduction of the countryside stewardship scheme in England and the Tir Cymen scheme in Wales in June 1992; in 1991 the introduction of the hedgerow incentive scheme; in 1992; the extension and development of environmentally sensitive areas; and the integration of environmental measures in the reform of the common agricultural policy.

Further work has been commissioned by my Department to improve our understanding of the reasons for the changes recorded, and we shall commission a further survey in the year 2000.

Shopping Centres

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what are his current proposals concerning out-of-town shopping centres.

Mr. Baldry: The Secretary of State's current policy is set out in Planning Policy Guidance note 6, "Town Centres and Retail Developments", published in July. It should be taken into account by local authorities as they prepare their development plans, and in deciding individual applications. Among other things, it stresses a suitable balance in providing for retail development between town centre and out-of-centre retail facilities, taking account of factors such as accessibility and effective competition that will benefit consumers generally.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment for how many out-of-town shopping centres he has given planning permission for each year since 1979; and which companies have been successful.

Mr. Baldry: The Secretary of State granted permission, on appeal, for major retail developments over 1,000 sq. metres floor space as follows:

Year	Number of Appeals Allowed
*1984-85	28
1985-86	42
1986-87	82
1987-88	88
1988-89	65
1989-90	37
1990-91	43
1991-92	47
1992-93	70

* This covers the period from 1 January 1984 to 31 March 1985

No data is readily available for the period 1979-1983, nor is data readily available for the number of called-in applications approved. It is not possible to distinguish between town centre schemes and out of town developments, nor to identify the developers or companies involved, without unreasonable cost.

Sainsbury's, Yeovil

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the planning application for Sainsbury's plans to develop Wyndham Hill in Yeovil.

Mr. Baldry: As a departure from the development plan the application has been referred to the Secretary of State, who will decide whether or not to call it in.

Local Government Review

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the mode of transport used by each member of the Local Government Commission in performing their duties in the local government review, with the class of travel used.

Mr. Baldry: Travel expenses necessarily incurred by members on Commission business are payable in accordance with the arrangements made for senior staff of the commission. Civil service terms and conditions excluding pay apply to these staff. Accordingly, the commission has discretion to determine its own arrangements for reimbursement of travel expenses within the rules and principles set out in the civil service management code.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what has been the total cost of the public opinion surveys carried out in the course of the local government review.

Mr. Baldry: This is a matter for the Local Government Commission.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the current situation with regard to local government reorganisation.

Mr. Baldry: My right hon. Friend announced on 2 November his decision to implement the Local Government Commission's recommendations in respect of the Isle of Wight. We are currently considering the Government's response to the commission's recommendations concerning Derbyshire, Cleveland and Durham. The commission is preparing reports on Avon, Gloucestershire and Somerset, and on Humberside, Lincolnshire and North Yorkshire. The commission has been directed to begin reviews of the remaining shire counties on 13 December 1993 and to submit all reports on or before 30 December 1994.

Ministerial Visits

Mr. Faulds: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many cities he has visited since his appointment as Secretary of State.

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many cities he has visited since his appointment as Secretary of State.

Mr. Clapham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many cities he has visited since his appointment.

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many cities he has visited since his appointment.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many cities and towns he has visited in England since his appointment.

Mr. Gummer: Fourteen cities and 13 towns.

Civil Servants

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list for each civil service grade in his Department (a) the total number of persons employed and (b) the total number of women employed.

Mr. Gummer: The following information covers non-industrial staff:

Grade	Total	Women
Grade 1	1	0
Grade 2	7	3
Grade 3	34	5
Grade 4	7	0
Grade 5	144	20
Grade 6	309	30
Grade 7	776	128
SEO and equivalent	740	133
HEO and equivalent	981	305
EO and equivalent	1,224	524
AO and equivalent	1,601	995
AA and equivalent	790	518
Totals	6,614	2,661

Capital Receipts Holiday

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to extend the capital receipts holiday.

Mr. Baldry: We have no such plans.

Local Government Reorganisation 1974

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the cost of the local government reorganisation in 1974; and what savings have been made to date.

Mr. Baldry: This information is not available.

Local Government Commission

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what has been the cost to public funds of the Local Government Commission's travel expenses up to 28 October.

Mr. Baldry: This is a matter for the Local Government Commission.

City Pride

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what additional resources are available to urban areas as a result of City Pride.

Mr. Baldry: There are no additional resources for City Pride. Central and local government as well as the private sector will continue to spend large sums of money in London, Birmingham and Manchester. City Pride is about making the most of this investment, building on the vision and strengths of the partnership which exist there and providing a lasting foundation for growth. The Department has already constructive discussions with the three cities about taking forward this new initiative.

Trading Standards Service

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what will be the impact of the proposals contained in the Local Government Review on the Trading Standards Service; and what measures the Government plans to take to protect this service.

Mr. Baldry: The Local Government Commission's recommendations must enable adequate provision to be made for all existing local government functions, including the trading standards service. This is a matter we shall be looking at as we receive the commission's final reports for each area.

Environmental Taxes

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has on the proposals advanced by the OECD for implementation of environmental taxes in OECD member countries.

Mr. Gummer: The OECD have done a good deal of analytical work on the use member countries make of economic instruments to advance environmental policies, but I am not aware that they have made any proposals for the implementation of environmental taxes.

Housing (Managing Agents)

Mr. Miller: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what plans he has to make it compulsory for landlords to consult leaseholders in sheltered accommodation, where known, before the appointment of a managing agent in all circumstances;

(2) what reforms he plans to ensure that leaseholders in sheltered accommodation can dismiss or replace an unsatisfactory managing agent more easily;

(3) what plans he has to ensure that landlords and managing agents who breach the Landlord and Tenant Acts are prosecuted;

(4) what steps he has taken to ensure that leaseholders in sheltered accommodation are aware of their rights under the Landlord and Tenant Acts 1985 and 1987, and the Leasehold Reform, Housing and Urban Development Act.

Sir George Young: All leaseholders are protected by the contractual terms of their leases, which define the rights and duties of landlords and tenants and the basis of service charges. In addition, the Landlord and Tenants Acts 1985 and 1987 give tenants additional statutory rights.

The Government have no plans to make it compulsory for landlords to consult leaseholders in any type of accommodation before appointing a managing agent. However, under the existing legislation, a recognised tenants association has the right, at any time, to serve a notice on the landlord asking him to consult the association about the appointment or employment of a managing agent. Tenants of flats, either individually or as a group, can apply to the county court for the appointment of a manager if the landlord or his agent is in breach of his management obligations.

In addition, if, in accordance with the Leasehold Reform, Housing and Urban Development Act, a group of tenants enfranchise and purchase the freehold of their block, they will be able to dismiss an unsatisfactory agent and appoint their own replacement.

Where a landlord has failed to comply with certain provisions of the Landlord and Tenant Acts the tenant has the right to seek redress through the courts. In certain cases the landlord may be committing a criminal offence and a local authority which is a housing authority may prosecute.

The Department issues press releases to draw attention to new or amended legislation which affects the rights of landlords and tenants. It also publishes information booklets on these rights from time to time which are supplied to the public on request. The booklets may also be obtained from local libraries and citizens-advice bureaux.

Community Charge Form (Auction)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement as to how the previous occupant of No. 10 Downing street's completed community charge form for 1989 came into the hands of auctioneer Trevor Vennett-Smith of Gotham, Nottinghamshire.

Mr. Baldry: This is a matter for the local authority concerned.

Wildlife Habitats

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what action he is proposing to take to prevent further decline in the number of important wildlife habitats as revealed in the 1990 countryside survey.

Mr. Yeo: Countryside Survey 1990 reports on the 12-year period leading up to 1990. Since 1990 the Government has set in place a range of positive policy measures in the countryside. These include the introduction of the countryside stewardship scheme in England in June 1991 and the similar Tir Cymen scheme in Wales; the introduction of the hedgerow incentive scheme in 1992 and the extension and development of environmentally sensitive areas (ESAs). The United Kingdom has also strongly advocated the integration of environmental considerations in the reform of the common agricultural policy.

The United Kingdom played a leading role in the negotiations which resulted in the EC Habitats Directive and consequently welcomed its adoption in May 1992 as a step forward for nature conservation in the Community. The Government is fully committed to meeting its obligations under the directive and has just undertaken a wide public consultation process on its proposals for implementing the directive.

Acid Rain

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what measures he is undertaking to prevent damage to flora and fauna from acid rain.

Mr. Yeo: The Government have in place a range of measures to control and progressively reduce emissions of sulphur dioxide and oxides of nitrogen, the two main precursors of acid rain. These measures were set out in the 1990 Environment White Paper, "This Common Inheritance", and subsequent annual reports. Copies are available in the Library of the House.

Homelessness

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he can provide figures on homelessness for (a) Coventry, (b) the west midlands and (c) London and the average for major cities in the United Kingdom.

Sir George Young: The latest estimates of the number of households for whom local authorities in the west midlands and London accepted responsibility to secure permanent accommodation appear in table 1(a) of "Households found accommodation under the homelessness provisions of the 1985 Housing Act 1985: England. Statistics for the second quarter of 1993".

The latest reported figure for Coventry, and other major cities in England, appear in the associated supplementary table.

Copies of both are in the Library.

For information about Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland I refer the hon. Member to my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Wales, for Scotland and for Northern Ireland respectively.

Deregulation

Mr. Kevin Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the regulations being considered as part of his Department's plans for deregulation in pollution control.

Mr. Yeo: A list of regulations affecting business, including those dealing with pollution control, was placed in the House of Commons library on 20 April 1993.

Mr. Kevin Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the regulations being considered as part of his Department's plans for deregulation in environment protection.

Mr. Yeo: A list of regulations affecting business, including those dealing with environmental protection, was placed in the House of Commons Library on 20 April 1993.

Correspondence

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many officials in his Department are currently involved in drafting replies to letters for Ministers to sign.

Mr. Gummer: It is not possible to identify the number of officials involved in drafting replies for ministerial signature. Many staff in my Department will be involved at some time in assisting with gathering material for, and the drafting of, letters for Ministers to sign.

Council Tax

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many appeals against council tax valuation remain outstanding (a) in total, (b) by local authority and (c) by standard region.

Mr. Curry: As at 30 October 1993, there were 597,931 proposals to alter the council tax valuation list outstanding. This figure is broken down on the tables below by billing authority and by Valuation Office Agency region. The information is not collected by standard statistical region.

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the average cost to public funds of processing an appeal against a property valuation for council tax purposes.

Mr. Curry: The estimated average cost of processing a council tax appeal in the current financial year is £115. This estimate includes Valuation Office Agency and valuation tribunal costs.

Local Government Reorganisation

Mr. Tipping: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his latest estimate of transitional costs in respect of local government reorganisation in England.

Mr. Baldry: My right hon. Friend has made no estimate of the transitional costs of local government reorganisation.

Mr. Tipping: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to increase the level of total standard spending and aggregate external finance to meet the transitional costs of local government reorganisation.

Mr. Baldry: We intend to take any transitional costs of local government reorganisation into account in deciding the appropriate provision for local government expenditure for a year. My right hon. Friend intends to announce his proposals for the 1994-95 local government finance settlement shortly.

Nirex

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what will be done with the toxic effluent arising from the excavations for the Nirex low level radioactive waste repository.

Mr. Yeo: Construction and operation of the Nirex repository will be undertaken in accordance with the statutory controls.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what volume of rock and spoil will be or has been removed in the construction of (a) the reference design for the Nirex low and intermediate level radioactive waste depository and (b) the channel tunnel.

Mr. Yeo: United Kingdom Nirex Ltd. is currently working on the estimated volumes of spoil to be removed in the construction of the planned deep disposal facility for intermediate and low level radioactive waste. I have arranged for the chairman of United Kingdom Nirex Ltd. to write to the hon. Gentleman. Some 7·5 million cubic metres have been excavated in building the channel tunnel.

Advisory Committee on Business and the Environment

Mr. Heald: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has for the future of the Advisory Committee on Business and the Environment.

Mr. Gummer: The Advisory Committee on Business and the Environment was appointed for an initial two-year term in May 1991. It proved an extremely valuable forum for strategic dialogue between Government and industry in environmental issues, and produced a series of practical, action-orientated recommendations in its three progress reports.

In light of the importance of the committee's work, I am delighted to announce that my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade and I have appointed a successor committee under the chairmanship of Derek Wanless, Group Chief Executive of National Westminster Bank. The reconstituted committee met for the first time yesterday. Its membership is as follows:

Development Plans

Mr. Forman To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what advice his Department has given to local authorities about how to carry out environmental appraisal of development plans.

Mr. Baldry: Planning Policy Guidance Note 12 asks local planning authorities to carry out an environmental appraisal of their development plan policies. In addition, the Department today published "Environmental Appraisal of Development Plans: A Good Practice Guide" which provides advice on a straightforward range of techniques and procedures. It clearly shows the benefits of environmental appraisal, and how it can be easily integrated into stage of the plan-making process. Environmental appraisal can be an important tool in helping to meet the wider goal of sustainable development. Local authorities should carry out plan appraisals to ensure that they contribute to this aim.

Compulsory Competitive Tendering

Mr. Hendry To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment in how many cases he has taken statutory action against local authorities in relation to compulsory competitive tendering of council services.

Mr. Baldry: The table lists the number of such cases from January 1989 to the end of September 1993. It gives full details of the cases in the period July to September 1993, summary figures for the year to date, and the cumulative total from 1989.

I am publishing this information today and propose to issue regular up-date reports.

The table shows that in the period January to September 1993, the Secretary of State served 17 notices and 9 directions relating to anti-competitive tendering of council services; and 80 notices and nine directions relating to the financial failure by local authorities' direct service organisations to achieve the required financial objectives.

Oslo Commission

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the reasons for the transfer of responsibility for the Oslo Commission from the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to the Department of the Environment.

Mr. Yeo: Responsibility for policy on the questions covered by the Oslo Commission (principally relating to dumping of materials at sea) has not been transferred: this remains with the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. What has been transferred is responsibility for the payment of the annual contribution to the commission's costs. This follows from the merger of the budgets of the Oslo Commission and the Paris Commission (for policy on which the Department of the Environment is responsible) in the run-up to the establishment of a single commission when the 1992 convention on the protection of the marine environment of the north-east Atlantic comes into force.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Small Claims

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many cases were referred to the small claims procedure in 1991-92 and 1992-93.

Mr. John M. Taylor: The number of cases which were dealt with using the small claims arbitration procedure in 1991-92 and 1992-93 was 66,090 and 89,104 respectively.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department (1) how many small claims cases in 1991-92 and 1992-93 were (a) personal injury cases, (b) consumer goods cases and (c) debt reclamation;

(2) in how many small personal injury claims in the past year the defendant has been represented by a barrister;

(3) how many proceedings were issued in the county courts in 1991-92 and 1992-93 of (a) less than £1,000, (b) between £1,000 and £2,500 and (c) between £2,500 and £5,000;

(4) what proportion of county court cases in 1991-92 and 1992-93 in the value of (a) £1,000-£2,500 and (b) £2,500-£5,000 were (i) debt recoupment, (ii) personal injury and (iii) consumer goods cases;

(5) in how many small personal injury claims in the past year the defendant has been represented by a barrister.

Mr. John M. Taylor: This information is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Personal Injury Cases

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what was the average level of costs charged for (a) legal expertise, (b) medical evidence, (c) ergonomics and engineering evidence, (d) police evidence and (e) witness evidence in county court personal injury cases in (i) 1990-91, (ii) 1991-92 and (iii) 1992-93.

Mr. John M. Taylor: This information is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Arts Council

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if he will announce his conclusions on the Arts Council review.

Mr. Brooke: In my statement of 21 July, Official Report, columns 355-66, I set out a clearer framework for the Government's relationship with the Arts Council of England. As part of this, I asked the council to consider ways in which its accountability could be improved, and to review the scope for savings in its administrative costs. I am now in a position to announce my conclusions on this further work.

As I made clear in my earlier statement, the Government remain committed to the "arm's-length principle" for arts funding. This leaves the council to steer the general direction of artistic policy and to decide the allocation of resources. But with that degree of independence for the council in the use of taxpayers' money comes also the responsibility for explaining their decisions clearly and fully. Accordingly, I have explored with the chairman ways in which the council's accountability can be improved. Among the council's proposals are twice-yearly public seminars outside London; occasional or regular presentations to the National Heritage Select Committee, should the Committee agree; an annual Arts Council lecture by the chairman or a council member; annual policy seminars covering the different art forms, led by art form panel chairman and attended by the relevant art form constituency and specialist press; meetings with representative associations; and, subject to the agreement of the arts organisations concerned, publication of summaries of council appraisal reports. I welcome these proposals, and have asked the chairman to follow them up.

I have also explored with the chairman the scope for making savings in the council's administrative costs. At my request, the council has undertaken a full analysis of its activities in relation to the core functions identified in my earlier statement, including the opportunities for market testing, and assessed the scope for administrative reductions. In the light of this analysis, I am persuaded that there is scope for making savings in the council's administrative costs without damage to its core functions and while meeting the costs associated with increased accountability. I have therefore asked the council now to implement a reduction of 8 per cent. in its current gross administrative costs, equivalent to a saving approaching £600,000 in a full year. It will be for the council itself to determine the precise areas where these savings are to be achieved and to identify them in its business plan for next year.

In addition, the council is due shortly to complete its own review of staffing and structure in the regional arts boards, and some further administrative streamlining may be possible as a result. The council will also hold further discussions with the regional arts boards about delegation of projects and schemes activity, and aim to reach conclusions by the end of the current financial year.

The statement marks the end of the long series of reviews by the Government into the structures and staffing of the arts funding system. The effect has been to establish appropriate levels for decision making, to clarify accountability and to reduce bureaucracy. It is now for the council to settle the detailed framework within which those working in the arts community can operate. My Department will continue, as a regular part of discussions in the corporate and business planning context, to keep the administrative costs associated with the funding system under close scrutiny. Our aim will be to ensure that overheads are kept to a minimum and that as much as possible of the available resources is channelled directly to arts practitioners and to the artistic activity which must be the focus of all our endeavours.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Benefits Agency

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many visiting officers were available to his Department and the Benefits Agency in each administrative region in the United Kingdom in each of the last five years, together with the staff projections for the number of visiting officers that will be available in each region over the next three years.

Mr. Burt: The administration of the Benefits Agency is a matter for its chief executive, Mr. Michael Bichard. He will write to the hon. Member with such information as is available.

Letter from M. Bichard to Mr. Archy Kirkwood, dated 25 November 1993:

As Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency it is my responsibility to answer questions about relevant operational matters. I am therefore replying to your recent Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security asking, how many visiting officers were available to his Department and the Benefits Agency in each administrative region in the United Kingdom in each of the last five years, together with the staff projections for the number of visiting officers that will be available in each region over the next three years.

The overwhelming majority of visiting officers available to the Department of Social Security are associated with the administration of claims to Income Support and the Social Fund. Since 1 April 1991, the Benefits Agency has been solely responsible for that administration.

The Contributions Agency and Child Support Agency are also Executive Agencies of the Department and have some visiting staff available to them. However, the duties of those staff and their deployment throughout the United Kingdom are fundamentally different to those of Benefits Agency staff and I am advised by my colleagues in those Agencies that information relating specifically to visiting staff is not available and could only be obtained at a disproportionate cost. For these reasons I have excluded those staff from the figures I present to you.

The numbers of Income Support and Social Fund visiting staff for which resources were made available for each of the last four years are shown on the attached table. (Table attached.) However, local managers do have the authority to deploy their resources differently, using their knowledge of local needs and circumstances.

I am afraid that comparative information for the financial year 1989-90 is not available.

Staffing projections for this work area are currently part of the PES negotiations. These projections take account of current requirements, as well as unemployment and other demographic factors which arise influencing benefit take up and activity. I may say that at this stage significant changes to current requirements are not anticipated.

Finally may I assure you that the Benefits Agency is fully committed to maintain the home visiting service as a key element of its "customer service programme."

I hope you find this reply helpful. A copy will appear in the Official Report and a copy will also be placed in the Library.

Cold Weather Payments

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security in which parts of the United Kingdom cold weather payments have been triggered during the very cold weather during November; and if he will outline the main conditions to be met before cold weather payments are triggered.

Mr. Scott: The administration of cold weather payments is a matter for Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from M. Bichard to Mr. David Winnick, dated 25 November 1993:

As Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency, it is my responsibility to answer questions about relevant operational matters. I am therefore replying to your recent Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security asking, in which parts of the United Kingdom cold weather payments have been triggered during the very cold weather in November, and if he will outline the main conditions to be met before cold weather payments are triggered.

A period of cold weather is classed as seven consecutive days during which the average mean daily temperature is, or is forecast to be 0 degrees Centigrade or less. A forecast is based on information received daily, by the Agency, from the Met. Office.

As of 25 November cold weather had been triggered or forecast for areas covered by 43 Benefits Agency (BA) Districts which are listed in the attached appendix.

I hope you find this reply helpful. A copy of this letter will appear in the Official Report and a copy will also be placed in the Library.

Retirement Pensions

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what percentage of national average earnings the basic state pension for a single person amounted to in (a) 1960, (b) 1970, (c) 1980 and (d) 1990.

Mr. Hague: The information is not available for 1960. The Employment Department's new earnings survey, on which the figures are based, did not start until 1970. The basic state pension for a single person as a percentage of national average earnings amounted to (a) 19·3 per cent. at April 1970, (b) 22·6 per cent. at November 1980, and (c) 17·8 per cent. at April 1990.

Social Affairs Council

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what proposals were put forward by EU member states at the Social Affairs Council meeting in Brussels on 23 November.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I have been asked to reply.

I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to the hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Duncan Smith) on 24 November 1993, Official Report, column 72.

EDUCATION

Voluntary-aided Schools

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many applications have been received from local education authorities, diocesan boards or currently operating private schools for voluntary-aided status for (a) Protestant, (b) Catholic, (c) Hindu, (d) Jewish and (e) Muslim schools since 1983; and how many applications by each denomination have been successful.

Mr. Robin Squire: Full information dating back to 1983 is not readily available. However, in the last five years since November 1988, 23 applications have been received to establish new voluntary-aided schools. These include six Church of England schools, two Interchurch CE/Methodist and one Interchurch CE/RC, seven Catholic, five Jewish and two Muslim schools. Ten applications were successful: Two Church of England, one Interchurch CE/Methodist and one Interchurch CE/RC, four Catholic and two Jewish schools.

Overseas Visits

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many visits abroad he has made during 1993; and what was (a) the cost to public funds and (b) the purpose of each visit.

Mr. Patten: I have made one official trip overseas in 1993. Between 7 November and 9 November, I and two officials visited Slovakia. During the visit, I met the Slovakian Education Minister and other representatives of the Slovakian Government, and visited four universities, one of which is developing close links with the Open university.

The cost of the visit was approximately £2,250.

Grant-maintained Schools

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many (a) primary and (b) secondary schools have to date (i) applied for and (ii) received approval for grant-maintained status from his Department in each of the London boroughs; and what percentage these represent of the total number of schools in each borough.

Mr. Robin Squire: The information requested is set out in the tables.

School Starting Dates

Mr. Don Foster: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will list those local education authorities which have a single annual starting date for children starting school at age five years.

Mr. Robin Squire: This information is not collected centrally.

VAT (Books)

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what estimate he has made of the amount of VAT which would be payable in the next financial year by schools if the tax were extended to books and periodicals, assuming unchanged patterns of expenditure.

Mr. Robin Squire: None. I cannot comment on speculation about possible Budget measures. But local education authority schools are able to claim refunds of the VAT costs they incur on their purchases. Self-governing schools receive a special purpose grant to compensate them for their VAT costs on leaving the LEA sector.

Sex Education

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will issue guidelines to schools incorporating the policies set out in the Sex Education Forum's recent publication, "A Framework for School Sex Education"; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Forth: The statutory requirements for sex education in schools have changed since the publication by the independent Sex Education Forum of "A Framework for School Sex Education" in 1992. We intend to consult shortly on draft guidance to schools on the new arrangements for sex education introduced under section 241 of the Education Act 1993. Following consultation, we plan to issue it to schools next spring, to help them to develop and implement appropriate policies and programmes of sex education.

English

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will publish the actual statistics of the responses received to the questions in section G of the revised order for national curriculum English referred to in paragraph 2.5 of the National Curriculum Council consultation report.

Mr. Robin Squire: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave to the hon. Member for Dewsbury (Mrs. Taylor) on 23 November 1993, Official Report, column 24.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Environmental Problems

Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commercial Affairs what support the Government are giving to developing countries in their efforts to tackle national and global environmental problems.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We have committed substantial resources to help developing countries with their national environmental issues including £40 million to support biodiversity projects, £150 million to about 200 forestry projects, and £86 million for energy efficiency programmes in India.

We have also committeed over £40 million to the global environment facility, and $13·8 million to the Montreal protrocol multilateral fund, to meet the incremental cost to developing countries of action on the global environment to protect the climate system, biodiversity, international waters and the ozone layer. We will be contributing to the replenishments of the global environment facility and the Montreal protocol multilateral fund.

Tanzania

Sir Thomas Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a further statement about the port of Tanga, Tanzania.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The Tanzanian Harbours Authority has recently advised us of revisions to the tariffs to be charged at Tanga port from 1 December. The potential effect of these changes on future traffic at the port is being examined by the consultants we engaged to review the justification for the project as orginally envisaged, about which my right hon. and noble Friend the Minister for Overseas Development wrote to my hon. Friend on 2 November. A copy of the letter has been placed in the Library.

Desertification

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make statement on progress made to date in the intergovernmental negotiating committee for desertification; how many sessions of the Committee have been held; how the United Kingdom is represented; and what are the Overseas Development Administration's policies to mitigate desertification.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The intergovernmental negotiating committee has held one preparatory and two substantive sessions. The United Kingdom is represented by a delegation led by the Overseas Development Administration and including officials of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and the Department of the Environment. Negotiations to date have been concerned with the general scope of the convention, and will now proceed to negotiation of text.

We support national plans of action of desertification, drawn up by affected developing countries. We are providing substantial support to efforts to mitigate desertification through bilateral projects, support to non-government organisations and research, and through our contributions to multilateral institutions.

African Elephants

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has received on funding birth control schemes for African elephants.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We have not been asked to fund birth control schemes for African elephants.

TRANSPORT

Roads (Contracts)

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he has taken to ensure a procedure exists to investigate circumstances which suggest impropriety amongst contractors or subcontractors in respect of contracting for roads.

Mr. Key: All tenders for road works are routinely examined for evidence of corrupt practice, and the Department's staff are regularly reminded of the need to be vigilant in reporting any suspected cases of contractual impropriety. Close links are maintained with the Office of Fair Trading.

M40

Mr. Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what considerations underlie the absence of provision of service stations or rest areas along the M40 motorway; what proposals he has for providing such facilities; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Key: My Department proposed three motorway service areas (MSAs) for the M40, intending to open them at about the same time as the road. All three schemes, however, provoked objections which led to lengthy public inquiries and substantial delays in provision. Planning clearance was eventually refused for one of the sites, but it was granted for the other two and construction is now under way; both are due to open next year. In the meantime temporary facilities, open 24 hours a day, are signposted from the motorway at junction 10 and between junctions 13 and 15.

Following a commitment in the citizens charter, future MSAs will be promoted by the private sector rather than the Department. I understand that at least three planning applications for further MSAs on the M40 are currently under consideration.

Transpennine Study

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many officials in his Department are currently working on the issues raised by the transpennine study.

Mr. Key: No staff are working exclusively on this project. Officials from five regional offices, as well as headquarters, have been involved in the study and assessing consultation responses.

Colne-Foulridge Bypass

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he has a view on whether the proposed Colne-Foulridge bypass should be single or dual carriageway.

Mr. Key: This is a Lancashire county council proposal and its design standards are for them to decide.

M65

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what estimates he has made of the cost of extending the M65 to join the motorway network east of the Pennines.

Mr. Key: None. The transpennine study report included a broad estimate of £120 million to £140 million for an improved route from the M65 towards the A1 via Skipton.

Royal Train

Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what provisions are being made for the future running of the royal train.

Mr. MacGregor: From 1 April 1994, responsibility for the royal train will pass from BR to Railtrack. Railtrack will be responsible for the running of the royal train, including the provision and upkeep of coaches and locomotives.

Director of Passenger Rail Franchising

Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the estimated expenditure that will be incurred in running the new office of the Director of Passenger Rail Franchising established by the Railways Act 1993.

Mr. MacGregor: Parliamentary approval to the administrative and other expenditure of the director and his Office will be sought in a new estimate to establish a passenger rail services vote—class VI, vote 7. Pending that approval, urgent expenditure estimated at £350,000 will be met by repayable advances from the Contingencies Fund.

School Minibuses

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what estimates he has made of the number of school minibuses in (a) Great Britain and (b) Lancashire which are not fitted with seat belts.

Mr. Key: None. This information is not available.

West End-Bisley-Knaphill Bypass

Sir Cranley Onslow: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to publish the orders required for the fixing of a date for the public inquiry into the proposed route of the West End, Bisley and Knaphill bypass.

Mr. Key: A date for a public inquiry into this scheme cannot be fixed until the council has submitted revised orders occasioned by the deficiencies found in its original application.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Cattle (Tuberculosis)

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what are the latest figures for the numbers of cattle infected with tuberculosis shown by county, and the figures for six months, one year and 18 months ago; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Soames: Information on the number of cattle found to be infected with tuberculosis is not available in the form requested. Such information is collected quarterly from each animal health office and relates to herds in administrative areas which may cover an area greater than one county.

The numbers of confirmed cases in each animal health office administrative area were as follows:

In the light of the worsening disease situation in the south-west of England we are reviewing the current badger control strategy and hope to make an announcement shortly after careful consideration of the views expressed by the consultative panel on badgers and bovine tuberculosis at its meeting on 18 November.

Organic Farming

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations she has received on the level and scope of funding for organic farming in the United Kingdom; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Jack: Since the Minister made her announcement of the proposed organic aid scheme, she has received 244 letters on the level and scope of funding of organic farming. The vast majority of these were from producers who said that they already followed organic methods. The Minister also had a meeting on 15 November with representatives of the organic movement, and agreed that there would be further discussions with officials and another meeting with the Minister in the spring. This meeting would be to discuss the role of organic farming in relation to common agricultural policy reform.

Potato Marketing

Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if she has reached a decision concerning the future of the potato marketing scheme; and if she will make a statement.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: I have now completed my consultations with the various interests concerned, and am consulting colleagues on our response. I hope to make an announcement soon.

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many confirmed cases of BSE were reported between 1 January and 30 September 1993, from each county in England, Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland.

Mr. Soames: The numbers of suspected cases of BSE which were reported and placed under movement restrictions during the period 1 January to 30 September, and which have since been confirmed, are set out. These figures are correct up to 24 November but will change as further cases reported in that period are confirmed by laboratory examination.

Wine and Whisky

Mr. Steen: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the total value of wine imports into Britain in 1992 and the total value of exports of Scotch whisky in 1992.

Mr. Jack: Wine imports into the United Kingdom in 1992 were valued at £997·4 million. Scotch Whisky Association statistics show that in 1992, Scotch whisky exports—which include one Northern Irish distillery—were £1,958·9 million.

Acid Rain

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what requests she has received from her counterparts in the European Union regarding the effect of acid rainfall on continental Europe arising from discharges of sulphur dioxide from British plants.

Mr. Yeo: I have been asked to reply.

The Government have received one representation from the Environment Minister of the Netherlands requesting further reductions in the United Kingdom's total sulphur emissions, in the context of the negotiations for a second sulphur protocol currently being discussed within the United Nations Economic Commission for Europe.

SCOTLAND

Postal and Proxy Votes

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how much he will spend in the lead-up to the European and local elections next year on promoting the use of postal and proxy votes by sick, disabled and absent voters; what arrangements are in place for this exercise; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Provision has been made in the planning of expenditure for 1994-95 to cover the cost of a publicity campaign in Scotland to inform electors who cannot vote in person at the 1994 European parliamentary elections of how they may apply for postal or proxy votes. The precise figure has still to be determined. Arrangements for the campaign have not yet been finalised but it is likely to involve advertising in the press.

In accordance with past practice, the Scottish Office intends to issue a news release to the national press drawing the public's attention to the need to apply early for absent voting facilities at the 1994 regional elections.

Rolling Stock, Strathclyde

Mr. Gunnell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland by what date he expects financial guarantees to be in place which will allow the order for rolling stock placed by Strathclyde passenger transport authority with Hunslet TPL to proceed.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 25 November 1993]: Financial arrangements to allow the Strathclyde passenger transport executive rolling stock order to proceed are a matter for Strathclyde regional council, in conjunction with the parties to any financing agreement.

Traffic, Prestonpans

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the volume of local traffic making journeys of 25 miles or less on the B1348 and B1361 roads west of Prestonpans; and what proportion of the total traffic at those points is represented by such local traffic.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 25 November 1993]: This information is not held centrally.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Students

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the cost to each education and library board and to his Department of third level students from Northern Ireland studying in Great Britain.

Mr. Ancram: The estimated cost to the Department of Education and to each of the five education and library boards of third-level students from Northern Ireland studying in Great Britain for the financial year 1992-93 is as follows:

	£ million
Department of Education	2·297
Education and Library boards
Belfast	6·063
North Eastern	10·627
South Eastern	8·796
Southern	9·611
Western	8·168

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will publish a table indicating for each education and library board in Northern Ireland the total sums expended in each of the last three years and the current year on discretionary grants for students and the sums paid in discretionary grants to students from each EC country for each of those years; and in each such category; and if he will show the number of students and the total sums for each EC country.

Mr. Ancram: The table shows the total cost incurred by the five Northern Ireland education and library boards over the period 1990-91 to 1993-94.

Financial year	Belfast £ million	North-Eastern £ million	South-Eastern £ million	Southern £ million	Western £ million
1990-91	0·771	0·977	0·766	1·024	0·866
1991-92	0·954	1·131	0·934	1·264	1·047
1992-93	1·014	1·233	1·009	1·362	1·166
1993-94[1]	1·008	1·284	1·068	1·654	1·234

Information is not readily available on the sums paid in discretionary awards to students from the EC, by individual country and could be obtained only at a disproportionate cost.

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what has been the cost to (a) his Department, (b) Northern Ireland education and library boards and (c) other United Kingdom education authorities of those students from (i) Northern Ireland, (ii) Great Britain, (iii) the Republic of Ireland and (iv) other EC countries.

Mr. Ancram: The total costs of making provision for students is not available in the form requested.

The table shows the estimated costs of student awards held by all Northern Ireland students and the cost of tuition fees for students from EC countries at Northern Ireland institutions during the financial year 1992-93.

	Northern Ireland Students £ million	EC Students £ million
Department of Education	5·550	0·053
Education and Library Boards
Belfast	15·320	1·163
North Eastern	25·357	3·126
South Eastern	23·562	—
Southern	21·000	0·007
Western	21·873	0·237

Note: It is estimated that 95 per cent. of the cost of the support given to all EC students is for students from the Republic.

There is no cost to the Department of Education for Northern Ireland or any of the education and library boards arising from awards for students ordinarily resident in Great Britain who are attending institutions in Northern Ireland.

The cost to other United Kingdom education authorities of students from Great Britain, the Republic of Ireland and other EC countries could be obtained only at a disproportionate cost.

Maternity Units

Mr. Connarty: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what action is being taken to encourage health boards to offer midwife-only beds and midwife-only care to low risk pregnant women in all maternity units.

Mr. Ancram: The Department of Health and Social Services would wish to encourage health and social services boards to make full use of the skills and expertise which the midwifery profession can offer. It will be considering the implications for Northern Ireland on how best the role played by midwives in the care of low risk pregnant women can be enhanced. The Department has also recently established its own study group to consider the scope for developing maternity units led by midwives and/or general practitioners.

Loyalist Paramilitaries

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many persons killed since January 1988 by loyalist paramilitaries using weapons smuggled into Northern Ireland with the knowledge of the military intelligence officer Brian Nelson have been compensated by Her Majesty's Government.

Sir John Wheeler: It is not possible to determine that anyone has been killed under the circumstances described.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Welford Road Prison

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he next plans to visit HMP Welford Road, Leicester.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: My right hon. and learned Friend has no plans at present to visit HM prison, Welford Road, Leicester.

Prison Visits

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisons he has visited since his appointment.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: My right hon. and learned Friend visited four prisons and one young offender institution since becoming Home Secretary.

Postal and Proxy Votes

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much he will spend in the lead-up to the European and local elections next year on promoting the use of postal and proxy votes by sick, disabled and absent voters; what arrangements are in place for this exercise; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: We provide posters and leaflets to let elderly and disabled people know about their right to vote by post or by proxy. It is our practice before a general election to undertake a publicity campaign to tell people how to apply for an absent vote and to let them know the closing date. We do not undertake a similar campaign for local government or European parliamentary elections where the timetable is known well in advance.

Mr. Amanullah Khan

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many times to date since May 1990, Mr. Amanullah Khan, a Pakistani national, has been interviewed by immigration officials, police, or representatives of other United Kingdom agencies within United Kingdom jurisdiction; on which such occasions Mr. Khan was (a) detained and (b) allowed as a transit passenger to continue his journey outside United Kingdom jurisdiction; and what action United Kingdom authorities took to notify other countries of Mr. Khan's travel arrangements.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Mr. Khan arrived at Manchester international airport on 15 October 1993 while in transit from Islamabad to Amsterdam. He was spoken to by police officers in the normal course of their port duties. As a transit passenger, he had no contact with any immigration officials or with any other United Kingdom agency. He was not detained and was allowed to proceed with his journey. The Dutch and Belgian authorities were aware of Mr. Khan's arrival on their territory. This is the only occasion since May 1990 on which Mr. Khan is known to have been within United Kingdom jurisdiction.

Theft

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many crimes recorded by the Metropolitan police within each borough in the category of theft and handling stolen goods were recorded as (a) theft of a motor vehicle, (b) theft from a motor vehicle, (c) theft of a pedal cycle, (d) shoplifting, (e) handling stolen goods and (f) any other major categories, in the year ended June.

Mr. Maclean: The latest available information relates to the 12 months ending March 1993 and is given in the table:

Mr. Karamjit Singh Chahal

Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received in respect of Mr. Karamjit Singh Chahal; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Since the original decision to deport Mr. Chahal was made in August 1990, representations have been made by 51 hon. Members; four Members of the European Parliament; Amnesty International and several other organisations; and over 2,000 members of the public in this country and overseas. Most of these representations have supported Mr. Chahal's request to be granted asylum in the United Kingdom; some have called for his early removal to India.

The decision to deport Mr. Chahal was taken on the ground that his presence is not conducive to the public good for reasons of national security and for other reasons of a political nature, namely the international fight against terrorism. On 22 October 1993, the Court of Appeal held that my predecessor's decisions to refuse Mr. Chahal's application for asylum and to deport him were both reasonable and lawful. Subject to any further legal challenges to that decision arrangements for Mr. Chahal's deportation will proceed.

Dangerous Dogs

Mr. Hardy: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will seek power to enable him to issue an exemption certificate to owners of a dog or dogs who were unable to meet the requirements of the Dangerous Dogs Act 1991 for valid reasons which existed on or before 30 November 1991.

Mr. Charles Wardle: I refer to the reply that I gave the hon. Member on 25 November at column 171.

Market Testing

Sir Ivan Lawrence: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will announce the result of the market test of statistics collection in his Department.

Mr. Howard: The market test of statistics collection in my Department has now been concluded and it has been decided to award a service level agreement to the in-house team whose tender was judged to have represented the best value for money.

Wandsworth Prison

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when the proposed visitors' waiting centre will be built and opened at Wandsworth prison; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the director general of the Prison Service. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from D. Lewis to Mr. Tom Cox, undated:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about the new visitor's centre at Wandsworth prison.

Work on converting an existing quarter adjacent to the prison gate to a visitor's centre was completed in September, at a cost of £35,000. A Centre Co-ordinator has recently been appointed and the centre is expected to come into use early in the New Year.

DEFENCE

Tornado-Helicopter Accident

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the progress being made in the investigation of the accident involving a civil helicopter and an RAF Tornado on 23 June; what is the expected date of completion of the military accident investigation; and what is the expected date of publication of the military aircraft accident summary.

Mr. Hanley: The board of inquiry has completed its investigation and the findings are now being considered. This process should be completed by January 1994. Publication of the military aircraft accident summary will follow shortly thereafter.

Orders

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether he intends to continue placing orders with (a) Fratelli Borletti, (b) Gebruder Junghans and (c) AS Raufoss; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Aitken: We will not be placing new contracts with these three firms until all the facts relating to the recent conviction of Gordon Foxley have been fully investigated.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions he has had with the directors of (a) Fratelli Borletti, (b) Gebruder Junghans and (c) AS Raufoss; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Aitken: My right hon. and learned Friend has had no such discussions.

Mr. Gordon Foxley

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what were the duties and responsibilities of Mr. Gordon Foxley when he was employed by the Ministry of Defence; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Aitken: I will write to the hon. Gentleman.

HEALTH

Complaints Procedures

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many times the Wilson Review Committee on NHS Complaints Procedures has met; and how many further meetings are planned prior to publication of the committee's report.

Dr. Mawhinney: We understand that the complaints review committee has met four times and that Professor Wilson and his colleagues plan further meetings before they submit their report to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when she expects to publish the report of the Review Committee on NHS Complaints Procedures; and what will be the status of that report.

Dr. Mawhinney: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has asked Professor Wilson and his independent review committee to make recommendations at the turn of the year. The recommendations and publication will be considered at that time.

Cigarettes

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what plans she has to discuss with tobacco companies the dangers arising from continued production of fire-prone cigarettes;

(2) what consultations she has had with medical organisations on fire injuries from fire prone cigarettes and the need to introduce fire safe cigarettes.

Mr. Sackville: None.

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make it her policy to compile data on the direct financial costs of property damage resulting from fires caused by cigarettes.

Mr. Sackville: We have no plans to do so.

Consultants

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the numbers and locations of women consultants (a) currently in practice in the United Kingdom and (b) in each hospital.

Mr. Sackville: The available information will be placed in the Library. Information relating to Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland are matters for my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Wales and for Scotland and my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

Resources Distribution

Mr. Robert Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what instructions have been issued to regional health authorities to ensure fair distribution of resources within the regions based on weighted capitation.

Mr. Sackville: The planning guidance for 1992-93 gave regional health authorities discretion to use their judgment about the precise distribution of funds which suits their districts' needs, based on their analysis of local information. The guidance for 1993-94 was published in FDL(92)113 which states

"Regions will therefore be asked to report on their planned deployment of the 1993-94 allocation and in particular to demonstrate clear progress towards equalisation. The pace of such progress and whether it should be achieved by reducing resources allocated to districts above their capitation share is a matter for invidual regions to judge in the light of local circumstances."

Copies of the guidance are available in the Library.

Steroids

Mr. Hargreaves: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make a statement concerning the result of investigations carried out by the Medicines Control Agency into illegal advertising of anabolic steroids.

Mr. Sackville: The Medicines Control Agency has recently completed inquiries into the extent to which illegal advertising of anabolic steroids takes place. The results of the inquiries will be made available shortly.

GP Services

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the extent of the over or under-spending, on general practitioner fund holder budgets in each national health service region and family health services authority area; and what were the sums returned and/or retained by general practitioner fund holders in each case.

Dr. Mawhinney: Information on 1992-93 outturn will not be available centrally before the end of November.

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what systematic accounting systems and records of activity she has laid down for general practitioner fund-holding practices.

Dr. Mawhinney: The general practitioner fund holders' manual of accounts contains guidance on accountancy matters relating to, and the financial management of, the general practice fund. In addition, GP fund holders must have computer software to assist in managing a fund. The GP fund-holding software specification sets down the software requirements for this. Copies of both these documents are available in the Library.

Elective Surgery

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much money in the most recent period for which data are available was spent by fund-holding general practitioner practices on purchasing elective surgery for their patients from (a) national health service trusts and directly managed hospitals and (b) private practitioners.

Dr. Mawhinney: This information is not available centrally.

Organograms

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will construct and place in the Library organograms of the national health service to district health authority level as it existed in April 1983; and how it will be consequent on her proposals in April 1994.

Dr. Mawhinney: This information will be placed in the Library.

Cot Deaths

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many cot deaths there have been in the United Kingdom (a) per region and (b) per hospital; and what percentage they have been of live births over the past 10 years.

Mr. Sackville: The available information will be placed in the Library. Information on cot deaths by hospital of occurrence for the years 1983-1992 could be provided only at disproportionate cost. The Office of Population, Censuses and Surveys is examining plans to include infant mortality statistics by district health authority of occurrence in its future routine publications.

Information relating to Scotland and Northern Ireland are matters for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland and my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

Research Units

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list for each of the 13 research units currently subject to peer review (a) the name of the unit director or, if the post is currently vacant, the name of the previous director and date of resignation, (b) the date of the site visit, (c) the date on which the report of the review was made public and (d) the timetable for making decisions about the future of each unit; and if she will place a copy in the Libary of each review report which has been completed.

Dr. Mawhinney: The names of unit directors and the dates of site visits are shown in the table. In accordance with the Department's preferred practices for the commissioning and management of all research and development, expert peer review of long-term research contracts is well established and reports are discussed fully with unit directors. Once finalised, these reports take the form of advice to the department's director of research and development and are not published. With the agreement of unit directors, we are arranging to place in the Library copies of the reports they have prepared for site visits, together with the conclusions of the site visit team. I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave on 29 June 1993 at column 421, which stated that decisions about the future of units will be announced once the series of site visits has been completed and following due discussion and full consideration. Earlier decisions may be required, depending on the particular circumstances of the unit and we are pleased to announce that the director of research and development has now invited Oxford university to provide proposals on terms and conditions so that the post of director of the national perinatal epidemiology unit can be filled.

Research Unit	Director	Site visit date (most recent or planned)
Childhood Cancer Research Group	Dr. G. J. Draper	October 1991
Medical Care Research Unit	Professor B. T. Williams	October 1992
National Perinatal Epidemiology Unit	Vacancy	June 1993
Previous director, Dr. I Chalmers, resigned September 1992. Interim management arrangements were agreed with the unit's steering committee and involve a rotating post of acting director.
Social Medicine and Health Services Research Unit	Professor W. W. Holland	July 1993
Cancer for Primary Care Research	Dr. D. Wilkin	July 1993
Cancer Screening Evaluation Unit	Professor J. Chamberlain	October 1993
National Institute for Social Work	Dr. J. Pahl	October 1993
Clinical Operational Research Unit	Professor R. R. P. Jackson	November 1993
Social Policy Research Unit	Professor S. Baldwin	Planned for January 1994
Site visit dates for the following units are in planning for early 1994.
Personal Social Services Research Unit	Professor B. Davies
Centre for Health Economics	Professor A. K. Maynard
Dartington Social Research Unit	Professor S. Millham
Thomas Coram Research Unit	Professor H. McGurk

HIV

Sir Thomas Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is her policy towards the provision of free counselling for patients diagnosed as HIV positive.

Mr. Sackville: Since 1985 it has been the Department of Health's policy that advice, counselling and HIV testing should be available for any person who might have been at risk of HIV infection or wishes to have a test. Counselling provided free through the national health service includes advice for those diagnosed HIV positive, on management of HIV-related disease and on how to avoid transmission of HIV infection.

Cancer

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of patients diagnosed as having cancer see a specialist in cancer.

Mr. Sackville: This information is not available centrally.

Overseas Visits

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many visits abroad she has made during 1993; and what was (a) the cost to public funds of each visit and (b) the purpose of each visit.

Dr. Mawhinney: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave to the hon. Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) on 3 November at columns 222-24.

Patient Deaths

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what evidence she has on how many patients die en route to other hospitals because their local hospital does not have sufficient intensive or coronary care unit beds.

Mr. Sackville: Information on the diversion of intensive or coronary care cases is not available centrally. We are aware of the three tragic deaths of Manchester patients and understand that North Western regional health authority is holding discussions with district health authorities to examine whether the level of intensive care provision in Manchester is set at an appropriate level.

The Government are currently funding a study by the Royal College of Anaesthetists into access to intensive care nationally.

Health Expenditure

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the expenditure on health expressed as a percentage of gross domestic product in each EC country.

Dr. Mawhinney: Total health service expenditure in the United Kingdom as a percentage of gross domestic product was 6·1 per cent. in 1992-93 which compares with 4·7 per cent. in 1978-79. Figures for other European Community countries are not available on a comparable basis.

Hospital Waiting Lists

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of NHS patients waiting for admission had waited more than six months at March, June, September and December 1992 and March, June and September 1993.

Dr. Mawhinney: Information on the number of patients waiting for admission to hospital is given in "Hospital Waiting List Statistics: England", which is published twice yearly for March and September. Copies are available in the Library. The most recent information is for March 1993, which shows that 27·4 per cent. of patients had waited more than six months for treatment. This compares with 30·5 per cent. in September 1992 and 29·5 per cent. in March 1992.

Hospital Closures

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list the name of each hospital closed in each of the last 10 years.

Mr. Sackville: This information is not available centrally.

Mr. Jonathan Zito

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the inquiry by South and North East Thames regional health authorities into the death of Jonathan Zito is likely to be completed; and if its report will be published.

Mr. Bowis: I understand the chairmen of the North East and South East Thames regional health authorities expect to receive the report of the inquiry chaired by Jean Ritchie QC in February. The report will be published.

NHS Trusts

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether the Scarborough and North East Yorkshire Healthcare national health service trust is presently making payments to staff to cover (a) work in unsocial hours and (b) expenses incurred in attending training courses.

Dr. Mawhinney: This information is not available centrally. The hon. Member may wish to contact Mr. Tom Pindar, chairman of the trust, for details.

Benzodiazepines

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many prescriptions were issued for each benzodiazepine by community pharmacists in England in 1992.

Dr. Mawhinney: The information is shown in the table. From 1992, the data include prescriptions dispensed by dispensing doctors, and prescriptions submitted by doctors for items administered personally as well as those dispensed by community pharmacists and appliance contractors. When 1991 data are recalculated on the same basis, they show an encouraging fall of about 15 per cent. in the level of benzodiazepine dispensing between 1991 and 1992.

Benzodiazepine prescription items

England 1992

Drug group	Number of prescription items (thousands)
Temazepam	6,914
Diazepam	3,225
Nitrazepam	3,074
Lorazepam	1,018
Chlordiazepoxide	503
Oxazepam	352
Loprazolam	239
Lormetazepam	215
Clonazepam	144
Clobazam	67
Total	15,751

Note:

The data cover all prescription items dispensed by community pharmacists appliance contractors, dispensing doctors and personal administration.

Drug Companies (Payments to Doctors)

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidelines exist on payments by drug companies to doctors to promote their drugs; and what plans there are to tighten these guidelines.

Mr. Sackville: Guidelines on the promotion of medicines are contained in the code of practice for the pharmaceutical industry administered by the Prescription Medicines Code of Practice Authority, a copy of which is available in the Library. We are proposing to introduce legislation under the Medicines Act 1968 next month to control hospitality offered by drug companies.

WALES

Civil Servants

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list for each civil service grade in his Department (a) the total number of persons employed and (b) the total number of women employed.

Mr. Redwood: The total number of persons employed by my Department are:

Grade	Total number of staff within the grade	Total number of female staff within the grade
G1 and equivalents	1	0
G2 and equivalents	2	0
G3 and equivalents	12	1
G4 and equivalents	5	1

Administration fast streamers	13	8
HEO and equivalents	308	109
EO and equivalents	488	285
AO and equivalents	643	465
AA and equivalents	609	325
Total number of staff		2,495
Total number of female staff		1,281

Acid Rain

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on initiatives taken to protect agricultural land and inland waterways and lakes from acid rain in Wales.

Mr. Redwood: A wide range of measures are being taken throughout the United Kingdom to reduce the emissions which cause acid rain. These include significant action to reduce emissions from the power industry, the fitting of catalytic converters to all new cars and the implementation of the pollution control systems under the Environmental Protection Act 1990.

In addition, the Welsh Office in conjunction with the National Rivers Authority and the Countryside Council for Wales is promoting research and monitoring on the environmental impact of acid deposition in Wales. Action is also in hand to evaluate the effectiveness of liming on agricultural land and waterways in Wales affected by acid deposition.

Environmental Protection

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the findings of his Department's joint report with the Department of the Environment reviewing the performance at 25 local authorities in meeting the targets set in part I of the Environmental Protection Act 1990; when the report was forwarded to (a) the Local Authority Enforcement Liaison Committee and (b) Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution; and to which other bodies it has been distributed.

Mr. Redwood: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Environment and Countryside to the hon. Member for City of Chester (Mr. Brandreth) on 3 November, Official Report, column 207. Of the 25 local authorities included in the review, three are in Wales.

The local authority associations and Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution are represented on the inspectorate of pollution/Local Authority Enforcement Liaison Committee. That committee approved the Department of the Environment/Welsh Office review report on 29 September. Copies of the report have since been provided to all relevant local authorities in England and Wales and to certain trade associations.

Council Houses

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many council houses were built in 1992; and how many are under construction currently.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Information on the number built in 1992 has been published in table 2.3 of "Welsh Housing Statistics No. 13 1993", a copy of which is in the Library of the House. Leaving aside the substantial social housing programme funded by Housing for Wales, there were 240 local authority dwellings under construction on 31 August 1993.

Environment Conference

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what contribution his Department made in terms of resources or papers delivered to the conference on research and education in environmental management held in Swansea on 11 November.

Mr. Redwood: The conference was organised by the Welsh Office at a cost of some £32,700. The Welsh Office contributed to a paper on waste management.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Burundi

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the impact of the recent upheavals in Burundi on the stability of the wider east and central Africa region.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The recent tragic events in Burundi have resulted in the movement of over 700,000 refugees into neighbouring countries with particularly severe consequences for Zaire, Tanzania and Rwanda.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the latest multilateral and regional efforts to restore peace and stability to Burundi.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The Statement by the President of the United Nations Security Council issued on 16 November encouraged the Secretary-General to send his Special Representative on Burundi, Mr. Ould Abdallah, to Bujumbura with a United Nations team, to assist the Organisation for African Unity (OAU) in its efforts to restore democratic institutions, rebuild confidence and stabilise the situation. The Secretary-General has been asked urgently to report on this mission and on his recommendations for the creation of a voluntary fund to assist in the despatch of an OAU mission.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action he has taken to encourage the sending of a UN representative to Burundi; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I refer the hon. Gentleman to my written reply to his question of 25 November. The United Kingdom fully supports this United Nations initiative.

Non-governmental Organisations

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list each United Kingdom non-governmental organisation that has either category I, category II or roster status with the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The information requested is not available in the format requested.

The United Nations does not list non-governmental organisations by country of origin. Non-governmental organisations with consultative or roster status are all international in character. I am making available to the Library of the House the current list of NGOs with category I, category II and roster status with the Economic and Social Council of the United Nations.

Vessel Seizures, Danube

Sir Russell Johnston: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has on the seizure of vessels by Serbian pirates, where the Danube passes through the Krajin; what commitment has been made by the Western European Union to controlled passage through the Danube; and what action is proposed.

Mr. Heathcote-Amory: We have no such information, though we are aware a recent blocking of the Danube in the vicinity of Belgrade by two unofficial Serbian organisations for which the Serbian Government disclaim responsibility. We do not accept that there is nothing the Serbian Government can do to curtail these activities.

The President of the United Nations Security Council made a statement on 13 October 1993 condemning this action and reminding the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia (FRY) authorities of their international obligations to ensure free movement of international traffic on the Danube.

The Western European Union sanctions enforcement operation on the Danube is directed at preventing the passage of unauthorised materials to the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia. It is not tasked with enforcing the passage of shipping throughout the length of the Danube.

Miltary Equipment Sales

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make it his policy to make it a condition of granting an export licence for any application for arms or military equipment that the recipient country provide complete details of all its military imports and exports to the United Nations register of arms transfers.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: No. The United Nations register of conventional arms is a voluntary confidence-building measure with which we encourage all United Nations member states to comply. We do not consider that it constitutes an adequate basis on which to assess export licence applications for military goods.

European Committee of the Regions

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which body will pay the travelling expenses of the United Kingdom members of the European Committee of the Regions; and what will be the rights of (a) members and (b) alternate members.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The travelling expenses of members of the EC Committee of the Regions will be paid from funds allocated to the Committee in the EC budget. The Committee of the Regions is an advisory body of the Communities. Under article 11 of the protocol on the privileges and immunities of the European Communities, members and alternate members will therefore, in the performance of their duties and during their travel to and from the place of meeting, enjoy the customary privileges, immunities and facilities.

Overseas Visits

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many visits abroad he has made during 1993; and what was (a) the cost to public funds of each visit and (b) the purpose of each visit.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs has made 50 overseas visits involving 68 countries during 1993. The cost and purpose of each visit was as follows:

Official visits overseas by the Secretary of State

Thermal Oxide Reprocessing Plant

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Seceretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions have taken place since June with the Secretary of State for the Environment and the Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food respectively, in regard to representations received from abroad on the international and proliferation implications of extending reprocessing at Sellafield with THORP.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I discuss a range of issues with my right hon. Friends the Secretary of State for the Environment and the Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. These naturally include. THORP from time to time. Any representations from overseas on THORP have been sent direct to the Ministers conducting the public consultations on the Sellafield authorisations.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

EC Industry Council

Ms Quin: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the outcome of the EC Industry Council of 18 November.

Mr. Sainsbury: The Council was dominated by lengthy discussion of six requests for derogations from the steel state aids code for Sidenor and CSI, Spain: Freital and Ekostahl, Germany: Ilva, Italy; and Siderurgia Nacional, Portugal. At its September meeting, the Council confirmed the obligation to apply the state aids code, and made particular reference to eliminating operating cost subsidies. Certain of the cases before the November Council did not meet these criteria. Agreement was not reached, and the Council is likely to meet on 17 December to consider the cases further.

There was insufficient time to discuss the other items on the agenda—EC industry policy; the Commission's 22nd competition policy report and the Maritime Industries Forum.

Depleted Uranium

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade to which countries in the middle east his Department has authorised the licensing of depleted uranium exports since 1979.

Mr. Needham: The answer to this question could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Anthrax Vaccine

Mr. Cousins: To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether anthrax vaccine exports require export licences; and how many such licences were issued during the years 1987 onward.

Mr. Needham: Anthrax vaccine was made specifically licensable in the Export of Goods (Control) Order 1992, which came into force on 31 December 1992. Prior to that it was controlled under a general military heading—ML7—relating to defence against biological agents. For the period in question, the total number of licences issued specifically for anthrax vaccine could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Frogs Legs

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make it his policy to ban the import of frogs' legs.

Mr. Needham: No.

Redundant Steelworkers

Mr. Hardy: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how may redundant steelworkers have retrained for alternative occupations through ISERBS—iron and steel employees readaptation benefits scheme—support during the last 10 years.

Mr. Sainsbury: Detailed figures for all of the last 10 years can be obtained only at disproportionate cost. However, since 1 January 1989, 8,390 redundant steel workers have been eligible for ISERBS benefits, of which 4,183 have retrained.

Mr. Hardy: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assessment he has made of the relative position of steelworkers entering redundancy with and without the benefit of ISERBS—iron and steel employees readaptation benefits scheme—support; and what assessment he has made of the employment consequences of termination of this scheme.

Mr. Sainsbury: A full evaluation was conducted in 1992. A copy of the report was placed in the House of Commons Library on 29 October 1993.

Mr. Hardy: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what total sums have been paid to redundant steelworkers in the United Kingdom through the iron and steel employees readaptation benefits scheme—arrangements in each of the last 10 years; and what proportion of these sums have been provided by the European Commission.

Mr. Sainsbury: The figures requested, at 1992-93 prices, are as follows:

Financial Year	Total ISERBS payments £m	Commission contribution £m
1983-84	80·3	54·7
1984-85	50·9	27·1
1985-86	33·5	20·6
1986-87	28·9	12·7
1987-88	24·6	8·2
1988-89	7·4	8·0
1989-90	6·8	5·6
1990-91	18·9	0·6
1991-92	30·0	3·6
1992-93	50·1	5·4

There is a time lag between ISERBS payments being made and receipt of the contribution from the European Commission.

Mr. Hardy: To ask the President of the Board of Trade on what date he proposes to end the ISERBS arrangements to assist redundant steelworkers to retrain or to relocate and to reduce the unemployment effect of contraction in that industry.

Mr. Sainsbury: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Colchester, North (Mr. Jenkin) on 29 October 1993, Official Report, column 804.

Steel Exports

Mr. Ward: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what support he is giving to United Kingdom steel suppliers to increase their exports to the EC.

Mr. Sainsbury [holding answer 25 November 1993]: My Department, jointly with the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, provides a wide range of high-quality advice and support to exporters which is available to all sectors of United Kingdom industry.

Energy Advisory Panel

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will report on the first meeting of the energy advisory panel giving (a) details of its planned agenda and (b) how his Department plans to respond to any recommendations.

Mr. Eggar [holding answer 25 November 1993]: The panel met for the first time on 23 November. It was a constructive meeting, in which members considered a programme of work towards the production of the first annual energy report. As is generally the case with such bodies, the advice of the panel and details of its meeting and discussion are confidential.

General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade

Mr. Wareing: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assessment he has made of the likely success of the current round of GATT negotiations; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Needham [holding answer 25 November 1993]: Conclusion of the Uruguay round by the agreed deadline of 15 December is currently the Government's top trade priority. The vote last week by the United States Congress for the north America free trade agreement was a vote for free trade. This and recent progress in Geneva makes successful completion of the round more likely than ever.

ENVIRONMENT

New Homes

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish a table showing the total number of new homes completed by (a) local authorities, (b) housing associations and (c) private developers in each of the London boroughs in each year since 1979; and what is his estimate for completions in 1993.

Sir George Young: Estimates of housebuilding completions by sector for each local authority area in Greater London are shown in the publications "Local Housing Statistics" and also "Housebuilding in England by Local Authority Areas, 1980-1989" for some earlier years.

Figures for 1979 are in table 4(b) of the November 1981 edition—issue No. 59—of "Local Housing Statistics". Figures for 1980 to 1984 are in "Housebuilding in England by Local Authority Areas", tables 1.1 to 1.5. Figures for 1985 to 1990 are in tables 1(a) to 1(f) of the October 1992 edition—issue No. 103—of "Local Housing Statistics". Figures for 1991 and 1992 are in table 1 of issue No. 105 of "Local Housing Statistics". Copies of these publications are in the Library.

The Department does not prepare forecasts of housebuilding activity.

Air Quality

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the proposals set out in his joint consultation paper on the future of air quality monitoring networks in the United Kingdom; and what is the closing date for submissions.

Mr. Yeo: My Department issued the paper "The Future of Air Quality Monitoring Networks in the United Kingdom" for consultation on 2 November 1993. This fulfils the Government's commitment made in the second anniversary report of the 1990 White Paper "This Common Inheritance" to examine the possibilities of better integration of national and local ambient air quality monitoring and greater uniformity of practice. The closing date for submissions is 10 December 1993.

The paper sets out proposals on ways in which local and national monitoring can be brought together to produce one coherent quality-assured network and seeks views on ways this can best be achieved. The proposals include the development of a central and accessible pool of national and local data of broadly common format and standards, which would be subject to effective quality control and be freely available to the public.

Temporary Accommodation

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his latest estimate of the average annual cost of (a) bed-and-breakfast accommodation and (b) other temporary accommodation, including privately leased properties, provided by local authorities for homeless households in (i) the Greater London area and (ii) England.

Sir George Young: My Department has no estimates of the average annual costs to local authorities of housing homeless households in temporary accommodation.

Data on the annual costs and use of bed-and-breakfast accommodation from which average annual costs can be derived, are, however, published by the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy (CIPFA) in "Homelessness Statistics 1991-92 Actuals", a copy of which is in the Library.

The CIPFA publication contains insufficient information to derive average annual costs for other types of temporary accommodation.

Industry (Costs)

Mrs. Lait: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what evidence he has that the principle of best available techniques not entailing excessive cost is not causing excessive costs to British industry where it is applicable.

Mr. Yeo: The BATNEEC principle—best available techniques not entailing excessive cost—is designed to ensure that the environment is adequately protected from potential pollution, while not placing an unacceptable burden on industry. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and the chief inspector of Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution—HMIP—issue guidance respectively on BATNEEC for different sectors coming under local authority air pollution control—LAAPC—and integrated pollution control—IPC—and consult widely with industry and other interested parties in doing so. Furthermore, an operator is able to appeal against the conditions of an IPC or LAAPC authorisation if he feels BATNEEC has not been properly applied.

Although it is not possible at this stage in the progressive implementation of part I of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 to determine the final costs to industry of meeting the requirements, I have no reason to believe that this will be disproportionate. I attach considerable importance to ensuring that unnecessary burdens are not imposed on industry and both IPC and LAAPC have been reviewed as part of the Government's deregulation initiative.

On 10 June, I held a seminar with representatives from industry at which we discussed the implementation of IPC and my officials have this month held a similar meeting on LAAPC.

City Challenge

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will give the names of the chief executives of city challenge schemes, their current salaries and their previous occupations.

Mr. Baldry: The chief executives of the 31 city challenge partnerships are:

Chief executives
Mr. K. Beaumont	Leicester
Mr. J. Blackie	Newcastle
Mrs. J. Bradbury	Blackburn
Mr. A. Burton	Kensington and Chelsea
Mr. P. Coffey	Wirral
Mr. G. Davis	Harlesden
Mr. D. Dawson	Derby
Mr. C. Dutton	Sandwell
Mr. G. Fitzhenry	Bolton
Mr. J. Flamson	Liverpool
Dr. T. Flanagan	Batley
Mr. C. Freegard	Nottingham
Mr. J. Gillis	Dearne Valley
Ms. S. Healy	Walsall
Mr. S. Jacobs	Stratford
Mr. C. Khamis	Wolverhampton
Ms. L. Klein	Bethnal Green
Mr. R. Lawrence	North Tyneside
Ms B Marjoram	Brixton
Mr. M. McCloskey	Birmingham
Mr. J. Montgomery	Deptford
Mr. P. Moss	Barnsley
Mr. C. Oldershaw	Stockton
Mr. M. Orrick	Sunderland
Mr. R. Pointing	Wigan
Mr. R. Simmons	Hackney
Mr. L. Southerton	Middlesbrough
Mrs. C. Teesdale	Hartlepool
Mr. J. Watson	Bradford
Mrs. L. Whitehouse	Hulme
Mr. D. Yeates	Sefton

Of these, about two thirds came from local government or other public sector employment, and about a third from the private sector. The salary of the chief executive is a matter for each individual partnership.

Committee of the Regions

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many representatives he has received following his appointments to the Committee of the Regions.

Mr. Baldry: Seven.

Appointments

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment to how many and which organisations he is able to make appointments; and what are the salary levels of these appointments.

Mr. Gummer: Information about the number, and levels of remuneration, of people appointed to public bodies for which I am responsible is given in the annual HMSO publication "Public Bodies". A copy of the current issue is held at the House of Commons Library and "Public Bodies 1993" will be published shortly. Additionally, and excluding departmental committees, of which no central record is maintained, I make appointments to the following bodies:

Executive Agencies

Agency	Appointment	Annual Salary
Ordnance Survey	Director General	see note[1]
	Management Board non-executives[3]	£5,262
Planning Inspectorate	Chief Planning Inspector	see note[1]
	Members of Advisory Board[4]	unpaid
Building Research Establishment	Chief Executive	see note[1]
QE II Conference Centre	Chief Executive	see note[2]
Buying Agency	Chief Executive	see note[2]
Security Facilities Executive	Chief Executive	see note[2]

Other Bodies

Name of Body	Appointment	Annual Salary
Office of Water Resources (OFWAT)	Director General	see note[3]
7 National Park Authorities (England)	Third of Members	unpaid
Broads Authority	9 of the 35 Members	unpaid
Sutton Housing Trust	4 of the 7 Trustees	£2,120

Chemical Degradation

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he received the report commissioned by his Department from WRC Consultants on degradation of chemicals; how many copies of the report have been printed; to whom it has been circulated; and what response he has made to its recommendations.

Mr. Yeo: The report was received in the Department of the Environment on 1 November 1993. In all, 18 copies of the report have been printed, 13 of which have been placed in the Libraries of the House. A copy is also available in the Department's library for public reference. The remaining copies were circulated to staff within the Department who will use the results in the assessment of chemicals. Further copies can be made available on request.

Canada Geese

Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the members of the Canada geese working group; and what organisations or sector each of them represents.

Mr. Yeo: The list is as follows:

R. J. Groombridge—Chairman, Department of the Environment.
C. Booty—Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals.
Dr. J. Kirby—Wildfowl and Wetlands Trust.
G. Macniven—London Borough of Wandsworth.
Miss S. Davies—Joint Nature Conservation Committee.
P. Clement—English Nature.
Mrs. J. Adams—Central Royal Parks.
Dr. C. Feare—Central Science Laboratory.
Dr. N. Reynolds—British Association for Shooting and Conservation.
Dr. S. Smith—National Farmers Union.
T. Harman—British Pest Control Association.
Dr. D. Goode—London Ecology Unit and the Association of Metropolitan Authorities.
J. Stephens—Department of the Environment.

The Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals and the Wildfowl and Wetlands Trust also cover the interests of the Royal Society for the Protection of Birds (RSPB).

Sustainable Development

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how Her Majesty's Government intend to promote sustainable development as outlined in the Queen's Speech.

Mr. Yeo: We are preparing a strategy for sustainable development and intend to publish it shortly. We shall lay the document before the House in the normal way.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what initiatives he has taken to encourage public response to his consultation paper on sustainable development.

Mr. Yeo: My Department published a consultation paper on sustainable development in July this year. They and other Government Departments then held a series of round table discussions with interested people and organisations, and I and my colleagues took every appropriate opportunity to raise the issues in speeches and discussions. We received over 500 responses.

Greenhouse Gases

Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the currently envisaged timescale for the stabilisation of emissions of greenhouse gases; and what he sees as the likely time scale for the phasing out of substances damaging the ozone layer.

Mr. Yeo: Under the United Nations framework convention on climate change, the United Kingdom Government are committed to taking measures aimed at returning emissions of greenhouse gases to 1990 levels by the year 2000. A detailed programme of measures designed to achieve this target for each of the main greenhouse gases will be published soon.

Current agreed phaseout dates for ozone depleting substances are as follows:

Substance	Phaseout date
CFCs	1 January 1995
Carbon Tetrachloride	1 January 1995
Halons	1 January 1994
111 Trichloroethane	1 January 1996

Hydrochlorofluorocarbons are likely to be phased out by 2015 subject to EC agreement.

There is also to be a cap on methyl bromide use in 1996.

Council Tax

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish a table showing the total number of proposals to amend council tax valuations received to date by valuation offices in England; and how many of these have been dealt with to date, including the numbers involving an amendment to the original banding and the date by which all outstanding proposals are expected to have been dealt with in each of the London boroughs.

Mr. Baldry: I refer the hon. Member to the answer the Minister for Local Government and Planning gave to the right hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) on Thursday 25 November. Of the proposals settled to date, around 80,000 have resulted in an amendment to the original banding.

As my hon. Friend announced on 29 June, Official Report column 416, we expect some 560,000 council tax appeals to have been settled in England before the end of 1994, with the remaining cases being decided as rapidly as possible in 1995. Progress to date has been consistent with this expectation. I cannot, however forecast a precise end-date, either for England as a whole or for individual local authority areas.

Sheltered Housing

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps are being taken to correct the discrepancy in the minimum age requirements of men and women for eligibility for allocation of sheltered accommodation for elderly persons; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: There is no statutory requirement that sheltered housing can be made available only to persons over a certain age. Decisions on the allocation of such accommodation are the responsibility of the landlord concerned.

Architects

Sir David Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has for the deregulation of the registration of architects.

Sir George Young: None at present. The Government have given further consideration to the future of the Architects (Registration) Acts. They still believe that the best long-term solution for architects would be for the chartered institutions and others to develop and improve the system of self-regulation of the profession. This would serve to educate the consumer in what the architect has to offer, so that the need for statutory protection of title would diminish.

The Government understand the strength of feeling against the removal of statutory protection of title shown by consumer organisations, colleagues and many within the profession. The Government have therefore decided, on balance, not to proceed with the repeal of the Architects (Registration) Acts, but to examine, in consultation with the profession and other bodies, measures which could be taken to simplify the present arrangements.

In the meantime, the Government look to the Royal Institute of British Architects and the other professional bodies to address the standing of the profession including the relevant recommendations of the Warne report.

"London, Making the Best Better"

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the initial print number of his coloured consultative document on London and its approximate cost; what plans he has for further printing; and what are the current and future means of its distribution or availability to (a) official bodies and (b) the public.

Mr. Gummer: Two hundred and fifty thousand copies of the document were printed, each of which contains a questionnaire. Fifty thousand separate questionnaires were also printed. The cost of producing the document and questionnaire, including distribution and publicity, will amount to an estimated £168,000. Decisions on printing extra copies will depend on the demand for the document. Copies were distributed initially through the Evening Standard network and sent to a wide range of London organisations. Copies are available by writing to the Department of the Environment, PO Box 151, London E15 2HF.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what consideration was given by his Department to ensure that the distribution and circulation of the questionnaire accompanying the document "London, Making the Best Better" would provide a statistically representative sample of the views of all sections of the London population; if he intends to weight the responses to the questionnaire in any way to provide a statistically representative sample of the London population; and whether he sought outside professional advice as to whether the questions in the questionnaire were likely to provide data which could be relied upon for the purposes of making decisions.

Mr. Gummer: Two hundred thousand copies of the document were distributed from Evening Standard outlets across London. The aim was to reach as many people as possible who have opinions and ideas and to give them a chance to put their point of view to me. In addition, copies are being sent to a wide range of organisations and to anyone who requests them. The distribution method was not intended to provide a statistically representative sample. We will, of course, analyse the responses in terms of age and geographical distribution and these results will be published.

The survey was piloted by MORI and was subsequently modified to make some of the questions clearer. MORI commented that reactions to the pilot survey were very positive: many were pleased to have been invited to take part and were keen to express their views.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will set out the precise method and criteria by which he intends to collate and publish responses to the questionnaire accompanying the document "London, Making the Best Better".

Mr. Gummer: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him earlier today. I will publish a digest of the responses in due course.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish a table giving separate expenditure breakdowns for (a) the questionnaire accompanying the document "London, Making the Best Better" and (b) the document, "London, Making the Best Better", without the questionnaire, broken down into (i) the total number produced, (ii) the total cost of typesetting, (iii) the total cost of layout and printing, (iv) the total cost of paper and assorted materials and (v) the total cost of distribution.

Mr. Gummer: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him earlier today. Design and typesetting costs were £31,500 for the document, and £500 for the questionnaire. Two hundred and fifty thousand copies of the document and questionnaire were printed and are being distributed together, so it is not possible to separate the costs of each. The cost of printing the 50,000 separate questionnaires was £1,500.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what consideration was given to including London zoo in the list of London attractions for which public approval was sought in the questionnaire accompanying "London, Making the Best Better."

Mr. Gummer: It was not possible to include every London attraction by name in the questionnaire but space is provided for people to name aspects of London which they appreciate. London zoo is mentioned on page 42 of the document.

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what has been the cost of his consultation paper "London: Making the Best Better" in (i) staff time involved in research and preparation of text, (ii) photography and artwork, (iii) printing, (iv) distribution, (v) publicity and (vi) all other expenses.

Mr. Gummer: There was no dedicated team set up solely to prepare the document. My Department's London policy unit co-ordinated the preparation of the document alongside its other duties; the estimated salary and superannuation costs of their time spent on the document amounts to about £18,000. Staff in other parts of my Department and in nine other Departments contributed to the draft. It would be impossible to quantify the total staff time involved.

I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Holborn and St. Pancras (Mr. Dobson) today for details of other costs incurred in producing the document.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what is the final date by which responses to the questionnaire accompanying the document, "London, Making the Best Better" have to be received in order to be considered valid by his Department;

(2) by what date he will publish the full results of the questionnaire accompanying the document "London, Making the Best Better;"

(3) by what date he will publish his response to the results of the questionnaire accompanying the document, "London, Making the Best Better."

Mr. Gummer [holding answer 25 November 1993]: I want to give people plenty of time to respond to the questionnaire or to write to me, so I have not at this stage set a final date for responses; therefore, I cannot yet give a date for the timing of publication of the results. Clearly no one could reasonably set such dates without knowing in advance the number of responses.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list each individual and organisation consulted in advance about the contents of the document, "London, Making the Best Better"; what form the consultations took; and if he will place all written material received by his Department as a result of such consultations in the Library.

Mr. Gummer [holding answer 25 November 1993]: My officials and I have been in contact with a large number of organisations to discuss London issues, including input to the document. In addition, nine other Government Departments were involved, most of them consulting outside organisations as appropriate. It would be impossible to list all the contacts made and organisations involved.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement setting out the full criteria by which his Department will consider responses to the consultation document, "London, Making the Best Better"; and on what grounds responses to the document may be considered invalid.

Mr. Gummer [holding answer 25 November 1993]: No rigid criteria have been set. The intention is to analyse all the responses, using the framework of the six questions in the questionnaire.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list each individual and organisation sent an advance copy of the document "London, Making the Best Better"; and on what dates advance copies were sent to each organisation.

Mr. Gummer [holding answer 25 November 1993]: Advance embargoed copies of the document were given on 19 November to two of the organisations which assisted with input to the document, London First and the London Boroughs Association. The Evening Standard, which distributed the document, also received copies on 18 and 19 November.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make available for public inspection all responses to the document, "London, Making the Best Better", including those deemed by his Department to be invalid.

Mr. Gummer [holding answer 25 November 1993]: No. Individual responses to the questionnaire will be treated in confidence.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish a table showing the total cost of production and distribution of the document, "London, Making the Best Better", broken down into (a) total number produced, (b) total cost of typesetting, (c) total cost of layout and printing, (d) total cost of paper and assorted materials, (e) total cost of distribution, (f) total cost of uses of photographic and other copyright, (g) individual total numbers and costs of all advance and accompanying press releases, operational notes to the press and advance advertising in the press and (h) the total cost of the press launch.

Mr. Gummer [holding answer 25 November 1993]: Two hundred and fifty thousand copies of the document were produced, each of which contains a questionnaire. A further 50,000 separate copies of the questionnaire were printed. Costs to date are as follows:

Design and typesetting	32,000
Paper and printing	69,700
Distribution to date	33,400
Photographic rights to date	6,100
Press releases and advertising	1,700
Press launch	500
Questionnaire pilot survey	4,500

Further costs of some £20,000 might be incurred in sending out copies of the document and questionnaire in response to requests, in final design costs, and in additional freepost charges for the questionnaire.

One invitation—operational note—was sent out to the press and two press notices were issued; 550 copies of each were produced. There were two advertisements in the Evening Standard.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment on what date or dates legal advice was either sought from or given by (a) Government legal advisers or (b) other legal advisers, on the content of drafts of the document, "London, Making the Best Better"; and if he will place copies of all legal advice thereby obtained in the Library.

Mr. Gummer [holding answer 25 November 1993]: It was not necessary to seek legal advice on the document.

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish a table giving a breakdown of the timetable for production of the document, "London, Making the Best Better", including the specific dates on which (a) the initial departmental decision was formally taken to produce the document, (b) instructions were given to civil servants to begin preparation of initial draft, (c) the initial draft was completed, (d) the initial draft was considered by Ministers, (e) amendments were made to the initial draft, (f) the final draft was completed, (g) the final draft was considered by Ministers and (h) the final draft was considered by the Cabinet.

Mr. Gummer [holding answer 25 November 1993]: The decision to produce the document was taken by the Cabinet Sub-Committee on London on 22 July, and officials began preparation of the draft document immediately thereafter. Drafts of each section were produced by the Departments concerned and considered by Ministers at various times during September and October, and amendments continued to be made to the draft during that period. The final draft was circulated to the Cabinet Sub-Committee on London on 19 October.

Compulsory Competitive Tendering

Mr. Matthew Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what conclusions he has reached on the arrangements for the introduction of compulsory competitive tendering for housing management in England in the light of responses to the consultation paper which his Department issued in June 1993.

Sir George Young: The consultation paper set out proposals for three key components of compulsory competitive tendering—CCT—of housing management in England. These were: the "defined activity", the timetable for implementation by individual authorities and the size of contracts. We have carefully considered the responses to the consultation paper and, following discussions with representatives of local housing authorities, are now in a position to announce conclusions on the proposals subject to the consultation exercise and related matters.

The defined activity will focus on those aspects of housing management which authorities might reasonably contract out, allowing them to keep strategic, policy and enabling functions in house. The defined activity will be broadly as proposed in the consultation paper but the opportunity has been taken to refine and clarify it in the light of comments received. I am today placing in the Library a detailed description of the tasks making up the defined activity.

CCT will apply to housing management services covered by the defined activity which are provided to properties held by local authorities for the purposes of part II of the Housing Act 1985, excluding hostels as defined in the 1985 Act. A temporary exemption will be granted in respect of the Barbican estate in recognition of its special circumstances. We recognise that for operational reasons authorities need some flexibility to determine the way in which housing management services are provided. We therefore propose to relax the competition requirement by requiring that 95 per cent. of the annual value of the defined activity is subject to competition. Where contracts are won by local authorities' own direct service organisations they will be required to break even after allowing for a rate of return on capital employed. We propose that the rate should be 6 per cent.

We recognise that for a few smaller authorities the administrative burdens of introducing CCT for housing management may be unduly onerous. We therefore propose to set a de minimis threshold whereby authorities, the annual value of whose defined activity is £500,000 or less, will be exempt from housing management CCT. This figure will be kept under review in the light of experience of market-testing housing management.

It remains our intention that the introduction of housing management CCT will be phased on the basis of the bands set out in the consultation paper issued in June 1993, with the first contracts in operation from 1 April 1996. Some authorities represented that they should be placed in a different band from that proposed. Officials will be writing to them individually to let then know the band in which they will be placed.

The consultation paper indicated that, where authorities are restructured as a result of the local government review, they would be exempt from the requirement to subject the defined activity to competition from the date of the order making the structural change until 18 months after the new authority is in place. A further announcement will be made shortly about the timetable for implementation of CCT in shire counties and districts following my right hon. Friend's recent request to the Local Government Commission to complete the review by the end of 1994.

The Department will shortly be consulting local authorities and their representatives and other interested bodies on drafts of the subordinate legislation which will implement the decisions which I have announced today. It will also consult shortly on a draft circular on the statutory competition framework for CCT of white collar services, including housing management. The draft circular will include guidance on the size of housing management contracts in the terms proposed in the consultation paper.

The Department of the Environment is today writing to all local housing authorities in England with copies of this announcement, the defined activity and a fuller explanatory note. Copies of that note ae being placed in the Library.

Departmental Offices

Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to announce details of his Department's new accommodation.

Mr. Gummer: On 12 November last year, my predecessor announced that the Department of the Environment would remain in Marsham street for the time being while a search was undertaken to find the most suitable accommodation at the best value for money for the taxpayer, Official Report, column 955.

I have now selected two buildings for my Department's headquarters. Eland house, in Bressenden place near Victoria, is to be rebuilt by Land Securities. As part of the deal with Land Securities, 700,000 sq ft of offices held on long lease by Property Holdings will be surrendered before lease expiry, thereby making a significant reduction in the size of the Government estate in central London.

The second building is Ashdown house in Victoria street which is currently occupied by the Department of Trade and Industry: it is in need of major repairs. These will be done when the DTI reoccupies 1-19 Victoria street.

DOE headquarters staff in 2 Marsham street, together with staff in two other buildings in London will move to this new accommodation. Marsham street is also occupied in part by the Department of Transport. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Transport will make an announcment about future accommodation for his Department in due course. It is likely that both Departments will finally vacate 2 Marsham street towards the end of 1997, after which it will be demolished to the benefit of the London skyline.

Homelessness

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans the Government have to deal with homelessness in the west midlands; and how they plan to prevent homelessness in the future.

Sir George Young [holding answer 25 November 1993]: Resources for increasing and improving local authority and housing association housing stock are provided through the housing investment programme and the Housing Corporation's approved development programme, which take account of the circumstances in each area, including the level of acceptances under part III of the Housing Act 1985. In order to ensure fairer access to permanent social housing for people who need it, the Government propose to reform the homelessness provisions in the Housing Act 1985, and we hope to issue a consultation paper shortly.

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the major causes of homelessness.

Sir George Young [holding answer 25 November 1993]: The main reasons for the loss of the last settled home, as given by people accepted by local authorities for rehousing under part III of the Housing Act 1985, were associated with parents, relatives or friends being no longer willing or able to accommodate, and relationship breakdown. Details appear in the quarterly information bulletins issued by my Department, which are available in the Library of the House.

Mr. Geoffrey Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the largest age group of homeless people.

Sir George Young [holding answer 25 November 1993]: The returns that local authorities make to my Department on the number of households accepted under part III of the Housing Act 1985 do not include information on age groups.

Economic Development, Merseyside

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the persons and organisations on Merseyside he or his predecessor has met during the current year to discuss economic development matters.

Mr. Gummer [holding answer 25 November 1993]: I visited Liverpool on 14 July, and held meetings with the leader and chief executive of Liverpool city council, representatives of the regional press and media, and the Bishop and Archbishop of Liverpool. Issues of economic development were covered at all these meetings.

My right hon. and learned Friend the then Secretary of State for the Environment visited Liverpool on 30 March. He met councillors from all parties on Liverpool city council, together with the chief executive and director of resources; he also met press and media representatives, and the chairman, directors and senior officers of the Liverpool housing action trust.

Public Opinion Surveys

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish a full list of each public opinion survey commissioned by his Department over the past 10 years, the organisation from which the survey was commissioned, the information which the survey was designed to elicit, whether the results of the survey are available for public consultation and the total cost of carrying out each survey.

Mr. Gummer [holding answer 25 November 1993]: The information available about surveys carried out by my Department since 1985, which include questions to individuals about their opinions, is as follows:

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Civil Servants

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will list for each civil service grade in his Department (a) the total number of persons employed and (b) the total number of women employed.

Mr. David Davis: The staff-in-post figures as at 22 November 1993, for the Cabinet Office and the Office of Public Service and Science, including CCTA and the four executive agencies—Chessington Computer Centre, Civil Service College, the Occupational Health Service and the Recruitment and Assessment Services, are as follows:

Grade Band	Total	Women
Grade 1 (Including 1A)	3·0	0·0
Grade 2	17·0	2·0
Grade 3	24·0	4·0
Grade 4	2·0	0·0
Grade 5	57·0	17·5
Grade 6	62·0	15·0
Grade 7	258·0	56·0
SEO	200·0	64·0
HEO(D) & AT	16·0	4·0
HEO	288·5	122·0
EO	414·5	220·5

AA	300·0	207·5
Total	2,247·0	1,131·0

EMPLOYMENT

Overseas Visits

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many visits abroad he has made during 1993; and what was (a) the cost to public funds and (b) the purpose of each visit.

Mr. David Hunt: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given on 3 November by my hon. Friend the Minister of State to the hon. Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) Official Report, columns 268-70.

Aids to Employment Scheme

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many disabled working people in (a) London and (b) Lewisham currently benefit from the special aids to employment scheme; and how many disabled working people throughout the country he expects to lose their jobs once employers have to pay 50 per cent. of the cost of special aids in the workplace.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The numbers are: (a) 381; (b) 38. Changes to our current special schemes for helping people with disabilities, including the introduction of an employers' contribution, up to a ceiling to be specified, to help for existing employees who have worked for them for more than six months, are aimed at helping more people with disabilities to get and retain jobs and at making a much wider range of help available. We are currently finalising details of these changes with these aims in mind.

Disablement Resettlement Officers

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what measurements he uses to assess the performance of disablement resettlement officers; what targets and performance indicators he sets for these officers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service agency under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from M.E.G. Fogden to Mr. Gordon McMaster, dated 26 November 1993:

As the Employment Service is an Executive Agency, the Secretary of State has asked me to write to you direct to respond to your Parliamentary Question to him about assessing the performance of Disablement Resettlement officers and setting targets and performance indicators for them. This is something which falls within the responsibilities delegated to me as Chief Executive of the Agency.

We no longer use the term Disablement Resettlement Officers. During 1992-93 Placing, Assessment and Counselling Teams were set up to provide a comprehensive and local specialist employment service for people with disabilities and employers. The Teams provide many of the services previously delivered by Disablement Resettlement Officers, the Disablement Advisory Service and most of the assessment element of Employment Rehabilitation Centres.

Placing, Assessment and Counselling Teams are staffed by Disability Employment Advisers who are experienced in placing people wth disabilities into jobs. They offer professional advice and support to help improve the job prospects of people with disabilities and encourage employers to take on or keep people with disabilities.

The Annual Performance Agreement with the Secretary of State for Employment sets a target for the number of unemployed people with disabilities to be placed into jobs. Targets are also set for the number of people benefiting from special scheme provision, the number of people starting rehabilitation programmes, the number of people in sheltered employment and the number of employers who satisfy the conditions to use the disability symbol. Achievements against all these targets are used to assess the performance of the Placing, Assessment and Counselling Teams.

I hope this is helpful.

As decided by the Administration Committee of the House of Commons, Chief Executive replies to written Parliamentary Questions will now be published in the Official Report. I will also place a copy of this letter in the library of the House.

Graphology

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what representations he has received about the validity of graphology as a personnel selection tool; what consideration he is giving to banning graphology as a selection tool; and if he will make a statement.

Miss Widdecombe: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has received one letter on this subject. We have no plans to ban the use of graphology as a selection tool. Provided that they do not discriminate unlawfully, employers should be free to use whatever selection methods they consider best suit their needs.

VAT (Books and Newspapers)

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what representations he has received from the book publishing and newspaper professions regarding the employment consequences of the imposition of VAT on books and newspapers.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I have received two such representations.

Hazardous Waste

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps have been taken in the United Kingdom to implement the directive 82/501/EEC on hazardous wastes; and what information he has on its implementation in other European Community countries.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I have been asked to reply.

Directive 82/501/EEC is implemented in the United Kingdom by the Control of Industrial Major Accident Hazards Regulations 1984 (CIMAH). Amending regulations, applying CIMAH to installations for the disposeal of hazardous waste have been approved by the Health and Safety Commission and should come into force by the end of the year.

Information on the implementation of directive 82/501/EEc is published periodically by the Commission of the European Communities.

Scotch Whisky

Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many are employed in the Scotch whisky industry now and how many were 10 years ago.

Miss Widdecombe: I regret the information is not available. The standard industrial classification does not separately identify the whisky industry from other industries involved in spirit distilling and compounding.

Labour and Social Affairs Council

Ms Quin: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the outcome of the EC Labour and Social Affairs Council of 23 November.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to the hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Duncan Smith) on 24 November 1993, Official Report, column 72.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Interest Rates

Mr. Cash: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to reduce interest rates.

Mr. Nelson: The level of interest rates will continue to be set to meet the Government's objectives for inflation and sustainable growth.

Value Added Tax

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has made of the effect on the number of regional newspapers of the imposition of VAT on books and newspapers.

Sir John Cope: Analysis commissioned by the Newspapers Society suggests that VAT imposition at the standard rate would close 245 titles out of a total of 1,265 titles.

Mr. Pike: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what representations he has received regarding the possible imposition of VAT on (a) books, (b) national newspapers, (c) regional newspapers, (d) local newspapers, (e) free newspapers and (f) magazines; and if he will make a statement;

(2) how many representations he has received on the possible introduction of VAT on fares on (a) domestic travel, (b) international travel, (c) rail travel, (d) bus/coach travel, (e) air travel and (f) sea-river travel; and if he will make a statement.

Sir John Cope: I have received a number of representations which are all being considered very carefully as we prepare for the Budget on 30 November. However, it would be inappropriate for me to comment further at this stage.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what is the normal practice of VAT commissioners on making large repayments other than by electronic transfer;

(2) what plans he has to improve the security involved in transferring money from the VAT commissioners; and if he will make a statement;

(3) how many cheques sent throught the post by the VAT commissioners have been fraudulently encashed in the last five years; what was their value; and if he will make a statement;

(4) whether repayments made by VAT commissioners are usually sent by recorded delivery or registered post; and what is the usual practice on them being made by cheque.

Sir John Cope: Customs continually encourages businesses to provide it with bank account details, so that repayments can be electronically transferred. Despite this encouragement, not all traders take advantage of this facility and almost 1 million payable orders, with a total value in excess of £7 billion, are issued each year by first class post.

In conjunction with Her Majesty's Treasury, Customs has been taking steps to increase even further the security measures for payable orders. These include higher levels of security printing so as to make alteration of the payee's name more difficult.

Excluding the recent Haringey case, Customs has investigated 112 cases since 1 July 1988 where VAT payable orders have gone astray. The total value of those orders is £360,638, a substantial proportion of which has subsequently been recovered. During the same period, over 5 million orders have been issued, with a total value approaching £30 billion.

EC Budget

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total budgeted contribution to be made by each member state of the European Communities according to the 1994 EC budget; what is the net contribution to be made for each state after deduction of rebates and budgeted receipts; and what figure the EC predicts as the gross domestic product for each state in 1994.

Sir John Cope: The Budget Council established a second reading of the draft 1994 EC budget on 15 November. The European Parliament will consider this at its next plenary session in December and each member state's budgeted contribution will not be finalised until the budget is adopted by the European Parliament.

EC budgets do not give a breakdown, by member state, of receipts. Details of member states' receipts from the EC Budget are, however, published annually in the European Court of Auditors' report: the report for 1992 was published in the Official Journal of the European Communities, volumn 36 C309, on 16 November 1993.

As part of the budget, estimated figures are agreed for one per cent. of gross national product for each member state, in order to calculate contributions based on GNP and the value of the own resources ceiling. Those in the 1994 draft budget are:

	Million ecu
Belgium	1,880·8
Denmark	1,186·2
Germany	16,981·0
Greece	739·6
Spain	4,751·4
France	11,482·0
Ireland	353·5
Italy	9,175·0
Luxembourg	123·2
Netherlands	2,757·4
Portugal	800·0
United Kingdom	8,004·0
Total	58,234·1

ECOFIN Council

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what matters in regard to the cost of implementation of European Community directives he raised at the ECOFIN Council in Brussels on 22 November.

Ms Quin: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement on the outcome of the ECOFIN Council of 22 November.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The Economic and Finance Council of the European Union—ECOFIN—met in Brussels on 22 November. I represented the United Kingdom.

There was detailed discussion on the Commission's ideas for the White Book on a medium-term strategy for growth, competitiveness and employment that they are preparing for the European Council in December. Virtually all member states agreed that obliging employers to introduce new work-sharing arrangements was not the solution to the present high levels of unemployment. Other member states also shared our concern that the Commission appeared to be giving insufficient weight to the need for structural reforms to improve the flexibility of labour markets. The Council invited the Commission to take account of the points made in discussion in preparing the White Book.

The Council had a general orientation debate on the broad economic policy guidelines under article 103 of the treaty. These guidelines take the form of recommendations and are not legally binding. There was a general consensus that the guidelines should provide a credible framework without being over-prescriptive about how member states should set their economic policies. It was agreed that the Council would meet again on 5 December to consider the Commission's formal recommendation, and to agree its report to the European Council.

France and Germany presented convergence programmes to the Council. The Council concluded that the French programme was solid and coherent and welcomed the planned programme of structural reforms. Budgetary consolidation was identified as the main challenge facing the French Government, following two years of deterioration in public finances mainly due to cyclical factors.

The Council welcomed the efforts of the German Government to achieve convergence, notwithstanding considerable difficulties in the aftermath of German unification. The Council noted the strategy for structural policy and the need for measures to improve the productivity and competitiveness of the German economy and to deal with the distributional questions raised in the unification process. The Council welcomed the determination of the German authorities to achieve fiscal consolidation.

Council decisions were adopted on the capital key for the European Monetary Institute (EMI), on consultation of the EMI on draft national legislation within its field of competence, and on bringing the staff of the EMI within the tax system for staff of Community institutions. The Council also adopted a regulation on details of the excessive deficits procedure under article 104c of the treaty and agreed common positions on draft Council regulations providing definitions relating to the treaty provisions banning monetary financing and privileged access. All these measures are due to take effect from 1 January 1994 at the start of the second stage of economic and monetary union.

The Council reached political agreement on a directive to reinforce the prudential supervision of financial institutions. This will implement a number of recommendations of the Bingham report on the Bank of Credit and Commerce International affair.

There was a brief discussion of issues related to the Edinburgh growth initiative arising from the conclusions of the European Council meeting on 29 October. Ministers confirmed their intention to extend the coverage of the European investment bank temporary lending facility to transport equipment, energy and urban renewal projects. Agreement in principle was reached on the arrangements for the participation of Community institutions in the European investment fund. A proposal to implement the European Council's conclusion on interest rate subsidies for EIB lending to small and medium-sized enterprises was remitted for further consideration by officials.

I drew the Council's attention to the likely costs associated with implementing the urban waste water treatment directive and highlighted this as an example of a decision taken by a specialist Council without paying sufficient regard to the economic or budgetary implications.

There was also a short discussion of the recently published Court of Auditors' report on the 1992 Community budget. After detailed consideration of the report—and the Commission's response—the Council will adopt a recommendation to the European Parliament on granting a discharge to the Commission in respect of the implementation of the 1992 budget, during the Greek presidency in the first half of 1994.

There were no formal votes. The EMU secondary legislation, the Council decision on Community participation in the EIF and the Council conclusions on the convergence programmes of France and Germany were agreed by consensus.

Spirits and Wine

Mr. Steen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement as to the basis on which excise duty is levied on spirits and wine.

Sir John Cope: Excise duty is levied on spirits according to the litres of pure alcohol contained therein. Wine is dutied according to its bulk quantity and the nature and strength of the product. There are eight duty bandings ranging from a strength of 1·2 per cent. to 22 per cent. alcohol by volume and differentiating between still, sparkling and fortified wines.

Haringey Council Cheque (Fraudulent Encashment)

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the present whereabouts of money received from fraudulently encashing a cheque from the VAT commissioners to Haringey council.

Sir John Cope: The present whereabouts of the money are not known, but police inquiries are continuing to establish where the money went and the route it took.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what action VAT commissioners will take concerning Haringey council's writ seeking recovery of a payment which was fraudulently encashed in Austria.

Sir John Cope: The commissioners have served a defence to the council's writ and the matter is now proceeding to trial.

Ministerial Letters

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many officials in his Department are currently involved in drafting replies to letters for Ministers in his Department to sign.

Sir John Cope [holding answer 25 November 1993]: Five staff work full time in the ministerial correspondence unit. Many other Treasury officials draft replies to ministerial correspondence from time to time as part of their normal duties.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Marsh Arabs

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has had regarding the plight of the Marsh Arabs; what discussions have taken place between his Department and the United Nations over their future; what efforts his Department are making over their continued security; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The Foreign and Commonwealth Office has received numerous representations about events in southern Iraq.

We frequently raise the plight of the Marsh Arabs at the United Nations, most recently during the review of sanctions on 18 November. We drew the attention of the United Nations weapons inspectors to reports that chemical weapons were used against civilians. We support the call of the United Nations special rapporteur on human rights for the deployment of monitors in Iraq.

In addition, British aircraft are deployed over southern Iraq in support of United Nations Security Council resolution 688.

BBC World Service

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what consultations have been carried out between his Department and the BBC in respect of the BBC World Service lease at its headquarters in Bush house; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The current lease on Bush house was signed in 1990 and expires in 2005. Discussions with the BBC World Service have already taken place, and it has been agreed that the question of future location will be discussed again in due course.

Miss Patience Ikeazota

Mr. Beith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the refusal of a tourist visa for a limited stay in Britain to Miss Patience Ikeazota by the entry clearance officer in Lagos.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Following an interview at the high commission in Lagos on 9 April 1992, Miss Ikeazota's application for a visit visa was refused, as was her previous application in April 1991, because the entry clearance officer was not satisfied that she was genuinely seeking entry to the United Kingdom for the period of the visit stated by her.

Azerbaijan

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action Her Majesty's Government are taking to assist in implementing United Nations Security Council resolutions regarding Azerbaijan.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We maintain high-level contacts with the Armenians and the Azerbaijanis and urge them to adhere to United Nations Security Council resolutions 822, 853, 874 and 884.

We are actively supporting the efforts of the Minsk group whose efforts to find a peaceful resolution to this conflict have been fully endorsed by the United Nations.

In the past year we have provided almost £1·9 million of humanitarian aid to the region.

Correspondence

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will place in the Library copies of all correspondence and minutes of meetings between his Department and Gerald Bull between 1987 and 1990.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: As far as we have been able to establish, there is no record of any correspondence or record of any meeting between this Department and Dr. Gerald Bull.

Endangered Species

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what exemptions have been sought by Norway under the EC convention on international trade in endangered species regulation and habitats directive.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The Norwegian Government are seeking exemptions from the habitats directive and the CITES regulation for a wide variety of species. These include several species of fish, terrestrial mammals, seals and whales.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what attempts Norway has made to secure opt-outs from EC regulations covering the killing and trade in whale and seal products; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The Norwegian Government are requesting exemptions from the EC habitats directive in respect of five seal and three whale species. We shall be discussing the Norwegian request with other member states.

Nigeria

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what current sanctions are being applied against the military Government of Nigeria; and what new ones are being considered.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: On 24 June, we announced our decision to withdraw all offers of new military training courses provided for members of the Nigerian armed forces in the United Kingdom; to suspend all assistance to the National War College in Lagos and withdraw the British military advisory team; to suspend issue of visas for members of the Nigerian armed forces and their dependents; to withdraw special treatment of visa applications from Nigerian officials; and to consider all new aid to Nigeria on a case-by-case basis. These measures remain in force.

Our response to the latest developments is currently being discussed with our partners in the European Union and the wider donor community.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he expects to discuss the new military takeover in Nigeria with his European Union counterparts; and what proposals he will be taking to that meeting.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The European Union issued a statement on 19 November condemning the fact that the democratic process in Nigeria has been interrupted through the resumption of power by a military dictatorship. It strongly urged the Nigerian military authorities to re-establish democratic institutions.

As my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary announced on 17 November, we are now consulting with our partners in the European Union on what further actions we should take in response to the new military takeover.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Fire Calls

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the number of fire calls in (a) 1991 and (b) 1992 for each fire authority area and in total; if he will identify the number of hoax calls in each year on a similar basis; and if he will express hoax calls as a percentage of total calls.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The information for fire calls attended by local authority fire brigades is shown in the table.

[1] Provisional.

Police Equipment

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what criteria are laid down by his Department in respect of being informed of police equipment that is either lost or stolen; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The loss or theft of police equipment is a matter for individual police forces and authorities. The Home Office would not become involved unless the scale of such losses was such as to call into question management procedures or the efficiency of the force in question. Nor has the Home Office any plans to introduce monitoring of losses of police equipment.

Carl Bridgewater

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the police inquiries into the Carl Bridgewater convictions and the outcome in each case.

Mr. Maclean: Since the conviction in 1979 of those concerned, there have been seven police inquiries into the case, involving four separate police forces, as follows:

	Police force
1980 and 1981	Cheshire Constabulary
1983, 1984 and 1985	Greater Manchester Police
1986	Warwickshire Constabulary
1991	Merseyside Police

Following the inquiries by Warwickshire constabulary, my right hon. Friend the Member for Witney (Mr. Hurd), then Home Secretary, decided in 1987 to refer to the Court of Appeal the convictions of Michael and Vincent Hickey and James Robinson. Their appeals were dismissed in 1989.

None of the other inquiries to which I have referred disclosed grounds to take action in respect of the convictions. As part of our consideration of the latest representations in this case, we are arranging for further police inquiries to be carried out into some of the matters raised.

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department on which dates since 1988 he has received submissions from solicitors representing the men convicted of killing Carl Bridgewater and say what action he has taken in each case.

Mr. Maclean: Solicitors for those convicted of killing Carl Bridgewater have made a number of submissions to the Home Office since 1988. Those which relate most directly to the allegations of wrongful conviction were made on 17 Septemberr 1990, 7 June 1991, 2 August 1991, 13 August 1991, 17 October 1991, 26 May 1992 and 19 January 1993. The matters raised there were carefully considered but as my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Rushcliffe (Mr. Clarke), then Home Secretary, announced on 3 February, they provided no grounds for action to be taken in respect of the convictions.

Further submissions from the solicitors were made on 8 June, 13 July, 10 November and 15 November 1993 and we understand that more are to follow. As part of our consideration of these allegations of wrongful conviction we are arranging for further police inquiries to be carried out into some of the matters raised.

Parish Constables

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the locations of the 20 pilot schemes for parish constables he intends setting up by Christmas; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Charles Wardle: It is for police forces and local communities to decide—through consultation—where the pilot schemes for parish constables should be. A number of forces are currently engaged in such consultation. A further announcement will be made nearer the time about the pilot schemes which are being set up. I am pleased with the progress made so far.

Football Matches

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much was received by the Metropolitan police from London's professional football clubs for policing services in the season 1992-93 and 1993 to date.

Mr. Charles Wardle: I understand that the Metropolitan police received £2,076,781 for the 1992-93 season. The amount received so far during the 1993-94 season is £424,515.

Racial Harassment

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will introduce legislation in his next criminal justice Bill that every tenancy for (a) homes and (b) shops contains a condition prohibiting racial harrassment, binding on landlords as well as tenants; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Current landlord and tenant legislation already gives local authorities powers to take action against tenants who racially harass other tenants. The Public Order Act 1986 created a new low-level offence of offensive conduct which is relevant to all forms of harassment. There are no plans to introduce additional legislation.

The Commission for Racial Equality has produced codes of practice for both rented and non-rented housing, which were approved by Parliament in 1990 and 1992 respectively. These include practical steps to deal with, and pre-empt, racial harassment.

Police Sirens

Sir Russell Johnston: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what guidance he gives to the Commissioner of Police regarding the use of police sirens in the Metropolitan area.

Mr. Charles Wardle: I understand from the Commissioner that guidance on the use of sirens is included in the training given to drivers at the Metropolitan police driving school.

Lunar House

Sir Thomas Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement about the backlog of work at Lunar house, Croydon.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Information for the end of October 1993 on the main areas of work is given in the table.

Immigration and asylum work items[1] in the Immigration and Nationality Department at 31 October 1993

	Number
Cases in the general immigration caseworking groups[2]	22,430
Cases in the EC caseworking group[2]	1,190
Cases in the asylum and special cases division	51,400
Items in the post room and registry[3]	12,420

[1]Including referred enty clearance applications and appeals awaiting preparation of statements.
[2]The majority of these were under consideration or the subject of further inquiries.
[3]Mainly passports and letters, being sorted and allocated to caseworkers.

Wheel Clamping

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will being forward proposals to make it illegal to wheel-clamp orange badge holders on private car parks or other private land; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: In the consultation paper on wheel-clamping on private land, issued earlier this year, we acknowledged the need to consider the particular position of orange badge holders. In the light of that consultation, we are still considering what action it might be appropriate to take.

Immigration Appeals

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the current waiting time for consideration of immigration appeals by the immigration appeals tribunals and independent applellate authorities for nationals of each country; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John M. Taylor: I have been asked to reply.

The immigration appellate authorities—IAA—list cases for hearing once the parties have indicated readiness to proceed to a hearing. The nationality of the appellant does not affect when a case is heard. The first available hearing date at each of the IAA's centres as at 22 November 1993 is set out in the table:

Centre	Long appointment	Short appointment
Hatton Cross, West London	31 January 1994	4 January 1994
Thanet House, London[1]	As Hatton Cross	26 January 1994
Birmingham	21 December 1993	21 December 1993
Manchester	15 March 1994	15 March 1994
Leeds	7 February 1994	17 January 1994
Glasgow	March 1994	February 1994

[1] Hearings are offered at Hatton Cross, but where this is not accepted by the appellant, cases are listed at Thanet House for May 1994.

In proceedings before the immigration appeal tribunal, if leave to appeal is granted, a hearing currently takes place within four weeks of the record of proceedings being prepared by the adjudicator who originally heard the case.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Wigs

Mr. David Evans: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will make a statement on the wearing of wigs by lawyers.

Mr. John M. Taylor: The standard of court dress requires wigs to be worn by barristers but not by solicitors.

Queen's Counsel

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many Queen's Counsel there are; and how many are (a) women, (b) black and (c) Asian.

Mr. John M. Taylor: On 1 October 1993 there were 797 Queen's Counsel in private practice, of whom 41 were women. The ethnic origin of applicants for the office of Queen's Counsel was not recorded prior to the autumn of 1991, and the formal records in respect of ethnic origin are therefore incomplete. I believe that on 1 October 1993 there were three black and five Asian Queen's Counsel.

Justices of the Peace

Mr. Kinnock: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many justices of the peace fail to achieve attendance for the requirement minimum of 26 sittings of their respective benches a year.

Mr. John M. Taylor: This information can be supplied only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Kinnock: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what is his policy on the continuation of a magistrate system which includes members of the public from a wide spectrum of occupations and experience; and if he will make it his policy to encourage employers to co-operate with arrangements for their employees to meet the minimum requirements for justices of the peace.

Mr. John M. Taylor: The Lord Chancellor remains wholeheartedly committed to the concept of summary justice provided by lay people drawn from their local community and from a wide spectrum of backgrounds. In the past, the Lord Chancellor has written to the chairmen of major firms and organisations to encourage them to make employees available to serve as justices; on a local basis, his advisory committees from time to time make similar contacts.

Mr. Kinnock: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many of those justices of the peace who have been officially recorded as being unable to meet the annual minimum attendance have signified that their absences were due to pressures of work or inability to secure release from work for the purpose of fulfilling their duties as magistrates; and how many of these people are civil servants.

Mr. John M. Taylor: This information can be supplied only at disproportionate cost.

Mr Kinnock: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department (1) how many civil servants are justices of the peace;

(2) how many civil servants who are justices of the peace are not allowed 18 days paid leave in order to permit them to fulfill their duties as magistrates;

(3) what are the civil service grades of those civil servants who are justices of the peace.

Mr John M. Taylor: This information can be supplied only at disproportionate cost.

High Court Judges

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many High Court judges there are; and how many are (a) black, (b) Asian and (c) women.

Mr. John M. Taylor: As at 1 November there were 95 High Court judges including six women. The ethnic origin of those appointed as High Court judges has not been recorded in the past, but none is black or Asian.

Civil Servants

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will list for each civil service grade in his Department (a) the total number of persons employed and (b) the total number of women employed.

Mr. John M. Taylor: Details of the numbers of staff employed in each civil service grade are set out in the table. In column two of the table the total number of staff employed in each grade appears; column three shows the total number of women in each grade.

District Judges

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many district judges there are; and how many are (a) black, (b) Asian and (c) women.

Mr. John M. Taylor: The information requested, as at 1 November 1993, is as follows. Records are not held on the ethnic origins of all office holders, but the numbers relating to those of black and Asian origin are believed to be as given.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Poland

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many British companies in the last two years have been refused permission by the Polish authorities to sell their products in Poland; what products these British companies have been seeking to export to Poland; what reasons the Polish authorities have given to justify refusal of permission; and what efforts his Department has made on behalf of these companies to overturn the decision of the Polish authorities.

Mr. Needham: No comprehensive record has been kept in the last two years but my Department has received complaints from about half a dozen British companies concerning the application to their products of Polish technical specifications and health and safety regulations. In each case where the company has been unable to resolve the difficulties my Department has intervened in close collaboration with our embassy in Warsaw. One such case has recently been resolved entirely to the satisfaction of the British company concerned; two others are under discussion.

If the hon. Member would like to discuss any individual case, I should be pleased to hear from her. She will, no doubt, be aware that British exports to Poland have increased very rapidly over the period in question and it would perhaps be surprising if we did not encounter a few difficulties with a legal framework for business which is still evolving.

Regional Industrial Policy

Sir David Knox: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how much has been spent on regional industrial policy in each year since 1974-75; and what the expected expenditure will be in the current financial year, at constant prices.

Mr. Sainsbury: The exact amount spent on regional industrial policy since 1974-75 could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Most of the expenditure under regional industrial policy was on regional development grants and regional selective assistance. Information on the spend of these two schemes in Great Britain since 1974-75 is set out in the table together with expenditure on European Community schemes, regional enterprise grants and some residual spend on investment grants. The information is at 1992-93 constant prices.

Statutory Instruments

Mr. Mullin: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many statutory instruments have been introduced by his Department in each year since accession to the EEC.

Mr. Heseltine: Records for statutory instruments introduced by the Department of Trade and Industry since accession to the EC are not readily available before 1979. Accordingly the information requested is provided from that year onwards and is as follows:

Number of SIs which came into operation

Year	Number
1979	153
1980	201
1981	141
1982	118
1983	94
1984	69
1985	130
1986	92
1987	77
1988	114
1989	132
1990	137

Year	Number
1991	161
[1]1992	96
[2]1993	91

[1] Figures from this year forward include SIs relating to the former Department of Energy. Figures for SIs introduced in earlier years by the Department of Energy are not readily available.
[2] As at 24 November 1993.

Deregulation

Mr. Mullin: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list the organisations consulted over his proposed deregulation Bill and indicate which were broadly in favour of greater deregulation and which were broadly satisfied with the status quo.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: A wide range of organisations are beign consulted on proposals for deregulation including those which will be dealt with in the deregulation Bill. Details of measures to be dealt with in the Bill will be announced when the Bill is published. Since consultations cover a large number of specific issues they cannot be classified as for or against deregulation in general.

Monopolies and Mergers Commission

Mr. Wigley: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) if he will review the terms of reference and the guidelines within which the Monopolies and Mergers Commission are required to operate and their operation following in the case of their recent decision on distribution arrangements for perfumes; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will institute an investigation into the workings of the Monopolies and Mergers Commission in order to ensure that mechanisms exist to ensure that no sectional commercial interest is allowed to overrule consumers' interests.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: In reaching conclusions as to the public interest, the Monoplies and Mergers Commission are required by schedule 84 of the Fair Trading Act 1973 to take into account all matters which appear to them in the particular circumstances to be relevant. These matters include the desirability of maintaining and promoting effective competition in the United Kingdom and promoting the interests of consumers. My right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade has no plans to review these provisions in the Act.

Mr. Wigley: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assessment he has made of whether protectionist trade practices approved by the Monopolies and Mergers Commission fall within the regulations of the competitions policy of the European Union; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: In conducting its inquiries, the Monopolies and Mergers Commission takes account of the possible application of European competition law and discuss this with the EC Commission in specific cases where this seems appropriate. Enforcement of European competition law is a matter for the EC Commission or national courts.

Overseas Visits

Mr. Vaz: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many visits abroad he has made during 1993; and what was (a) the cost of each visit to public funds and (b) the purpose of each visit.

Mr. Heseltine: I have made three visits abroad during 1993, one to Brussels, one to Argentina and Mexico, and one to Germany.

The visit to Brussels was for discussions with EC Commissioners and cost £2,185. The visit to Argentina and Mexico was for trade promotional purposes and cost £27,901. The visit to Germany was to attend the Anglo-German summit and cost £1,071.

NCM

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the President of the Board of Trade from what date his Department will extend NCM's transitional reinsurance cover.

Mr. Needham: The Export Credits Guarantee Department's transitional reinsurance support to NCM will be extended beyond its originally envisaged expiry date of December 1994 until at least the end of 1997. I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave on 24 June 1993, Official Report, columns 265-66.

Regional Assistance

Mr. Hardy: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list the projects or localities that have been or will be assisted through the use of objective 2 funds from the European Community.

Mr. Sainsbury [holding answer 26 November 1993]: The areas at present eligible for European structural funds grants under objective 2 are listed in full in two Commission decisions dated 21 March 1989 and 3 May 1990—Official Journal No. L 112/19 and 206/26. They include areas in central Scotland, the north-east, west Cumbria, the north-west, Yorkshire and Humberside, the west and east midlands, and north-east and south Wales. A very large number of infrastructure, training and other economic development projects have received, or are receiving, objective 2 grant in these areas in the current, 1989-93, programme period.

Objective 2 areas for the period 1994-96 are under review at present; and the Government put proposals to the Commission in October. A full list of areas proposed is available in the Library of the House. The final decision on these proposals is expected in December.

Mr. Hardy: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what share and how much EC objective 2 funding has been allocated to the United Kingdom; and, of this sum, what proportions have now been received or committed.

Mr. Sainsbury [holding answer 26 November 1993]: For the period 1989-93 some 3,200 mecu—1992 prices —has been allocated to the United Kingdom under objective 2. This represents 38 per cent. of the total allocated to this objective. To date, over 85 per cent. of the United Kingdom's allocation has been committed to projects.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Historic Gardens Awards

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if he will list the applicants for European Community financial assistance under this year's awards for the conservation of gardens of historic value; what were the reasons in each applicable case for a garden not receiving such funding and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: The EC pilot projects grant scheme makes awards annually to conservation work within certain themes. The 1993 theme was the conservation of gardens of historic value and the English applicants were:

I congratulate the English applicants chosen by the Commission to receive assistance under the scheme, which were Painshill park, Cobham; Harewood terrace, Leeds; Brantwood garden, Coniston; Hanbury Hall garden, Droitwich; and Prior park, Bath.

Sports Council

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage whether a new director-general of the Sports Council has been appointed; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: A final decision on the appointment of a new director-general has not yet been made. The selection process is continuing.

Tourist Attractions

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how many visitors were recorded at (a) the Tower of London, (b) Hampton court, (c) the Cutty Sark, Greenwich and (d) the national maritime museum, Greenwich in 1992.

Mr. Sproat: The number of visitors in 1992 were:

	Numbers
Tower of London	2,235,199
Hampton Court Palace	580,440
Cutty Sark, Greenwich	304,124
National Maritime Museum, Greenwich	550,608

BBC

Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what assessment he has made of the effect on the cultural heritage of Northern Ireland of changes in the funding of the BBC.

Mr. Brooke: Licence payers in all parts of the United Kingdom will benefit from the licence fee settlement I announced on 4 November, which will allow additional and better programmes.

The BBC is responsible for deciding how to allocate its revenue under the terms of its present royal charter and licence and agreement.

Dame Daphne Park

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what were the qualifications that led to Dame Daphne Park being appointed a governor of the BBC.

Mr. Brooke: It is not normal practice to comment on the reasons for appointing particular individuals to public bodies. The role of the BBC board of governors is to protect the public interest, and its membership reflects the experience and diversity of the country at large.

Arts and Disability

Sir John Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what proposals the Arts Council has to abolish the arts and disability unit; what advice it received from the Arts Council's arts and disability monitoring committee on this matter; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: The Arts Council intends to integrate the work of the units within the council responsible for implementing strategic policy in the fields of cultural diversity, disability, and women in the arts, with the art form departments. Such structural changes are matters for the Arts Council to decide.

Cliveden House

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what action his Department is taking over preserving Cliveden house; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: Cliveden is owned by the National Trust. I understand that the house, which is let as an hotel, has been admirably restored and refurbished by Cliveden Hotel Ltd., which has invested some £10 million in bringing this fine building to its present excellent condition. Sympathetic new uses such as this are essential to bring in the resources needed to preserve the best of our heritage.

Some other parts of the estate require major works and for these the National Trust has launched a public appeal. Works to the clock tower have been included in the priority repair programme agreed between English Heritage and the National Trust for 1993-94 and English Heritage expects to offer substantial grant aid. The National Trust proposes to carry out further works as soon as the success of its appeal allows.

Bush House

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what consultations have been carried out between his Department and the BBC in respect of the BBC World Service lease at its headquarters in Bush house; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: None. This is not a matter on which the Department of National Heritage would expect to be consulted.

EDUCATION

Schools, Chelmsford

Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will list the schools in the Chelmsford parliamentary constituency that (a) are grant maintained, (b) have had grant-maintained status approved which is yet to come into force and (c) have not yet sought grant-maintained status; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Robin Squire: Information on schools by parliamentary constituency is not collected centrally. Relevant information held by the department for schools in Essex local education authority has been placed in the Library.

The benefits of self-government are becoming increasingly clear to governors and parents. This is particularly true in Essex, which already has 114 self-governing schools—more than any other LEA in the country.

Students

Mr. Rooker: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what action he has taken since incorporation of further education colleges to ensure that student financial support matches the needs of students.

Mr. Boswell: Local education authorities have the power under the Education Act 1962 to make discretionary awards to students on courses of further education in the light of local needs and priorities. They also have duties and powers under the Education Act 1944, as amended by the Further and Higher Education Act 1992, to provide free transport and assistance with travel costs to post-16 students.

My right hon. Friend has made it a condition of grant that colleges in the further education sector may not charge tuition fees to home and EC students aged 16 to 18 on full-time courses. Many colleges operate concessionary fees for other students. Access funds are disbursed by colleges to help eligible full-time students who are in particular financial difficulties.

Students may apply for career development loans from the Employment Department; and those in employment can look to their employers for assistance.

Further Education Colleges

Mr. Rooker: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what is the drop-out rate from further education colleges; and what representations he has received that dropping out is being caused by financial constraints on support for meals and travel.

Mr. Boswell: Information on drop-out rates is not currently collected centrally for colleges in the FE sector. The Audit Commission and Ofsted report "Unfinished Business" estimated that for schools and colleges the drop-out rate for 16 to 18-year-olds on full-time courses was 13 per cent. on courses leading to academic qualifications and 18 per cent. on those leading to vocational qualifications.

We are seeking to reduce drop-out from colleges in a variety of ways: by providing more information to young people to help them make the right choices at 16; by improving the range and choice of courses available, including new GNVQs and NVQs which offer high-quality alternatives to GCE A levels; and by ensuring that funding mechanisms provide an incentive to colleges not only to recruit but to retain more students.

My right hon. Friend has received a number of letters about the duties and powers of LEAs to provide free transport and assistance with travel costs to post-16 students. He has told LEAs that he expects them to monitor the effects of transport policies on participation rates overall and that he will himself keep this aspect of the new arrangements under review.

LEAs' responsibilities to provide free meals do not extend to students in colleges in the new FE sector.

Examination League Tables

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Education for what reasons the school examination league tables, published on 17 November, include information about special schools, including those for children with severe learning difficulties.

Mr. Robin Squire: Special schools are included in secondary school performance tables on the grounds that parents have a right to information on any relevant results, and on rates of unauthorised absence. In successive consultation exercises, last year and this, no organisation representing special needs groups argued that they should be excluded.

Examination Results

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what was the precise cost of collating the information published on 17 November about school examination results and unauthorised attendance; and on what dates this information was dispatched from his Department to (a) the national press, (b) schools and (c) local education authorities.

Mr. Robin Squire: The cost of collecting, processing and collating the comparative information on school and college performance published on 17 and 24 November is estimated at £458,000. The data on secondary school performance were sent to the national press on 15 November, under embargo until 1 am on 17 November, so that they could make the necessary preparations for publication; and to schools and local education authorities on 16 November so that they would receive it on the day in question.

Nursery Education

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what is the cost of providing nursery places for all three and four-year-olds whose parents want it.

Mr. Robin Squire: The cost would depend on the types of provision, the balance between full-time and part-time attendance and the numbers of parents who chose to take up a nursery place. Currently, some 53 per cent. of three and four-year-olds in England are in some form of full-time or part-time schooling. We estimate that the average annual recurrent unit cost for a full-time equivalent pupil aged under five in the maintained sector is £1,770 at 1993-94 prices. In addition, there would be capital and teacher training costs.

Sustainable Development

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what response he has made to the report on sustainable development prepared by the Education for Sustainability Forum as part of Her Majesty's Government's consultation on the United Kingdom strategy for sustainable development.

Mr. Robin Squire: The Department is taking account of the education for Sustainability Forum's consultation document "The Role of Education for Sustainability" when preparing its contribution to the Government's overall strategy for sustainable development.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Police Evidence

33. Mr. Clifton-Brown: To ask the Attorney-General what steps he is taking to simplify the procedure by which the police have to present evidence to the Crown Prosecution Service.

The Attorney-General: My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary recently announced his acceptance of all 16 of the recommendations of a report by outside consultants designed to reduce and streamline police paperwork. The Crown Prosecution Service and the Home Office are now working together to implement these recommendations.

Cautions

34. Mr. Miller: To ask the Attorney-General what advice has been given to police authorities about cautions by his Department and the Crown Prosecution Service.

The Solicitor-General: The police exercise their discretion to caution in accordance with guidelines issued by the Home Office and administer the vast majority of cautions without reference to the Crown Prosecution Service whose function is limited to advising the police on individual cases of difficulty.

Asil Nadir

35. Mr. Winnick: To ask the Attorney-General if he will make a statement on the latest position regarding legal proceedings against Asil Nadir.

The Attorney-General: Mr. Asil Nadir remains in northern Cyprus with which the United Kingdom does not have extradition arrangements. There is a warrant for his arrest should he return. Interpol has been notified.

War Crimes

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Attorney-General if he will make a statement about progress under the War Crimes Act 1991.

The Attorney-General: The Crown Prosecution Service is presently considering interim reports from the Metropolitan police relating to several individuals and further inquiries are being made. Inquiries are not yet complete and the question of possible prosecution cannot be considered until they are concluded. In accordance with the requirements of the War Crimes Act 1991, my consent would be sought in any case where the Crown Prosecution Service considers that proceedings are appropriate.

"Juliette"

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Attorney-General what prosecutions have been brought in connection with the publication of the book "Juliette" by the Marquis de Sade.

The Solicitor-General: No prosecutions have been brought.

HEALTH

Steroids

Mr. Hargreaves: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make a statement on the Medicines Control Agency's enforcement policy relating to the investigation of reports of the illegal sale or supply of anabolic steroids.

Mr. Sackville: It is the policy of the Medicines Control Agency to investigate all reports concerning the illegal sale or supply of all drugs including anabolic steroids and to take legal action where it is appropriate to do so.

Cigarettes

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make it her policy to collect statistics on the number of fires, fire deaths and fire injuries caused by cigarettes.

Mr. Sackville: Information on fires caused by smokers' materials is already collected and published in the Home Office statistics bulletins by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department. Copies of the bulletins are available in the Library.

Still Births

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research has been done into the causes of stillbirths in the last 10 years.

Mr. Sackville: The national perinatal epidemiology Unit—NPEU—which is recognised both nationally and internationally as a centre for research on maternity and perinatal services, is funded by the Department of Health through its research and development division—RDD. The NPEU's publication "Effective Care in Pregnancy and Childbirth" lists research carried out into many aspects of care during pregnancy including circumstances where stillbirth occurs. A copy is available in the Library.

The nationwide confidential inquiry into stillbirths and deaths in infancy is currently collecting its first full year of data. The first annual report on the work of the inquiry was published on 15 November 1993, a copy of which is available in the Library.

Hospital Administrators

Mr. Chisholm: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the Government's policy on (a) salary levels and (b) 1994 pay increases for top hospital administrators.

Dr. Mawhinney: National health service salaries are set at levels sufficient to recruit, retain and motivate staff of the right calibre within what is affordable. The Government are committed to delegating responsibility for pay to local managers within robust controls on total pay costs, and to establishing closer links between rewards and performance.

In 1994-95 pay increases will need to be funded from within efficiency improvements.

Treatment Activity

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if she will list for 1992-93 the number of beds and patient activity by broad specialty or departmental group;

(2) if she will list for 1992-93 the number of beds and patient activity per thousand population by broad specialty group.

Mr. Sackville: The information is shown in the table.

Hospital activity: Beds and finished consultant episodes

Specialty group	Available beds	Per 1,000 population	Finished consultant episodes	Per 1,000 population
All specialties	231,000	4·8	9,636,000	199·2
Acute	113,000	2·3	7,775,000	160·7
Geriatric	40,000	0·8	529,000	10·9
General and acute[1]	153,000	3·2	[1]7,770,000	160·6
Mental illness	47,000	1·0	234,000	4·8

Specialty group	Available beds	Per 1,000 population	Finished consultant episodes	Per 1,000 population
Mental handicap	18,000	0·4	56,000	1·2
Maternity	13,000	0·3	1,042,000	21·5

[1] Excludes "Well Babies", includes geriatric cases.

Hospital Waiting Lists

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if she will list by year for the last five years and this year to date and by (a) regional health authority and (b) district health authority (i) the average waiting times and (ii) the year-end waiting list for (y) out-patient and (z) in-patient treatment in ophthalmology;

(2) if she will list by year for the last five years and this year to date and by (a) regional health authority and (b) district health authority (i) the average waiting times and (ii) the year-end waiting list for (y) out-patient and (z) in-patient treatment in haematology;

(3) if she will list by year for the last five years and this year to date and by (a) regional health authority and (b) district health authority (i) the average waiting times and (ii) the year-end waiting list for (y) out-patient and (z) in-patient treatment in vascular surgery;

(4) if she will list by year for the last five years and this year to date and by (a) regional health authority and (b) district health authority (i) the average waiting times and (ii) the year-end waiting list for (y) out-patient and (z) in-patient treatment in ear, nose and throat;

(5) if she will list by year for the last five years and this year to date and by (a) regional health authority and (b) district health authority (i) the average waiting times and (ii) the year-end waiting list for (y) out-patient and (z) in-patient treatment in neonatology;

(6) if she will list by year for the last five years and this year to date and by (a) regional health authority and (b) district health authority (i) the average waiting times and (ii) the year-end waiting list for (y) out-patient and (z) in-patient treatment in urology;

(7) if she will list by year for the last five years and this year to date and by (a) regional health authority and (b) district health authority (i) the average waiting times and (ii) the year-end waiting list for (y) out-patient and (z) in-patient treatment in obstetrics;

(8) if she will list by year for the last five years and this year to date and by (a) regional health authority and (b) district health authority (i) the average waiting times and (ii) the year-end waiting list for (y) out-patient and (z) in-patient treatment in genito-urinary medicine;

(9) if she will list by year for the last five years and this year to date and by (a) regional health authority and (b) district health authority (i) the average waiting times and (ii) the year-end waiting list for (y) out-patient and (z) in-patient treatment in pain management;

(10) if she will list by year for the last five years and this year to date and by (a) regional health authority and (b) district health authority (i) the average waiting times and (ii) the year-end waiting list for (y) out-patient and (z) in-patient treatment in general surgery;

(11) if she will list by year for the last five years and this year to date and by (a) regional health authority and (b) district health authority (i) the average waiting times and (ii) the year-end waiting list for (y) out-patient and (z) in-patient treatment in dermatology;

(12) if she will list by year for the last five years and this year to date and by (a) regional health authority and (b) district health authority (i) the average waiting times and (ii) the year-end waiting list for (y) out-patient and (z) in-patient treatment in gynaecology;

(13) if she will list by year for the last five years and this year to date and by (a) regional health authority and (b) district health authority (i) the average waiting times and (ii) the year-end waiting list for (y) out-patient and (z) in-patient treatment in oral surgery;

(14) if she will list by year for the last five years and this year to date and by (a) regional health authority and (b) district health authority (i) the average waiting times and (ii) the year-end waiting list for (y) out-patient and (z) in-patient treatment in paediatrics;

(15) if she will list by year for the last five years and this year to date and by (a) regional health authority and (b) district health authority (i) the average waiting times and (ii) the year-end waiting list for (y) out-patient and (z) in-patient treatment in rheumatology;

(16) if she will list by year for the last five years and this year to date and by (a) regional health authority and (b) district health authority (i) the average waiting times and (ii) the year-end waiting list for (y) out-patient and (z) in-patient treatment in general practice maternity;

(17) if she will list by year for the last five years and this year to date and by (a) regional health authority and (b) district health authority (i) the average waiting times and (ii) the year-end waiting list for (y) out-patient and (z) in-patient treatment in general-geriatric medicine;

(18) if she will list by year for the last five years and this year to date and by (a) regional health authority and (b) district health authority (i) the average waiting times and (ii) the year-end waiting list for (y) out-patient and (z) in-patient treatment in endoscopies;

(19) if she will list by year for the last five years and this year to date and by (a) regional health authority and (b) district health authority (i) the average waiting times and (ii) the year-end waiting list for (y) out-patients and (z) in-patient treatment in (i) trauma and (ii) orthopaedics.

Dr. Mawhinney: Information on waiting times for out-patient treatment is not currently available centrally. The information available centrally on waiting times for in-patient treatment by district health authority and specialty is given in "Hospital Waiting List Statistics: England", published twice yearly since 1987. Copies are available in the Library.

Perinatal Epidemiology Unit

Mrs. Wise: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) when her Department will reach a decision about a new contract for the national perinatal epidemiology unit; how this will take account of the recommendation by the second report of the Health Select Committee of Session 1991-92, on "Maternity Services", HC 29, that funding be guaranteed for sufficient time to ensure the recruitment and retention for the NPEU of high quality staff;

(2) what steps her Department is taking to set in train the recruitment of a new director of the national perinatal epidemiology unit.

Mr. Sackville: The Department's director of research and development wrote to the national perinatal epidemiology unit—NEPU—on 24 November, stating that he had started discussions with Sir David Weatherall, Regius Professor of Medicine at the university of Oxford, about the appointment of a new director of the NPEU. The firm expectation following this is that the Department will let a new contract with the university of Oxford in regard to the NPEU.

The Department fully intends to follow the recommendation by the second report of the Health Select Committee of Session 1991-92, on maternity services, HC 29.

Low-income Scheme

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the review into the health benefits—low-income—scheme was begun; when it was ended; and when its conclusions will be made public.

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many AG1 forms are administered each year; and how much per form is spent on administration.

Dr. Mawhinney: The review was announced to Parliament on 22 May 1991, Official Report, column 530. Since then, a number of internal measures to improve operational efficiency have been implemented, including the transfer of the responsibility for operating the scheme to the Prescription Pricing Authority, a special health authority within the national health service. Other proposals remain under consideration including those resulting from an examination of forms and leaflets. Any changes to the scheme itself will be announced if and when it is agreed that they should be implemented. The NHS low-income scheme remains an essential part of Government policy ensuring that only those who can afford to pay NHS charges are required to do so. In 1992-93, 1·129 million claims to the scheme were processed at an average administrative cost of £6·30 per claim.

Sir David Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what procedures are in place to allow immediate payment for emergency dental treatment for those on low incomes.

Dr. Mawhinney: Recipients of income support, family credit, or holders of national health service low-income scheme AG2 certificates for full remission of NHS charges do not pay for NHS dental treatment. Remission certificates are valid for a period of six months and may be sought as a protection by those on a low income before the need for treatment arises. These arrangements ensure that those who cannot afford to contribute towards the cost of dental services should not be deterred from seeking treatment at any time.

Pharmacies

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the latest figure of average population per pharmacy in each EC country.

Dr. Mawhinney: The latest available information is contained in the reply I gave the hon. Member on 6 May 1993 at column 221.

General Practitioners

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the average earnings of general practitioners, broken down by the smallest available geographical area.

Dr. Mawhinney: Information about the geographical distribution of general practitioners' earnings is not available. The intended average net income for an unrestricted principal providing general medical services in Great Britain in 1993-94 is £40,610. Payments for achieving higher levels of coverage for childhood immunisations and cervical screening, and for administering Hib meningitis vaccine are made in addition. These are currently estimated to add £3,200 to the average GP's remuneration in 1993-94.

Footwear

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate she has made of the cost to the national health service of treating patients with problems that could have been prevented by healthy footwear.

Mr. Sackville: None.

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidance has been issued by her Department in relation to children's footwear.

Mr. Sackville: The Health Education Authority's publication "Birth to Five", copies of which are available in the Library, includes a section on feet and first shoes. The book is given free to all first-time mothers in England.

Geriatric Care

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what are the latest available figures for the numbers of geriatric (a) units, (b) beds and (c) consultants;

(2) what plans she has to increase the number of geriatric units, beds and consultants.

Mr. Bowis: The provision of such facilities and services are a matter for local health authorities who have the responsibility for assessing and meeting local health needs.

Specialist Consultants

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment she has made of the correlation between the degree of specialisation of consultants and the levels of morbidity and mortality in their patients following treatment.

Mr. Sackville: Confidential audit work supported by the Department of Health, and international studies, indicate that consultants with specialist skills and experience achieve better outcomes, bearing in mind that specialised consultants may need to deal with more complex problems.

Breast Screening

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list for each year since 1989-90 the percentage of women invited for breast screening who attended, by regional health authority.

Mr. Sackville: The breast screening programme is achieving its average uptake target rate of 70 per cent. We do not have central statistics for 1990-91 but unvalidated data are available from the national health service breast screening programme. Validated central figures are currently available only for the year 1991-92. Both are shown in the table.

Regional Health Authority	Percentage uptake rate 1990-91	1991-92
England	71	71
Northern	75	75
Yorkshire	68	74
Trent	76	77
East Anglian	74	81
North West Thames	60	58
North East Thames	60	61
South East Thames	70	71
South West Thames	70	67
Wessex	76	78
Oxford	81	77
South Western	69	74
West Midlands	69	72
Mersey	73	69
North Western	74	73

Health Authorities

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Health which health authorities and trusts have chief executives who are foreign nationals.

Dr. Mawhinney: This information is not available centrally.

Suicides

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what targets she has set to decrease the suicide rate.

Mr. Bowis: I refer the hon. Member to "The Health of the Nation, A Strategy for Health in England", Cm 1986, published in July 1992.

Perioperative Death

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans she has to ensure that all consultants who could take part in the national confidential inquiry into perioperative death are required to do so.

Mr. Sackville: We strongly support the participation of all clinicians in medical audit and in national confidential inquiries, but to be effective we believe that this must be done on a voluntary basis. All surgeons and anaesthetists are encouraged by their respective royal colleges to take part in the national confidential inquiry into perioperative deaths.

Physicians

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the latest figure for the number of practising physicians per 1,000 of population in each EC country.

Dr. Mawhinney: As at 30 September 1992, there were 1·6 practising physicians per 1,000 of population in England. Information relating to Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland are matters for my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Wales and Scotland and my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland. Equivalent information for other European Community countries is not available.

Consultants' Hours

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the latest figures available for the number of hours consultants worked per week, on their feet, on call and total.

Dr. Mawhinney: This information is not available centrally.

NHS Charges

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list all the items for which recipients are charged in the NHS and give the amounts raised in each category.

Dr. Mawhinney: The available information is shown in the table.

Charged National Health Service items and revenue from charges in England 1992-93

Service	Charge Revenue (£ million)
Family Health Services Prescriptions	242·0
Family Health Services Dental Treatment	394·8

All NHS sight tests are free of charge. People who are entitled to help with the cost of spectacles receive this in the form of a spectacle voucher; the sale of spectacles is always a private transaction between patient and practitioner, even when an NHS voucher is used. Information about hospital prescriptions, the hospital eye service, and hospital orthotic services is not available centrally.

Hepatitis B

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what have been the results of her Department's investigations into the case of a young mother who contracted hepatitis B while undergoing a caesarian operation at Whipps Cross hospital, Leyton; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Sackville: An investigation is being carried out jointly by Forest healthcare national health service trust and Redbridge and Waltham Forest health authority with advice from the communicable disease surveillance centre. The hon. Member may wish to contact Lord Jenkin of Roding, the trust chairman, for details.

NHS Trusts

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list the turnover of each NHS trust.

Dr. Mawhinney: The total income of first and second wave trusts in England for 1992-93 will be placed in the Library.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how the start-up grant for NHS trusts is calculated;

(2) what guidance she has issued to shadow NHS trusts on the use of their start-up grants.

Dr. Mawhinney: The amount allocated for top-sliced funding to meet start-up costs is divided on an equal basis between successful trusts in each wave. The uses towards which start-up costs may be put are set out in letters from the national health service management executive notifying the shadow trust of the amount to be allocated.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many trusts (a) met and (b) failed to achieve a 6 per cent. return on assets.

Dr. Mawhinney: According to 1992-93 annual accounts 106 national health service trusts have made a pre-interest rate of return of 6 per cent. or greater. Fifty NHS trusts have made a pre-interest rate of return of less than 6 per cent. The rate of return is calculated as the percentage that operating surplus bears to the average relevant net assets.

NHS Staff

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list the number of NHS staff employed in each region for each of the last four years.

Dr. Mawhinney: The requested information is shown in the table.

National health service staff employed in each region (whole-time equivalents)

	1989	1990	1991	1992
Northern	53,610	52,970	53,110	51,800

England total	787,170	788,140	794,280	789,990

Notes:

1. Some totals for 1990 and 1991 differ from those given in my reply on 20 November 1992 at column 435 where the medical and dental figures were at that time provisional and have now been revised.
2. The validation of the 1992 data for ambulance staff uncovered an error in the statistics for ambulance staff in Northern region in 1991. The error has been corrected in this table and so staff totals for 1991 differ from figures previously published.
3. "SHAs and others" includes those in special health authorities, family health services authorities and other statutory authorities. Staff in special hospitals are included in "SHAs and others" from 1991 onwards.
4. The total number of staff given includes both medical and non-medical staff but excludes locum doctors and agency nurses.
5. All figures are independently rounded to the nearest 10 whole-time equivalents.
6. Whole-time equivalents are calculated by aggregating the total number of hours worked by staff in a grade and dividing by the standard hours for that grade. In this way, numbers of part-time staff are converted into an equivalent number of whole-time staff.

Influenza Vaccine

Mr. Dover: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps she has taken to ensure that adequate supplies of influenza vaccine are being made available to doctors in (a) the north-western region and (b) Chorley.

Mr. Sackville: The Department has kept in close touch with influenza vaccine manufacturers who are producing additional supplies to replace those which did not gain a licence. The manufacturers have said that they intend to complete delivery of all outstanding orders no later than 7 December.

Bromley DHA

Mr. Dowd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how much of the HIV/AIDS funds was ring-fenced for Bromley district health authority for 1991-92 and 1992-93; and if the relevant accounts have been published and audited;

(2) what are the South East Thames regional health authority South East Thames regional health authority HIV/AIDS funds budgets for each year since 1991-92; and what proportion of the SETRHA HIV/AIDS funds went to each of the district health authorities;

(3) when the 1991-92 and 1992-93 Bromley district health authority's overall accounts were published and audited.

Mr. Sackville: The information requested has been published in the AIDS (Control) Act reports for South East Thames regional health authority, copies of which have been placed in the Library. The external auditor certified the accounts of Bromley health authority on 30 October 1992 and 29 October 1993 for the financial years 1991-92 and 1992-93 respectively. The accounts are made publicly available following the audit certification.

Mr. Dowd: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the names of the members of Bromley district health authority.

Dr. Mawhinney: The chairmanship of Bromley health authority is vacant due to the recent death of Mr. Alan Cumming.

At the next meeting of the district health authority on 14 December, the members will select an acting chairman from among the non-executive members.

The non-executive members are Mr. C. Ilsley, Mrs. E. Giles, Ms M. Theobald and Dr. R. Kirby.

The executive members are Ms C. Perry, Mr. P. Lloyd, Mr. K. Barton, Mr. R. Lorimer and Dr. J. Spilby.

Domiciliary Care

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what steps are being taken to monitor the impact of the requirement to spend 85 per cent. of the special transitional grant in the independent sector on domiciliary care; and if she will make a statement;

(2) what mechanisms exist to monitor local authorities' compliance with the requirement to spend 85 per cent. of the special transitional grant for domiciliary care in the independent sector.

Mr. Bowis: Prior to 1993, all the resources transferred from the Department of Social Security to social services departments, via the community care transitional grant, went to the independent sectors. Local authorities are required to spend at least 85 per cent. of the social security transfer element of the special transitional grant on independent sector community care services. We have established an extensive programme of monitoring and evaluation which is considering all the key aspects of the implementation of the community care reforms. The district audit service will verify compliance with the requirement.

District Health Authorities

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will provide a table showing those district health authorities that are over their capitation targets indicating (a) the percentage that they are over capitation and (b) the cash amount that this represents of current budgets.

Dr. Mawhinney: The information for 1993-94 has been placed in the Library.

General Practitioners

Mrs. Jane Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many general practitioners' surgeries there are in Liverpool, South Sefton, Knowsley and St. Helens and Wirral health authorities; how many of these are single general practitioner's practices; and what is the average list size of practices in each authority.

Dr. Mawhinney: The information is shown in the table.

Family health services authority	Number of practices	Number of single handed practices	Average list size
Liverpool	103	41	2,041
Sefton	55	21	2,010
St. Helens and Knowsley	77	26	2,034
Wirral	68	17	1,874

The data relate to April 1993.

The practice information provided relates to the number of partnerships. Some of these partnerships may practise from more than one surgery.

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many general practitioners have moved from working outside London to inner London under the provisions of "Making London Better".

Dr. Mawhinney: Data are not available centrally showing the movement of general practitioners from one family health services authority to another. It is too early to assess the impact of "Making London Better" on GP manpower. Available information on the numbers of unrestricted GPs in the 12 complete FHSAs which fall wholly or partly within the London initiative zone as at 1 April 1993 is shown in the table:

FHSA	Unrestricted GPs
Brent and Harrow	272
Ealing, Hammersmith and Hounslow	372
Kensington, Chelsea and Westminster	189
Barking and Havering	182
Camden and Islington	218
City and East London	355
Enfield and Haringey	277
Redbridge and Waltham Forest	225
Greenwich and Bexley	213
Lambeth, Southwark and Lewisham	419
Croydon	160
Merton, Sutton and Wandsworth	323
TOTAL	3,205

Sight Tests

Dame Jill Knight: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information she has concerning the costs to optometrists of carrying out a GOS sight test in 1992; and what was the GOS sight test fee paid to optometrists for the corresponding period.

Dr. Mawhinney: The Department has recently received a report commissioned by the staff side of Whitley committee C in support of their claim for an increase in the level of the national health service sight test fee. This report, which we are now studying, suggests that optometrists' unit costs in 1992 were £18·42 per sight test. The NHS sight test fee was £12·75 in 1992.

Emergency Admissions

Mrs. Jane Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many emergency admissions have been made through accident and emergency units at the Royal Liverpool university hospital, Broadgreen hospital, Fazakerley hospital, and Whiston hospital during (a) April 1992 to April 1993 and (b) April 1993 to date.

Mr. Sackville: This information is not available centrally. The hon. Member may wish to contact the chairmen of the relevant national health service trusts for details.

Registered Homes

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many appeals to registered homes tribunals have been heard in each year since the implementation of the Registered Homes Act 1984, and what were (a) the categories of case/section of the Act which appellants appeared, (b) whether the hearings concerned care, nursing homes, or joint registered homes and (c) the outcome of hearings.

Mr. Bowis: The numbers of appeals heard by registered homes tribunals in each year since they began to operate in 1985 were:

	Number
1985	11
1986	36
1987	26
1988	30
1989	25
1990	26
1991	32
1992	33

The further information requested by the hon. Member could only be provided at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many registered homes have been deregistered since the implementation of the Registered Homes Act 1984; in each year how many of those were (a) charitable or not-for-profit homes, (b) private care homes, (c) private nursing homes and (d) joint registration homes; and under which provisions of the Act the deregistration took place.

Mr. Bowis: The Department does not hold information about the numbers of homes which have been deregistered.

Oxendon House

Mr. Madel: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what discussions her Department has had with Bedfordshire county council about the future of Oxenden house, Leighton Buzzard, Bedfordshire; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Bowis [pursuant to his reply, 25 November 1993, c. 136]: I regret that there was an error in my previous reply which should have read:

"The Department has been kept informed about recent developments in relation to Bedfordshire county council's children's home, Oxendon house. I understand that the acting principal of the home has been arrested by the police and that four other members of staff have been suspended. Following advice from the social services inspectorate, the county council is conducting an investigation into allegations of inappropriate therapies and restraint techniques and the general culture of the home. Meanwhile the home has been closed, the children relocated and 45 members of staff have been given leave of absence.

The social services inspectorate is continuing to monitor the situation."

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Non-governmental Organisations

38. Mr. Soley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what percentage of the United Kingdom aid budget the Government plan to give to non-governmental organisations in the next two years.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The policy of enhancing the role that NGOs play in delivering our aid will continue. I cannot anticipate the public expenditure plans that will be announced tomorrow.

43. Mr. Bates: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how the Overseas Development Administration is supporting the work of non-governmental organisations in helping to meet the long-term needs of the poorest communities in developing countries.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: In 1992-93 the ODA gave grants totalling over £77 million to support the long-term development programmes of British non-governmental organisations in their efforts to alleviate poverty among the poorest groups in developing countries.

Aid Spending

41. Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many representations have been received by his Department urging him to increase aid spending to 0·7 per cent. of national income.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Many hon. Members have written to Ministers.

Bosnia

42. Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what measures are being taken by Her Majesty's Government to help the victims of the war in Bosnia during the winter.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The Government have committed over £152 million for aid to victims of the conflict in the former Yugoslavia. We also contribute substantially to the Sarajevo airlift and through our 2,300 troop contribution to the United Nations protection forces.

Burundi

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what estimate he has received of the number of refugees from Burundi into neighbouring countries.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: According to latest estimates we have received from the United Nations, a total of some 700,000 refugees have fled Burundi—including 375,000 into Rwanda, 245,000 into Tanzania and 50,000 in Zaire.

World Bank (Loans)

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what evaluation studies have been undertaken by the Overseas Development Administration of the impact and effectiveness of World bank project loans and structural adjustment programmes; which non-governmental organisations have been consulted in these studies; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what evaluation studies have been done by the Overseas Development Administration of World bank project loans and structural adjustment programmes; which non-governmental oganisations were consulted; and what measures are being taken to forward these reports to the Foreign Affairs Select Committee or the executive director of the World bank.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Evaluations of completed World bank projects are the responsibility of the bank's independent operations evaluation department. Summaries of evaluation reports will be among the expanded list of documents to be made publicly available under the bank's revised disclosure of information policy.

The ODA has produced a number of evaluations where we have co-financed with the bank. Details of how reports or summaries can be obtained are set out in ODA's "Catalogue of Evaluation Studies", a copy of which has been placed in the Library of the House.

World Bank Projects

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what evaluations were made of the environmental effects and effects on indigenous peoples of the World bank-funded Pangue dam project in Chile by the Overseas Development Administration; what were the results; what guidance was given to the United Kingdom executive director of the World bank as to voting on the project; and how the United Kingdom executive director voted;

(2) what evaluations were conducted by the Overseas Development Administration concerning the displacement effects of the World bank's Daguangba Hainan project in China; what were the results; which local groups were consulted; what guidance was given to the United Kingdom executive director as to voting; and how the United Kingdom executive director voted;

(3) what studies were conducted by the Overseas Development Administration on the environmental effects of the World bank-funded National Thermal Power Corporation's project in India; what were the results; which groups were consulted; what guidance was given to the United Kingdom executive director of the World bank as to voting on the issue; and how the United Kingdom executive director voted;

(4) what environmental studies were conducted on the Kureimat thermal power plant in Egypt by the Overseas Development Administration; what were the results of any such study; which groups were consulted in the evaluation; what advice was given to the United Kingdom executive director of the World bank as to voting on the issue; and how the United Kingdom executive director voted;

(5) what studies were conducted of social consequences and displacement of population by the Overseas Development Administration on the Ertan hydroelectric plant in China; what were the results of any such study; which local groups were consulted; what guidance on voting in respect of the plant was given to the United Kingdom executive director of the World bank; and how the United Kingdom executive director voted.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: ODA does not commission studies of individual project proposals presented to the World bank's board of directors for approval except where we are considering co-financing. This has not arisen in the cases specified.

Project appraisal reports and such supporting documents as summary environmental assessments which are sent to the board are reviewed by our executive director's office and, on a selective basis—mainly adjustment operations or environmentally sensitive projects—within ODA. Comments received from time to time from interested NGOs are taken into account. It is not our practice to reveal instructions to our executive director, nor to disclose the position he takes in board discussions, the proceedings of which are confidential.

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what were the results of the World bank studies of the Narmada dam project in India initiated at the time that the loan was cancelled.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: A number of environmental and hydrological studies which were initiated before cancellation of the balance of the bank loan for the Sardar Sarovar dam project in the Narmada valley, India, were financed under a technical assistance grant from ODA to the bank. The Indian authorities have recently agreed that these reports can be made available publicly. A set of the reports is being placed in the Library of the House. We have not yet seen other studies arising from the action programme agreed between the Indian authorities and the bank in October 1992.

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what World bank projects are currently being evaluated by the Overseas Development Administration; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: ODA's evaluation unit is not currently undertaking any evaluation of completed bank projects.

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what studies have been conducted by (a) the Overseas Development Administration and (b) the World bank on the Pak Mun World bank project; what were the results of such studies; which social and environmental experts from the area were consulted; what advice was given to the United Kingdom executive director of the World bank in respect of voting on the project; and how the United Kingdom executive director voted.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We have not commissioned any studies of this project. When the World bank's board approved the loan in December 1991, we asked the bank to undertake a mid-term review given the concerns expressed at the time about the environmental impact and resettlement aspects of the project. The board is currently considering the report of a bank mission which concluded that the Thai authorities were complying with agreements reached with the bank on the resettlement and environmental aspects of the project, although much more needed to be done to improve communications with the affected population and NGOs.

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if the United Kingdom executive director of the World bank will be attending the non-governmental organisations meeting in Washington on 19 November concerning the environmental impact of the Pak Mun project in Thailand; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Our executive director was represented at the briefing meeting held in Washington on 19 November when presentations were made by a Thai NGO and academics about the potential environmental impact of the Pak Mun dam.

Energy Efficiency

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proposals the United Kingdom executive director has made to the World bank to ensure that energy efficiency should be encouraged in developing countries rather than increasing the number of power plants.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Our executive director played a full part in board discussion of a bank policy paper on energy efficiency and conservation in 1992. The report on the 10th replenishment of the International Development Association—IDA-10—which was approved by the board in January 1993, noted the importance of promoting end-use energy efficiency alongside increases in supply. It also underlined the need for IDA to expand its least cost planning analysis to take account of both demand side and alternative supply side options employing proven technologies in energy conservation and renewable energy sources.

Policy Information Markers

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs in what are the policy information markers going to consist; and when they will be established.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The Overseas Development Administration's policy information marker system—PIMS—has been operational since 1 October 1993. It is a computer based system which allows ODA's commitments of aid to be marked against one or more of 19 policy markers. The markers include ODA's seven priority objectives already announced by my right hon. and noble Friend the Minister for Overseas Development in her speech at the Royal Institute of International Affairs on 18 October. PIMS will provide a means of closer monitoring of ODA's performance against the objectives set for the aid programme.

Initial data from PIMS will appear in the ODA section of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office departmental report 1994.

Russia

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what evaluations his Department has conducted of the quality of World bank lending to Russia; and what has been the level of lending in each of the last three years.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: World bank lending to Russia began in August 1992 with a $600 million rehabilitation loan. In the bank's fiscal year ended June 1993—FY93—commitments totalled $760 million. Approvals in the current year—FY94—include a $610 million loan to the oil sector.

Further details of the bank's activities are contained in its 1993 annual report, copies of which are available in the Library of the House.

It is too early to assess the impact of bank lending to Russia, but we have been impressed by the preparatory work they have undertaken in support of its lending programme.

Arun-3 Project

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what studies of the social and environmental effects of the Arun-3 project in Nepal have been conducted by the Overseas Development Administration; what were the results and which groups in Nepal were consulted; and what is the current status of the project.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: ODA has made no bilateral financial commitment to the Arun-3 dam project in Nepal, and has commissioned no studies. The Nepalese authorities have prepared an environmental assessment. The World bank, together with other co-financiers, initiated its appraisal of the project in May; and has stated that it intends to disseminate information about the project to NGOs and other interested parties to facilitate informed discussion.

Soviet Union

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what support the ODA has given recently to humanitarian crises in the emerging countries of the former Soviet Union.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Over the last two years we have provided over £8 million in humanitarian assistance to countries of the former Soviet Union. Details are as follows:

Bilateral aid — £'000s

	Financial year 1992-93 (expenditure)	Financial year 1993-94 (commitments to date)
Armenia	227	270
Azerbaijan (Inc. Nagorno-Karabakh)	533	1,541
Georgia	498	456
Khazakhstan	—	33
Kyrgyzstan	27	67
Russian Federation	475	—
Tajikistan	100	140
Ukraine	—	24
TOTAL	1,860	2,531

United Kingdom share of EC aid — £'000s

	Calendar 1992	Calendar 1993 (to date)
Armenia	182	768
Azerbaijan	182	1,088
Georgia	—	934
Russian Federation	—	64
Tajikistan	97	576
TOTAL	461	3,430

Cyprus

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has as to the per capita income of Greek Cypriots living in southern Cyprus; and what considerations underlie the giving of United Kingdom aid to Cyprus.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Information on the per capita income of the two communities in Cyprus is not available. The figure for Cyprus as a whole was $8,640 in 1991. The considerations underlying our small aid programme to Cyprus are our historical relationship and an even-handed approach towards both communities.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Official Information

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will list the statutory provisions which (a) restrict the disclosure of official information and (b) provide legal rights of access to official information.

Mr. Waldegrave: A list of some 200 statutory provisions which have been identified as restricting the disclosure of official information can be found in the "Open Government" White Paper—Cm 2290—published earlier this year.

Statutory provisions which provide legal rights of access include: the Data Protection Act 1984; the Access to Personal Files Act 1987; the Education Reform Act 1988; the Access to Medical Reports Act 1988; the Access to Health Records Act 1990; the Local Government (Access to Information) Act 1985; the Health Service Joint Consultative Committees (Access to Information) Act 1986; the Community Health Councils (Access to Information) Act 1988; the Environmental Information Regulations 1992; and the Education (School Records) Regulations 1989.

Official Hospitality

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what has been the amount spent on official hospitality by each Department, including the Prime Minister's Office, for each year since 1979.

Mr. Waldegrave: The expenditure on official hospitality by those Departments for which I have responsibility is as follows:

	OPSS £	COI £
1984-85	17,618	3,911
1985-86	45,707	4,121
1986-87	26,595	4,802
1987-88	13,314	4,499
1988-89	29,775	2,895
1989-90	37,276	3,267
1990-91	32,689	530
1991-92	48,642	3,187
1992-93	45,154	3,042

The figures for Office of Public Service and Science include expenditure by the Prime Minister's Office. In addition to the amount shown under OPSS for 1991-92, a further £234,126 was spent in that year in respect of official hospitality for the 1991 economic summit.

Expenditure by HMSO on official hospitality in 1992 was £15,984. Figures for hospitality were not recorded centrally by HMSO before 1992.

Expenditure records prior to financial year 1984-85 do not provide information in the form requested.

Scott Inquiry

Mr. Gunnell: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what instructions have been given to Departments of State concerning requests to them from the Scott inquiry for confidential documentary material.

Mr. Waldegrave: Departments have been instructed to make available to Lord Justice Scott's inquiry all material upon request, irrespective of classification, and have not been issued with specific instructions concerning requests for classified material.

Magistrates

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how many magistrates in Lancashire have resigned this year citing as a reason dissatisfaction with the Government's policies on the administration of justice.

Mr. Waldegrave: The total number of resignations in Lancashire this year, less those retiring for reasons of age, has been 40. Only a small proportion of these have given dissatisfaction with the administration of justice as a reason for their resignation.

British Geological Survey Laboratory

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (1) what consultations he has had with the chairman of the Natural Environment Research Council concerning the proposed closure of the British geological survey laboratory and office, Aberystwyth;

(2) what consultations he has had with the quarrying, mining, civil engineering and academic research interests in Wales concerning the proposed closure of the British geological survey laboratory and office, Aberystwyth;

(3) what representations he has received in relation to the proposed closure of the British geological survey laboratory and office, Aberystwyth; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: These are matters for the British geological survey—BGS—and the Natural Environment Research Council—NERC—of which the BGS is a constituent part. I have received no representations.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Brussels

Mr. Allen: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will consider proposals for hon. Members to be allowed to visit Brussels more than once each year on parliamentary business up to the maximum of the overall allocated budget; and if he will make a comment.

Mr. Newton: I have no plans to do so.

Parliamentary Broadcasting

Mr. Allen: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will propose to the Select Committee on Broadcasting that the Central Office of Information should supply the live television feed for hon. Members in their offices.

Mr. Newton: No purpose would be served by my placing this matter before the Broadcasting Committee at this juncture. As I have explained in my previous answers to the hon. Gentleman's questions, the factors influencing the time scale within which Members can be supplied with the clean feed in their offices are the complexity and cost of the comprehensive cabling exercise involved and their relationship to decisions yet to be taken by the House on the proposed parliamentary data and video network. This remains the case whatever agency or organisation might eventually be employed to carry out the necessary work.

Child Care

Mr. Steen: To ask the Chairman of the Administration Committee what is the cost to public funds for arranging for a comprehensive survey of potential demand for a parliamentary child care facility; how much Research Services Ltd. is being paid to prepare a questionnaire; to how many people the questionnaire has been sent; and when he hopes to make a statement as to the conclusions.

Mr. Michael J. Martin: Following deliberations in the Administration Committee, the Department of Finance and Administration commissioned the preparation and circulation of the questionnaire on parliamentary child care facilities to some 4,100 recipients who work in the parliamentary estate. The Committee expects to report the results of the suvey to the House of Commons Commission early in the new year. For reasons of commercial confidentiality it is not appropriate to publish the cost of the exercise.

Vote Bundle

Mr. Allen: To ask the Chairman of the Administration Committee if his Committee will send a questionnaire to hon. Members about the Vote bundle to ascertain what use hon. Members make of the Vote bundle, what ideas they may have for improving the service and what suggestions they have for reducing the amount of public money currently spent on the bundle.

Mr. Michael J. Martin: As I mentioned in reply to my hon. Friend's similar question on this matter on 3 November in the last session of Parliament at column 198, the form and content of the Vote bundle remain under review by the Committee. I therefore see no reason for any survey of the kind suggested. Members are, however, always free to submit specific suggestions to the Committee.

Note Taking

Mr. Allen: To ask the Chairman of the Administration Committee what are the current restrictions applied to note taking in the Strangers' Gallery.

Mr. Michael J. Martin: The Administration Committee has agreed for an experimental period of six months that the taking of informal notes of the proceedings of the House for personal purposes should be allowed in the Strangers' Gallery. These arrangements will not extend to any kind of formal reporting from that Gallery, for which the current prohibition will remain.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Disability Working Allowance

Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many current awards of disability working allowance there are; what is the total number of claims for disability working allowance received in the last six months for which statistics are available; how many claims were adjudicated upon in those six months; what proportion of those claims adjudicated in the last six months resulted in an award; and what were the reasons for unsuccessful claims with numbers and percentage for each ground for disallowance.

Mr. Scott: As of 31 October 1993 there were 3,176 current awards of disability working allowance.

The total number of claims for DWA in May to October 1993 was:

	Number
New claims	4,688
Repeat claims	2,256
Total	6,944

The number of claims adjudicated upon in the last six months is 6,547.

The proportion of adjudicated claims which resulted in an award is 54·06 per cent.

The reasons for unsuccessful claims with numbers and percentages for each ground for disallowance in the last six months are in the table.

Reason	Number	Percentage
Capital exceeds £16,000	8	0·26
Not in remunerative work	1,108	36·83
Income exceeds DWA level	443	14·73
No qualifying benefit	1,264	42·02
Disability test	4	0·14
Other reasons	181	6·02

Mr. Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people are currently claiming disability working allowance; what is the average payment to a person receiving disability working allowance; and how many people were expected to receive disability working allowance at any one time when it was launched.

Mr. Scott: There are 3,176 people currently in receipt of disability working allowance. The average payment for October 1993 was £40·63. Our original estimate was that once the benefit was fully established about 50,000 people might be entitled to disability working allowance based on the surveys of disabled people carried out by the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys.

Pensions Law Review Committee

Mr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the cost of producing and printing the report of the Pensions Law Review Committee under the chairmanship of Professor Roy Goode.

Mr. Hague: The Pensions Law Review Committee—PLRC—report was published as two separate volumes. The cost, which was met by this Department, of producing these volumes to final art work was £73,375. As a priced publication, the printing costs of £42,737 were borne by HMSO and will be recovered from sales via HMSO.

In addition, a summary version of volume one of the report was produced at a cost of £18,640 and copies of the summary are available free of charge.

Lone Parents

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many (a) lone mothers and (b) lone fathers were in receipt of social security benefits by type in (i) Lancashire and (ii) the Burnley, Pendle and Rossendale Benefits Agency district in each year since 1987.

Mr. Burt: The information is not available in the form requested.

Benefit Fraud

Sir Thomas Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his latest estimate of the extent of benefit fraud.

Mr. Hague: The full extent of social security fraud is not know but ways of producing statistical estimates are being considered by the Benefits Agency. Last year the Benefits Agency caught over 270,000 people defrauding the system which resulted in benefit savings of £558 million.

Maintenance

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the income ceiling at which an absent parent, having met the maintenance payment at 50p in the pound, no longer has to contribute at 25p in the pound.

Mr. Burt: The 25 per cent. rate of deduction from assessable income, which applies to income left after the absent parent has met the basic maintenance requirement, applies until a maximum amount is reached. For each child, the maximum additional amount is equivalent to three times the total of the income support personal allowance for the child plus the income support family premium.

The parent with care of the children may apply to the courts for additional maintenance once the maximum is reached.

Overseas Visits

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many visits abroad he has made during 1993; and what was (a) the cost to public funds and (b) the purpose of each visit.

Mr. Hague: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made two trips abroad on departmental business during 1993. The details are in the table.

Event	Cost to public funds
World Economic Forum	735·00
Meeting with Mme. Veil (the senior French Minister for Social Affairs) in Paris	165·00

Suicide

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) how many suicides he has estimated have occurred in the last five years as a result of decisions taken by his Department about benefit entitlement;

(2) if he will commission research to establish whether the rate of incidence of suicides is higher among those on benefits and whether suicides have been caused by his Department's benefit decisions.

Mr. Scott: Information on the reasons for suicides is not collected. There are no plans to commission research on the rate of suicides among people receiving social security benefits.

Invalidity Benefit

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his estimate of the total sum of money being withheld from women as a result of the suspension of payment of the increased award for invalidity benefit, pending the result of the court case concerning Council directive (EEC) 79/7.

Mr. Scott: Benefits Agency records show that around 30,000 women are having increased benefit suspended pending the outcome of this case. Statistics concerning the amount of money involved are not routinely kept and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Income Support

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what it would cost to introduce a £5 and £10 disregard on income support for parents with care in receipt of maintenance from an absent parent for a child or children but still receiving income support assuming that this involved (a) one third, (b) one half or (c) two thirds of lone parents on income support.

Mr. Burt: The latest estimates in costs are in the table.

Cost £ million	Cost of (a)	Cost of (b)	Cost of (c)
£5 disregard	90	130	170
£10 disregard	170	260	350

Notes:

1. Estimates are based on the number of lone parents in receipt of income support as at February 1993.
2. Costs given are full year costs and rounded to the nearest £10 million.

SCOTLAND

Civil Servants

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list for each civil service grade in his Department (a) the total number of persons employed and (b) the total number of women employed.

Mr. Lang: The number of staff and the number of women in post in the Scottish Office and associated departments as at 1 October 1993—but excluding the Scottish prison service—are shown by grade equivalent in the table:

Grade (and equivalents)	Women	Total Staff

Industrial Staff	18	491
TOTAL	2,877	6,858

Equal Opportunities

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether his Department operates an equal opportunities policy of recruitment to all departments for which he has responsibility.

Mr. Lang: Yes. In common with other civil service employers my departments and agencies have in place equal opportunities policies based on the principle of fair and open competition for recruitment.

Nursery Education

Mr. McFall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many and what percentage of children aged three and four years were in receipt of nursery education in each region and islands area of Scotland in each school year from 1978-79.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The information is set out in the table. The numbers of three and four-year-old pupils shown are those attending education authority nursery schools and departments as at September in each school year. The percentages shown are based on the relevant mid-year estimate of the three and four-year-old population.

Revenue Support Grant

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a table showing the amount of revenue support grant allocated to each district council in Scotland in the current financial year on a per capita basis; if he will explain the formulae applied in calculation of these grants; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stewart: The information requested is set out in the table. An explanation of how the amount of RSG payable to each authority in 1993-94 was determined is set out in the report to the Local Government Finance (Scotland) Order 1993, copies of which are in the Library.

Johnstone

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will visit the town of Johnstone to evaluate the need for a generation strategy similar to that in place in Barrhead.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The method of selecting areas for regeneration initiatives is one of the issues raised in the consultation document "Progress in Partnership" which my right hon. Friend and I published on 4 October. We look forward to receiving responses by the deadline of 14 January 1994.

Public Appointments

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list each of the sources his Department uses for names from which to make appointments to non-departmental public bodies.

Mr. Lang: As can be seen from the current edition of "Public Bodies", copies of which are available in the Libraries of the House, I make appointments to more than 160 different non-departmental public bodies which differ widely in nature and remit. The sources of names for appointment are equally diverse. I am always pleased to receive names for public appointment from any source.

Civil Servants (Dismissal)

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his policy on the grounds for summary dismissal of civil servants in each Department.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 25 November 1993]: It is Scottish Office policy to dismiss staff only after agreed internal procedures have been followed and, in serious disciplinary cases, after a full investigation of the circumstances has taken place. Where appropriate, staff may be suspended from duty while these investigations are being carried out.

PRIME MINISTER

Overseas Visits

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Prime Minister how many visits abroad he has made during 1993; and what was (a) the cost of each visit to public funds and (b) the purpose of each visit.

The Prime Minister: I have made 11 overseas visits involving 16 countries. The cost and purpose of each visit was as follows:

Destination	1993	Purpose	Cost £
India	23-28 January	Republic Day celebrations	179,512·00
Oman	28 January	Bilateral

[1] Costs also include those of the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs.

Official Residences

Mr. Dowd: To ask the Prime Minister (1) what was the last year's annual fuel bill for each of the official residences at his disposal; and out of which Government budget they were paid;

(2) if he will list the official residences at his disposal for the use of Ministers in the Government.

The Prime Minister: Fuel costs at Chequers, Dorneywood and Chevening are met by independently administered trusts. The cost of utilities at those parts of Nos. 10, 11 and 12 Downing street used as residences, and of flats in Admiralty house, are not separately identifiable.

Ministers Abroad

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Prime Minister if he will publish in the Official Report the rules governing Ministers' activities and conduct abroad.

The Prime Minister: Guidance covering Ministers' visits overseas is contained in paragraphs 63-81 of "Questions of Procedure for Ministers", a copy of which is available in the Library of the House.

Local Government

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Prime Minister what guidance he has given to the Minister for Local Government, the hon. Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry), on the propriety of making public statements indicating his own preferred structure for local government for the area including his own constituency.

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend the Minister for Local Government and Planning has the guidance given to all Government Ministers entitled "Questions of Procedure for Ministers". My hon. Friend has made it clear that decisions on local government reorganisation affecting his constituency will be taken by other Government Ministers.

10 Downing Street

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Prime Minister if (a) Mr. John Latsir, (b) Mr. Y. K. Pao, (c) Mr. Octav Botnar and (d) Mr. Lika-Shing have attended functions at 10 Downing street since 1980.

The Prime Minister: Yes, except, as far as I am aware, Mr. Botnar.

Irish Republic

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Prime Minister when he will next meet the Prime Minister of the Irish Republic.

The Prime Minister: I expect to meet the Prime Minister of the Irish Republic in December.

Legislation (Local Representatives)

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Prime Minister what is his policy on consulting and negotiations leading to agreement with local elected political representatives before undertaking legislation affecting each part of the United Kingdom.

The Prime Minister: This will depend on the nature of the legislation in question.

GATT

Mr. Wells: To ask the Prime Minister what progress has been made by the Commonwealth mission on GATT in bringing forward a successful conclusion to the Uruguay round.

The Prime Minister [holding answer 25 November 1993]: I met members of the Commonwealth on 17 November at the end of their programme which included visits to Switzerland, Belgium, Germany, France, the United States, and Japan. The mission has brought home to the major participants in the negotiations that not only the developed world but a wide range of other countries have an interest in the success of the Uruguay round. The mission was able to speak on behalf of a third of the world's nations and a quarter of the world's people.

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Prime Minister what further action he will be taking to assist the achievement of a successful outcome of the Uruguay round of GATT talks before the 15 December deadline; and if he will make a statement.

The Prime Minister [holding answer 25 November 1993]: Completion of the GATT Uruguay round by the 15 December deadline is currently the Government's top trade priority. My colleagues and I take every opportunity to stress to Governments both within and outside the European Community the importance of a satisfactory conclusion, and the need for all parties to bring this about. We are also doing all we can to support the European Commission, which negotiates on behalf of the European Community.

Cyprus

Mr. Cox: To ask the Prime Minister what discussions he has had with the Prime Minister of Greece on the policies to be followed by the new Greek Government regarding Cyprus.

The Prime Minister [holding answer 25 November 1993]: None.

Commonwealth Games

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Prime Minister what financial and other help from Her Majesty's Government the city of Manchester can expect if its bid to host the Commonwealth games in 2002 is successful.

The Prime Minister [holding answer 26 November 1993]: The Commonwealth Games Council for England will decide next February whether an English bid will be made for the 2002 Commonwealth games. It would therefore be premature for me to comment on the nature or scale of Government support in advance of that decision.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Animal Experiments

Mr. Peter Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many establishments in Northern Ireland can carry out research which requires experimentation on live animals; and if he will make a statement regarding the legal guidelines which are laid down for such experimentation.

Mr. Ancram: Nineteen establishments can carry out research on live animals in Northern Ireland. The use of animals in experiments is regulated under the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986.

Civil Servants

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list for each civil service grade in his Department (a) the total number of persons employed and (b) the total number of women employed.

Sir John Wheeler: The information is as follows:

Royal Victoria Hospital

Mr. Peter Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much the Royal Victoria hospital has obtained in revenue from health authorities in the Irish Republic through the sale of bed space and theatre time for the treatment of patients from the Irish Republic; and what assessment he has made of the impact of the sale on the treatment of patients from within Northern Ireland.

Mr. Ancram: The Royal group of hospitals has won a contract to carry out hip replacement operations for Eire patients. Under this arrangement some 300 patients will undergo surgery at the Royal. This has now commenced. The contract involves a half million pounds deal in a major bid by the Cork regional hospital to reduce its waiting list. No Northern Ireland people will suffer because of the Royal's arrangement with Cork. The Royal group remains committed to fulfilling obligations to patients through existing contracts with Northern Ireland health and social services boards. These contracts do not at present include hip replacement procedures.

Adoptive Mothers

Mr. Connarty: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will extend the provision of statutory maternity benefits to adoptive mothers.

Mr. Ancram: Statutory maternity pay and maternity allowance provide a measure of earnings replacement to help working women give up work around the time of the birth in the interests of their own and their unborn baby's health. There are no plans to extend the provisions to mothers of adopted children.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Incomes

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the average income per head by the smallest available geographical areas for which information is available for the most recent available year.

Mr. Nelson: The latest available estimates for household income, by standard region for 1991, and by county for 1990, were published in the May 1993 issue of "Economic Trends", available in the House of Commons Library. These estimates provide a breakdown of household gross and disposable income in pounds-million and per head of resident population.

Intra-EC Trade

Sir Thomas Arnold: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what assessment he has made of the adequacy of the Intrastat system for measuring intra-EC trade.

Sir John Cope: The current system of collecting intra-EC trade—Intrastat—which was introduced as a result of the implementation of the single market on 1 January 1993 is radically different to the previous one which was based on customs documentation. Intrastat relies on a declaration by the larger traders of the details of their EC trade. A change of this magnitude has required constant assessment of all aspects of the new system.

A range of performance indicators is being monitored, including both the response levels of businesses required to complete the special returns and the error rates on returns. Both indicators have shown a continuous improvement with targets set for the new system prior to its introduction being met. Currently there is a compliance rate of 95 per cent.; amongst the highest in the EC. Some commentators have suggested there may be a discontinuity in the figures based on past trends and customs is carrying out additional checks and audits. But overall the Instrastat system is meeting operational objectives and is expected to provide timely and reliable statistics. A more general assessment of Intrastat in the context of the single market changes has been conducted by Her Majesty's Customs and Excise and will form part of a policy evaluation review to be published shortly.

EC Contributions

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the latest assumption for United Kingdom net contributions to the EC in the 1994 calendar financial year; and what assumptions have been made on the level, in the period, of the United Kingdom's gross domestic product and the exchange rate between the pound sterling and the ecu.

Sir John Cope: The latest forecast of the United Kingdom's net contribution to EC institutions by United Kingdom financial year, for the years to 1996-97, together with relevant economic assumptions, will be published in the "Financial Statement and Budget Report" on 30 November. The 1994 EC budget is expected to be adopted by the European Parliament in December. Following its adoption, the Government will publish a White Paper, "Statement on the 1994 Community Budget". The statement will include a calendar year forecast for the United Kingdom's net contribution to the EC budget in 1994.

Meanwhile the position remains as set out in the explanatory memorandum on the draft 1994 EC budget submitted by Her Majesty's Treasury on 22 November 1993.

Credit Unions

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has further to support the development of credit unions in communities and workplaces.

Mr. Nelson: The credit union sector continues to expand steadily. There are now 316 community-based and 57 workplace credit unions in Great Britain. Three bodies exist to promote the further growth of the credit union movement: the Association of British Credit Unions Ltd., the Forum of Credit Unions Salford—FOCUS—and the National Federation of Savings and Co-operative Credit Unions. Funds have been made available through the DOE's urban programme to assist with the development of credit unions. Grants totalling £500,000 supported 20 projects in 1992-93.

Independent Forecasters

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the qualifications of his current panel of independent forecaster advisers to his Department; when their term of office is due to expire; what plans he has for replacements; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The panel members are all highly-respected economists, and experienced forecasters, who represent a range of views on how the economy works and a variety of forecasting institutions.

Appointment to the panel was for a renewable two-year period. I will review membership of the panel towards the end of this period, at the end of 1994.

Capital Gains Tax

Mr. Mandelson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will estimate the number of (a) individuals and (b) trusts that have gains falling below the capital gains tax annual exempt amount for the latest year available.

Mr. Dorrell: I regret that precise estimates are not possible, but the number of individuals and trusts with total net chargeable gains below the capital gains tax annual exempt amount and above £1,000 in 1992-93 could be in the order of half a million.

Mr. Mandelson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give for 1994-95 or the latest year available an estimate of the yield and the number of taxpayers affected by restricting the capital gains tax allowance to relief at the (a) 25p rate and (b) 20p rate.

Mr. Dorrell: Under current rules, net chargeable gains below the capital gains tax annual exempt amount are totally exempt from tax. The effects of restricting this relief at the 25 per cent. and 20 per cent. rates are given in the table based on 1992-93 liabilities. The estimates assume the restriction would affect only individuals with gains above the annual exempt amount and do not allow for any consequential change in their behaviour.

	Number of taxpayers affected	Capital gains tax yield (£ million)
Restricting the relief to
(a) 25 per cent. rate	50,000	40
(b) 20 per cent. rate	75,000	60

Pensionable Earnings

Mr. Bates: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much tax is expected to be raised from capping pensionable earnings in (a) 1993-94, (b) 2003-04 and (c) 2013-14.

Mr. Dorrell: This information is not available.

Share Offers

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the total expenditure of his Department on advertising and promoting share offers in (a) gas, (b) electricity, (c) water and (d) telecommunications.

Mr. Dorrell: The table shows the cost to the Government of marketing the privatisations and secondary offers within the sectors specified. The marketing expenses include the costs of advertising. The costs of the privatisation of Northern Ireland Electricity plc will shortly be reported to Parliament.

Mortgage Tax Relief

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the estimated total value of mortgage income tax relief for the United Kingdom, and for each standard region, for the latest available financial year.

Mr. Dorrell: Estimates for 1993-94 based on a projection of the 1992 family expenditure survey are given in the table.

Cost of Mortgage Interest Relief

Region	£ million
North	190
Yorkshire/Humberside	350
North West	450
East Midlands	350
West Midlands	390
East Anglia	170
Greater London	500
South East	1,000
South West	380
England	3,780
Wales	180
Scotland	280
Northern Ireland	60
United Kingdom	4,300

The figures are based on current interest rates as it is not yet known what reductions mortgage lenders will make following the recent reduction in the base rate.

Tax Avoidance

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has of the tax revenues lost to the Government through residence in the Channel Islands and Isle of Man for the purpose of tax avoidance.

Mr. Dorrell: I regret that information on which to base such an estimate is not available.

Income Tax

Mr. Foulkes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many individuals paid income tax in the latest year for which figures are available; and what percentage were liable for the higher rate of tax.

Mr. Dorrell: The latest estimate of the number of taxpayers in 1993-94 is 24·8 million. Of these, about 7·4 per cent. will be liable at the higher rate.

Mr. Chisholm: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much money would be raised by (a) a top tax rate of 50 per cent. for income over £35,000 and (b) a top tax rate of 50 per cent. for income over £50,000.

Mr. Dorrell: Higher rate income tax is charged on taxable income—that is gross income for tax purposes less those allowances and reliefs which are available at the taxpayers's marginal rate—in excess of the basic rate limit.

At 1994-95 income levels, the yield in a full year from the introduction of a 50 per cent. rate on taxable incomes over £35,000 would be about £2·8 billion and the yield from the introduction of a 50 per cent. rate on taxable incomes over £50,000 would be about £1·9 billion. These estimates do not allow for any behavioural effect that might result from such changes to the tax system and do not include capital gains tax.

Mr. Mandelson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will publish a table showing the change in income tax in each year since 1978-79 as against the 1978-79 indexed regime broken down into the top 1 per cent., 5 per cent., 10 per cent. and bottom 70 per cent., 50 per cent. and 30 per cent. and all taxpayers, giving the number of taxpayers in each category.

Mr. Dorrell [holding answer November 1993]: Readily available information on the annual reduction in income tax liability for the years 1989-90 to 1993-94, compared with the 1978-79 indexed regime is given in the tables. The 1978-79 regime has been indexed by reference to the statutory formula and allowing for independent taxation from 1990-91 onwards. For 1989-90 married couples are counted as one unit. For the purpose of these calculations the indexed regime of 1978-79 is applied directly to the later income base. In practice, retention of the regime, indexed as appropriate, for the intervening years would have led to changes in the income base.

VAT

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give a breakdown by region and county of the number of businesses that have registered and de-registered for value added tax since 1981.

Sir John Cope: Customs holds registration and deregistration information by local office and groups these offices to form collections. It is only able to provide this information, by collection, for the period from January 1987 to September 1993. This is as follows:

Driver and Vehicle Licensing Agency

Mr. Hain: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will be taxing the DVLA staff's receipt of charter mark bookmarks, coasters and vehicle licence holders as a work-related benefit.

Mr. Dorrell [holding answer 26 November 1993]: The cost of these items was 90p per employee. The Inland Revenue will deal with these tiny amounts as it would with similar benefits for other employees.

Agency Chief Executives

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many of the chief executives of national agencies set up by the Government in the past 14 years are on performance-related pay; and if he will name the agencies concerned.

Mr. Portillo [holding answer 25 November 1993]: Seventy-three of the 84 chief executives appointed to next steps agencies—excluding those in Northern Ireland agencies for which I am not responsible—are eligible for performance-related pay and the agencies concerned are as listed:

TRANSPORT

Road Construction

10. Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will give the total cost of proposed budget for new roads over the next five years, and by how much it has been reduced as a result of recent discussions with the Treasury.

Mr. MacGregor: I expect to spend over £1·3 billion in 1993-94 on new construction of national roads in England. As for future years, I cannot, of course, pre-empt tomorrow's unified Budget statement.

Buses, London

12. Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to develop an overall strategic policy for London following the decision not to proceed with deregulation of bus services in London.

Mr. Norris: Our strategy for transport in London focuses on three priorities: improving the management of the road, rail and bus networks; modernising and where necessary expanding the provision of transport infrastructure; and making greater use of private sector resources and skills. The policies for buses which we announced earlier this month are fully consistent with that approach.

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many passengers are transported on London area buses on an average day; what was the figure five years ago; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norris: In 1992-93 the number of passenger journeys on LT buses was 1,127 million—3·09 million per day. In 1987-88 there were 1,211 million—3·31 million per day.

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is his estimate of the net receipt which his Department expects for the privatisation of each of the subsidiary companies of London Buses Ltd.

Mr. Norris: The Department's estimate of the net receipts from the sale of the London Buses Ltd. subsidiary companies is commercially confidential and thus cannot be made publicly available.

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish the timetable for tendering all the London Transport bus routes which have not yet been put out to tender.

Mr. Norris: The timetable for tendering the remaining London Transport bus routes which have not been put out to tender is currently under consideration.

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the implications of the proposed privatisation of the subsidiary companies of London Buses Ltd. for the pension fund of current and former London Transport employees.

Mr. Norris: The proposed privatisation of the London Buses Ltd. subsidiary companies will not affect the pensions of former employees of the subsidiary companies. The pension position of current employees of those companies is now under consideration. I recognise the concerns of employees about their pension arrangements, and will soon give London Transport guidance on the treatment of these in the privatisation.

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is his estimate of the minimum subsidy requirement in 1994-95 for London Transport bus services; and what comparable level of subsidy has been required for each year since 1987-88.

Mr. Norris: The total of revenue grant support for London Transport bus services, including tendered bus services, for the years 1987-88 to 1992-93, was as follows:

	£ million
1987-88	83·0
1988-89	79·3
1989-90	67·7
1990-91	88·3
1991-92	101·9
1992-93	100·6

The current forecast for 1993-94 is £52·1 million. The amount of revenue grant support for 1994-95 will be determined in due course in consultation with London Transport.

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what consideration he has given to specifying a minimum reserve price for each of the subsidiary companies of London Buses Ltd. which he is proposing to privatise.

Mr. Norris: There are no plans to specify a minimum reserve price for the subsidiary companies of London Buses Ltd.

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the current book value of (a) the vehicles, (b) the garages and (c) all other assets of each of the subsidiary companies of London Buses Ltd.

Mr. Norris: At 31 March 1993, the net book value of the vehicles within the London Buses Ltd. group was £164 million; the net book value of the property was £143 million; and the net book value of the remaining assets was £21 million. These valuations reflect the current value or replacement cost of the assets, reduced by the proportion of the life of the asset which is already expired, in line with normal public sector accounting practice.

West Coast Main Line

13. Mr. Gallie: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he will next meet with the chairman of British Rail to discuss investment in the west coast line.

Mr. Freeman: My right hon. Friend regularly meets both the chariman of British Rail and the chairman designate of Railtrack to discuss current railway issues. Further announcements about investment in the west coast main line will follow the outcome of the public expenditure survey.

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the conclusions of the Hambros study into possible joint public/private sector financing initiatives for the west coast main line.

Mr. Freeman: I expect to be able to do so very shortly.

Mr. Martlew: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish the detailed terms of reference of the Hambros research project into joint private sector/public sector alternatives for financing the west coast main line project; when the Hambros report was received by his Department; when it will be made public; and what amount was paid to Hambros for the research work.

Mr. Freeman: Hambros's remit is to examine the scope for using private finance to modernise the infrastructure of the west coast main line. We expect to receive the Hambros report shortly, but no decision has yet been taken concerning publication. Hambros's final invoice has yet to be received

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he next intends to make an official journey on the InterCity train between London and Carlisle.

Mr. Freeman: I last travelled to Carlisle on the west coast main line on Monday 14 June. I intend to repeat the journey again in the coming months.

Airport Privatisation

14. Mr. Streeter: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what incentives he intends to give local authorities to privatise their airports.

26. Sir John Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is his policy on encouraging local authorities to privatise their airports.

Mr. MacGregor: BAA has proved that the private sector is ready and willing to provide capital investment for airports. I have therefore reduced the amount allocated to local authority airports to the level necessary for safety and security measures. The local authority owners, therefore, have every incentive to consider privatisation.

Railway Electrification

15. Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is his policy on railway electrification.

Mr. Freeman: Under our plans for restructuring the railway, it will be for Railtrack, in the first instance, to consider the case for the electrification of any particular line.

M27

16. Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to announce the appointment of consultants to study the widening of the M27 motorway.

Mr. Key: The widening is being considered within the review of scheme priorities announced by my right hon. Friend in August. Any decision about the appointment of consultants will have to await the outcome.

London-Colchester Railway Line

17. Mr. Jenkin: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what measures will be pursued to improve services for travellers on the London-Colchester line.

Mr. Freeman: The bulk of London to Colchester services are provided by the Great Eastern route group of Network SouthEast, which is already one of the best performing lines.

In addition, the route is currently undergoing a major resignalling scheme, at a cost of £100 million. When this is completed I expect to see performance improve even further.

Hazardous Freight

18. Mr. Miller: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to subsidise the Trainload Freight division of British Rail in order to arrest the switch towards road transport of flammable petroleum based products.

Mr. Freeman: Under the Railways Act 1993, a new environmental grant is to be introduced next April to help marginal rail freight flows with the payment of track access charges. In addition, all freight operators, including BR, will be eligible for the enhanced freight facilities grants scheme.

Jubilee Line Extension

19. Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he is taking to ensure fair play in the allocation of Jubilee line construction contracts.

Mr. Norris: The award of contracts for the Jubilee line extension (JLE) is entirely a matter for London Underground Ltd. LUL has a duty to secure competitive tenders in a proper, legal fashion, having regard for EC directives, and to secure best value for taxpayers' money.

Channel Tunnel Rail Link

20. Mr. Sims: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he now expects construction of the channel tunnel fast link to commence.

Mr. Freeman: Construction commencement depends on the progress of a hybrid Bill through Parliament. We expect that a Bill will be ready for introduction to Parliament next autumn.

Seat Belts

21. Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to make mandatory the installation of seat belts in buses and coaches in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Key: The Department is currently looking at the circumstances surrounding the recent tragic coach and minibus accidents and is reviewing the full technical and cost implications of the compulsory fitment of seat belts in minibuses and coaches. It would not be right to take any decisions before this work has been completed.

Transport Expenditure, London

22. Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what proportion of public spending on transport in London is spent on roads; and what proportion on public transport.

Mr. Norris: In 1992-93 public investment in London Transport, Network SouthEast and docklands light railway amounted to around £1,400 million, while expenditure by central Government and local authorities on roads in London, excluding M25, was about £400 million. Expenditure on Network SouthEast benefited a broader area than London alone.

Socially Necessary Railway Lines

23. Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport for how many years a subsidy for socially necessary rail lines can be guaranteed under current Treasury rules; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: It will be for the franchising director to negotiate contracts with franchisees, and to make such subsidy payments as are specified in those contracts from within his budget. In doing so he will be in no different a position from any other public sector body in entering into contracts which may run beyond the normal annual period for which Parliament votes expenditure.

A5

24. Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what discussions he has had recently concerning improvements to the A5, Watling street from the A5-M69 junction to the Nuneaton Longshoot junction.

Mr. Key: The Department has recently met landowners who may be affected by a possible improvement of the A5-Nutts lane junction at Hinckley. Any scheme would be aimed at reducing congestion and the number of accidents which presently occur at, and in the vicinity of, the junction.

Toll Roads

25. Mr. Fabricant: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the current position regarding the development of toll roads funded by the private sector.

Mr. Key: The new Dartford-Thurrock river crossing was completed in October 1991, and work has begun on the second Severn crossing. Draft orders for the Birmingham northern relief road were published in June this year; the public inquiry is expected to start next spring. We shall be considering further the possibility of involving private finance in the planned Birmingham western orbital route after we have announced our conclusions on the possibility of direct charging for existing motorways in the light of responses to the Green Paper "Paying for Better Motorways".

Roads, South-East Essex

28. Sir Teddy Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what steps he is taking to improve road communication in south-east Essex.

Mr. Key: With regard to the trunk road network in south-east Essex, my Department is pressing ahead with its plan to improve the A127 between M25 and the new two-level junction at Rayleigh Weir.

In respect of local roads, Essex county council has identified three major schemes as a result of their south-east East Essex traffic study. The county council has bid for transport supplementary grant funding to start work on improving the northern section of the A130, between A12 and A132, in 1994-95. It has also bid for advance design costs on the eastern section of the A127 Southend-Rochford bypass and credit approval for a third major project in the area, the B1013 access to Southend.

A decision on TSG funding will be announced in December.

East Coast Main Line

29. Mr. McAllion: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what discussions he has held with ScotRail management relating to the electrification of the east coast main line between Edinburgh and Aberdeen.

Mr. Freeman: I discussed Edinburgh and Aberdeen electrification matters with ScotRail management and Grampian regional council during my visit to Aberdeen in September.

I understand that ScotRail and a consortium of local authorities are jointly funding a study of the feasibility of the scheme. A report on the first phase of the study is expected in spring 1994.

M1

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has plans to improve the M1 in the coming year.

Mr. Key: Our construction programme for 1994-5 has still to be settled.

Trans-Pennine Study

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he expects to give the Government's response to the trans-Pennine study.

Mr. Key: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 29 October 1993, Official Report, column 807.

Commuter Trains

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what percentage of trains on Network SouthEast commuter services into London were late in the latest 12 months for which figures are available.

Mr. Freeman: For the 12-month period to 5 November 1993, 89 per cent. of Network SouthEast's morning and evening peak services trains arrived within five minutes of the advertised time. This includes some trains which did not begin or end their journeys in central London. The comparable figure for the previous 12 months was 85·6 per cent. There has therefore been a significant improvement in the quality of service for passengers.

NAO and PAC

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many files marked "Not for National Audit Office eyes" are held by his Department; and how many are marked "Not for Public Accounts Committee eyes".

Mr. Norris: There are 684 files in my Department—out of a total of 1,331,002—marked "Not to be seen by NAO without reference to the appropriate Head of Division", sometimes abbreviated to "Not for NAO eyes". These figures refer to individual jackets—file parts. For each NAO study, a number of divisions in different locations may be involved and each may possess a file with a number of parts.

The marking "Not for NAO eyes" is used in accordance with an agreement between the Treasury and the National Audit Office, under which documents relating to the handling of relations between Departments and the NAO and PAC are not automatically available to the NAO while they are current.

There is no marking "Not for PAC eyes".

London Underground

Mr. Bendall: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans he has to ensure that London Underground has sufficient resources to ensure the efficient running of the capital's underground system and the safety of passengers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norris: I cannot comment on the Government's expenditure proposals for London Transport in advance of the unified Budget on 30 November.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement in respect of the derailments on the Central line at (a) Loughton on 8 November and (b) Epping on 1 November of the London underground.

Mr. Norris: This is an operational matter on which London Underground Ltd., LUL, is best placed to comment. I understand from it that the immediate cause of these derailments was very rapid rail wear on sections of the Central line. LUL's engineers have now replaced the worst affected section of track. They are also investigating why it has worn so quickly. The interface between rails and wheels of trains is a complex technical issue, but track lubrication may be an important factor.

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the lines affected and estimate the number of train services delayed as a consequence of the power failure on the London underground on 24 November.

Mr. Norris: I have asked London Transport for an urgent, full report on the circumstances of the power failure, to include what actions it proposes to ensure that there is no recurrence.

M65

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations have been made to him regarding implications on jobs and investment prospects in north-east Lancashire arising from an eastwards extension of the M65.

Mr. Key: Some of the many responses to our consultation on the trans-Pennine study indicated that any extension of the M65 eastwards should help to stimulate economic activity in the east Lancashire area generally.

Pension Funds

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what are the exact sums remaining in the railway pensions fund; and what is the actuarial assessment of the amount needed to meet the pension benefits of past and present employees.

Mr. Freeman: This is a matter for the British Rail Pension Trustee Company and the individual management committees of the various BR pension schemes, as appropriate.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what arrangements he has made for adjudication in the case of a dispute between actuaries working for the railway pension fund and actuaries working for the Government.

Mr. Freeman: In the unlikely event of a difference of opinion between the actuaries, it will be for the trustees, or my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State where he is involved, to reach their own views after taking whatever advice they consider appropriate.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the measures he is taking to safeguard pension funds in cases where privatised transport industries become insolvent.

Mr. Freeman: Where transport industries have been privatised, measures have been taken to safeguard the accrued rights of pensioners and active members of the industries' pension schemes up to the point of privatisation. When employees move into the private sector, any pension scheme operated by their new employer will continue to be subject to the general legal framework which applies to all such occupational pension schemes. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security has responsibility for such matters and announced in the House, on 3 November, that he will be issuing discussion papers as a basis for detailed exchanges with interested parties on matters arising from recommendations of the Pensions Law Review Committee.

VAT (Bus Fares)

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what study he has made, or proposes to make, of the effects of VAT on bus fares in relation to bus use; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: I have received representations from the Bus and Coach Council, and others, which estimate the effect on bus fares and patronage of imposing VAT. Decisions on taxation are a matter for the Chancellor but in reaching these he will be aware of the likely transport implications.

A51 Bypass

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he will make an announcement of his decision on the A51 Burford and the Green proposed bypass.

Mr. Key: I hope to be able to announce the preferred route next spring.

Private Bus Operators

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the private bus operators which operate more than 100 buses.

Mr. Freeman: For licensing purposes, bus operators are not distinguished from coach operators. According to records held centrally in October 1993, the following private bus and coach operators, listed alphabetically, are licensed to operate more than 100 vehicles in Great Britain:

Badgerline Ltd.
Barton Buses Ltd.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list (a) the number of private bus operators and (b) the estimated number of bus users in major conurbations.

Mr. Freeman: (a) For licensing purposes, bus operators are not distinguished from coach operators. In March 1993, there were an estimated 1,300 private bus and coach operators based in London and the English metropolitan areas, out of a total of 6,800 in Great Britain as a whole. Of these, about 300 operated local bus services during 1992-93, out of a total of about 1,900 in all Great Britain.

(b) The number of bus users is not available; however, it is estimated that passengers made a total of 2,514 million local bus journeys during 1992-93 in London and the English metropolitan areas, out of a total of 4,483 million local bus journeys in Great Britain.

Motorways

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans there are for major motorway works in 1994-95 and for lighting schemes and additional service areas.

Mr. Key: There will be an announcement about major motorway works in the new year. It is expected that about 16 miles of motorway will be equipped with lighting for the first time during 1994-95. Following a change of policy in August 1992, proposals for new motorway service areas —MSAs—are now a matter for the private sector. Nevertheless, three MSAs proposed by the Department before the change in policy are expected to open during 1994-95: they are at Birchanger on the M11 and Barn Hill and Cherwell Valley on the M40.

Motor Cycles

Mr. Robert Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make it his policy to vote at the EC Council of Ministers against the proposal for a 100 brake horse power limit on motor cycles.

Mr. MacGregor: The Council of Ministers is expected to convene a conciliation meeting on this issue with the European Parliament. The United Kingdom's position is that there is no evidence to link motor cycle power with the level of accidents. We hope that a conciliation meeting will successfully resolve the issue.

Motorway Lavatories

Mr. Dobson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will state the number of lavatories adjacent to motorways in Britain in October 1992 and the number at the present date distinguishing between male, female and disabled:

(2) if he will list new toilets adjacent to motorways in Britain on which building work has commenced since October 1992 and those for which planning permission has been given, distinguishing between male, female and disabled.

Mr. Key: In October 1992 there were 44 motorway service areas—MSAs—in England and a further one, Clacket Lane on the M25, has opened since. All are required to provide free lavatories 24 hours a day. At present, the minimum number of lavatories for males, females and disabled people is specified in the leases of the MSAs, but operators are free to provide more. We do not keep records of the number currently available. Pending the provision of full MSAs, the Department also maintains temporary lavatories with facilities for the disabled alongside the M26, M40—two sites—and M56.

Motorway services in Wales and Scotland are the responsibility of my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Wales and for Scotland.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Live Animals (Exports)

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what control she has on the live export of lambs to prevent them being misleadingly described as being produced in another country.

Mr. Jack: Animals exported live from the United Kingdom are accompanied by documentation which identifies the country of origin. The descriptions applied to lambs or meat derived from them in another country after export from the United Kingdom are the responsibility of the authorities in that country.

Declaration on Environment and Development

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what steps have been taken by her Department to implement each of the principles of the Rio declaration on environment and development, agreed at the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development in June 1992, in so far as they apply to the matters for which her Department has responsibility.

Mr. Jack: The Government will shortly publish the United Kingdom's strategy for sustainable development, together with reports on climate change, biodiversity and forestry. This Department is contributing fully to all of these.

Set-aside Land

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will list the June census set-aside figures for England for 1989, 1990 and 1991.

Mr. Jack: The June census set-aside figures for England for 1990 and 1991 are as follows: for 1989 the census recorded set-aside land in the category "All other land on agricultural holdings".

Land Use ('000 ha)

	1989	1990	1991
Set-aside scheme land	—	72	97
All other land on agricultural holdings	398	375	382

Set-aside was introduced as a census category only in 1990. Since it was a new category there was some uncertainty as to whether all set-aside land would have been declared as such. Some set-aside land may have been declared as bare fallow or other land. Therefore, for the purposes of determining the base area for the arable area payments scheme, the set-aside areas submitted to the EC Commission were based on actual set-aside agreements reached with farmers for the years 1989, 1990 and 1991, which gave the precise areas in set-aside.

EMPLOYMENT

Disabled People

Mr. Miller: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) what evidence he has that legislation requiring employers to contribute towards the cost of employing people with disabilities, under the access to work scheme, will benefit the disabled work force, and not be a disincentive to the employment of such workers;

(2) when he will announce the maximum level of aid which people with disabilities can receive over a five-year period under access to work;

(3) when he will specify the maximum contribution an employer will be expected to make over any five-year period under access to work;

(4) what estimates his Department has made of the number of people with disabilities to receive assistance under the access to work scheme in its first year of operation;

(5) how many people with disabilities received assistance from the adaption of premises and equipment, special aids to employment, personal reader service and the fares to work schemes, in the last year for which statistics are available;

(6) who will assess eligibility for assistance under access to work;

(7) what differences he proposes in the eligibility conditions for access to work compared to adaption of premises and equipment, special aids to employment, personal reader service and the fares to work schemes.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made a statement about access to work to the House on 22 June 1993, Official Report, column 102. Access to work will replace and extend four of the Department's current special schemes and enable us to help more disabled people and meet a much wider range of their employment-related needs. To help fund the extra costs we will expect employers to contribute 50 per cent. of the cost of help, up to a ceiling, to employees who enter the scheme after working for them six months or more. Both recent and earlier research suggests that employers would be willing to make a reasonable contribution. They already do in the current adaptations to premises and equipment scheme.

There are a number of issues on access to work on which we have still to make decisions. In addition to the limits on individual entitlement and employer contributions, these include transitional arrangements for existing beneficiaries of the current special schemes, for how long those helped as new recruits will remain exempt from the employer contributions and whether there will be special arrangements for certain types of firm. My right hon. Friend is currently listening to the views of a number of interested parties and individuals and hopes to make decisions as soon as possible. Once my right hon. Friend has taken decisions on these areas it is intended to make an announcement to the House.

The numbers helped through each of the four special schemes which will be replaced and extended by access to work were: adaptations to premises and equipment—284; special aids to employment—5,255; personal reader service—796; fares to work—1,789. We hope to help around 9,000 people in the first year of operation of access to work; each person will have access to a wider range of individual items of help.

Eligibility for access to work will be assessed by disability employment advisers, who are part of the Employment Service's network of placing assessment and counselling teams—PACTs. Eligibility will be based on registrability under the terms of the Disabled Persons (Employment) Act 1944. Formal registration will not, however, be required. Formal registration under the 1944 Act is required for the special aids to employment and fares to work schemes. For the personal reader service, beneficiaries must be registered as blind or partially sighted, but need not be registered as disabled under the 1944 Act. Formal registration under the 1944 Act is not required for the adaptations to premises and equipment schemes.

Fares-to-interview Scheme

Mr. Kevin Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the exclusions which apply on the fares-to-interview scheme; and what plans he has to remove them.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The exclusions which apply on fares to interviews are published in the "Travel to Interview Scheme" leaflet which I will arrange to have placed in the Library.

The scheme has been reviewed and we are now considering what changes should be made and how quickly they can be implemented.

North Norfolk Action

Sir Ralph Howell: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) if he will estimate the savings on benefits incurred due to persons leaving the unemployment register after interviews to persons obtaining employment after participating in North Norfolk Action stating the number in each case;

(2) what was the overall expenditure on North Norfolk Action up to 31 October; and how much expenditure has been incurred on (a) provider fees, (b) allowances, (c) fares to work, (d) publicity, (e) evaluation and (f) employment service running costs.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Responsibility for the subject of the questions has been delegated to the Employment Service agency under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from M. E. G. Fogden to Sir Ralph Howell, dated 29 November 1993:

As the Employment Service is an Executive Agency, the Secretary of State has asked me to write to you direct to respond to your Parliamentary Questions about overall expenditure on North Norfolk Action up to 31 October; how much expenditure has been incurred on: provider fees; allowances; fares to work; publicity; evaluation; Employment Service running costs; and an estimate of the savings on benefits incurred due to persons leaving the unemployment register after interviews to persons obtaining employment after participating in North Norfolk Action stating the number in each case. These are matters which fall within the responsibilities delegated to me as Chief Executive of the Agency.

The total expenditure on North Norfolk Action up to 31 October 1993 is £205,182, incurred on:

(a) Provider fees	87,349
(b) Allowances	85,178
(c) Fares to work	2,455
(d) Publicity	1,500
(e) Evaluation by external contractors	[1]—
(f) Running costs	28,700

[1] Work to start in 1994.

The numbers of those starting work following participation on the North Norfolk Action programme is 16. The numbers of clients leaving the register to go into work following Supportive Caseload interviews is 120.

An evaluation exercise is being considered by my Research and Evaluation Branch to estimate the register effect of supportive caseload. A final report will be available early in 1994. Until we have the evaluation it is not possible to estimate savings on benefit as the effect of "deadweight" and "substitution" cannot be taken into account. Further evaluation will involve measuring the improvements in clients' jobsearch, attitude to work and motivation due to participation in North Norfolk Action. This will be done by external providers next year.

I hope this is helpful.

As decided by the Administration Committee of the House of Commons, Chief Executive replies to written Parliamentary Questions will now be published in the Official Report. I will also place a copy of this letter in the Library of the House.

Training Schemes

Mr. Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what arrangements he made to endure the monitoring of the standards of employment training schemes; and if he will make a statement.

Miss Widdecombe: Training and enterprise councils —TECs—are responsible for delivering employment training schemes. Relations between TECs and the Employment Department are governed by the TEC operating agreement. Under the 1993-94 agreement TECs are required to contract only with training providers that:

obtain and maintain approved training organisation status uner criteria published by my right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State, —a copy of which is in the Library; or, have an alternative system approved by my right hon. Friend, as of equivalent or greater assurance and effectiveness.

From April 1994, the Employment Department will require TECs to operate new arrangements in the way they contract for and manage services and products which the Department funds. The new requirements have been approved by my right hon. Friend and a copy can also be found in the Library.

Vocational Courses

Ms. Abbott: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many long-term unemployed people have taken up the education allowance to enable them to study on full-time vocational courses which the Chancellor announced in his Budget statement in March; and if he will make a statement.

Miss Widdecombe: The education allowance announced in March became available in September and is called learning for work. There were approximately 5,000 people participating on 14 October 1993.

Business Start-up Scheme

Ms Abbott: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many places were offered on the business start-up scheme in 1992-93; how many places have been taken up in the current financial year; how many of the additional 10,000 places the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced in his Budget statement he now expects will come on stream; and if he will make a statement.

Miss Widdecombe: In 1992-93 there were 35,337 places available on the programme in England. Latest information for 1993-94 shows that, to 10 October 1993, there were 18,254 programme entrants. Of the additional 10,000 starts on the programme 8,580 were allocated to England. Of those 8,580, a total so far of 5,850 have been contracted with training and enterprise councils to be taken up in this financial year. Information for Scotland and Wales is the responsibility of my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Scotland and for Wales.

Community Action Programme

Ms Abbott: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many places have been taken up in the new community action programme announced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his Budget statement on 16 March; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service agency under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from M. E. G. Fogden to Ms Diane Abbott, dated 29 November 1993:

As the Employment Service is an Executive Agency the Secretary of State has asked me to write to you direct to respond to your Parliamentary Question to him about the number of Community Action places currently taken up. This is something which falls within the responsibilities delegated to me as Chief Executive of the Agency.

It may help if I explain the background to Community Action and our plans for the provision of the announced places.

Community Action is a programme to help long-term unemployed people back into work, by providing work experience on projects of benefit to local communities. In the Spring Budget the then Chancellor committed £113·5m, sufficient to provide 20,000 places and help 60,000 people in a full year. Following extensive consultation and development of this new programme, to ensure quality and value for money, the first places became available at the end of July.

Community Action opportunities will be delivered, in the main, by voluntary/charitable organisations and my people in Regional Offices were given responsibility for contracting with them. The contracting round is now almost complete and 165 contracts have, so far, been awarded. At the end of October there were 1,200 long-term unemployed people participating in the programme and numbers are increasing steadily. The programme is planned to build to 20,000 filled places by the end of March.

I hope this is helpful.

As decided by the Administration Committee of the House of Commons, Chief Executive replies to written Parliamentary Questions will now be published in the Official Report. I will also place a copy of this letter in the Library of the House.

Pilot Schemes

Ms Abbott: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many pilot schemes have been launched, under which payments are made to employers who recruit the long-term unemployed, as announced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his Budget statement of 16 March; where are these pilot schemes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: In his spring Budget, the former Chancellor of the Exchequer, the right hon. Member for Kingston-upon-Thames (Mr. Lamont), announced the introduction of a pilot scheme called workstart which offers a financial incentive to employers who recruit eligible long term unemployed people. There are four pilots, two run by the employment service in south London and east Kent, and two by training and enterprise councils in Tyneside and Devon and Cornwall.

Training and Enterprise Councils

Ms Abbott: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the new £25 million fund for training and enterprise councils announced by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his Budget statement of 16 March; when he will invite applications for this fund; and if he will make a statement.

Miss Widdecombe: A prospectus inviting training and enterprise councils to bid for TEC challenge funds was issued on 13 April and the successful bids were announced on 13 July. Copies of both the prospectus and a list of winning bids have been placed in the Library.

Mr. Rooker: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the training and enterprise councils which have designated specific budgets to assist with student hardship in the further education sector.

Miss Widdecombe: The Department does not allocate specific funds to training and enterprise councils to assist with student hardship in the further education sector. TECs would be able to use their own resources to do this if they chose, but information is not held by the Department on those that may have set aside specific budgets for this purpose.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the level of employment in the Rugby-Daventry travel-to-work area in 1992 and at the latest available date.

Miss Widdecombe: Employment estimates for travel-to-work areas are available only from the periodic censuses of employment. The latest estimates are for September 1991 when the total number of employees in employment in the Rugby and Daventry travel-to-work area was 50,600.

Mr. Chisholm: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many people were in employment, broken down for full time and part time, in (a) April 1989, (b) April 1993 and (c) the latest date for which figures are available.

Miss Widdecombe: The work force in employment estimates are available only for March, June, September and December of each year. The numbers in full-time and part-time employment were:

Work force in employment: Great Britain (seasonally adjusted)

	Full-time	Part-time
March 1989	19,637,000	6,341,000
March 1993	17,480,000	6,774,000
June 1993	17,529,000	6,769,000

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is the average length of time (a) black men, (b) black women, (c) Asian men, (d) Asian women, (e) white men and (f) white women remain unemployed.

Miss Widdecombe: This information is not available.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what percentage of the unemployed are (a) black, (b) Asian and (c) white; and in each case what percentage is unemployed for more than (i) six months and (ii) one year.

Miss Widdecombe: The latest estimates from the spring 1993 labour force survey according to the international standard—International Labour Organisation—definition of unemployment are given in the following table:

Great Britain (not seasonally adjusted)

Percentage of total ILO unemployed		Duration of ILO unemployment (per cent.)
		All	Over six months	Over one year
Black	4	100	78	53
Indian, Pakistani and Bangladeshi	4	100	77	48

WALES

Value Added Tax (Books)

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what estimates he has made of the impact upon local education authority budgets in Wales of VAT upon books; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Taxation policy is a matter for my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I cannot comment on speculation about possible Budget measures.

Plough Lane Link Road

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) if he will visit Wepre Park and Aston, Deeside, to consider the line of route for the Plough lane link road;

(2) if he will permit a public inquiry into the proposed Plough lane link road, Deeside.

Sir Wyn Roberts: My right hon. Friend has no plans to do so. This is a Clwyd county council scheme and the line of the route has already been determined by it. The county has submitted a compulsory purchase order and a side roads order for my right hon. Friend's consideration. The objection period for the orders expires on 17 December after which time a decision will be taken as to whether or not a public inquiry will be held.

Regional Assistance

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make it his policy to secure that payments made under the European Community regional development fund objective 3 and 4 programmes to projects in Wales are administered on an all-Wales basis.

Mr. Redwood: Payments made under the European regional development fund—ERDF—to projects in Wales are administered in Wales. Objectives 3 and 4 come under the European social fund and not ERDF, and future administrative arrangements are being considered.

Public Expenditure

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will give the figures for expenditure in the last financial year on (a) urban development corporations, (b) higher education, (c) grant-maintained schools, (d) further education, (e) care in the community, (f) district health authorities and (g) training and enterprise councils.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The information is set out in the following table:

	£ million
(a) Cardiff Bay Development Corporation (net)	36,038
(b) Higher Education	44·546
(c) Grant Maintained Schools	5·132
(d) Further Education[1]	2·100
(e) Care in the Community[2]	245·300
(f) District Health Authorities[3]	1,384,000
(g) Training and Enterprise Councils	107·260

[1] Information on expenditure on further education in 1992-93 under the control of local education authorities is not held centrally. Expenditure by the Welsh Office in respect of adult continuing further education in 1992-93 was £2·1 million.

[2] This figure is approximate and is based on outturn estimates provided by county councils.

[3] Includes Welsh Health Common Services Authority. (Excludes FHSAs).

Set-aside Land

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish the figures in hectares for (a) set-aside, (b) pulses, (c) oil seed rape and (d) cereals for 1989, 1990 and 1991 which were used to calculate the base area in Wales.

Mr. Redwood: The figures used to calculate the base area in Wales are as follows:

	1989	1990	1991	Hectares base area (3-year average)
Set-aside	697	1,229	1,591	1,172
Proteins	1,004	925	1,009	979
Oilseed rape	554	744	1,094	797
Cereals	61,621	56,016	53,068	56,902

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the June census set-aside figures for Wales for 1989, 1990 and 1991.

Mr. Redwood: There were 582 hectares of set-aside land in Wales recorded in the June 1989 agricultural census. This figure is not regarded as reliable and so comparable data were not collected in Wales in 1990 and 1991. More complete data, collected for the administration of the set-aside scheme, based on all land in the scheme during the year, are shown in the following table.

	1989	1990	1991
Set-aside Scheme land (hectares)	697	1,229	1,591

A465

Mr. Hain: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will now announce the start date for work on the A465 between Aberdulais and Glynneath.

Sir Wyn Roberts: An announcement will be made shortly.

Cardiff International Arena

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what consultation he has had with Cardiff city council in relation to the release of urban development grant funds to Brent Walker with respect to the Cardiff international arena; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood [holding answer 26 November 1993]: Cardiff city council is party to the urban development grant agreement drawn up with Brent Walker and responsible for monitoring the Cardiff international arena project. The Welsh Office receives written quarterly progress reports from the council and frequent informal contact is also maintained. These arrangements are no different from those which apply to other UDG projects.

The CIA project is now almost complete and final payment of grant, £256,000, will be made when a certificate of final completion has been issued and approved.

British Gas Wales

Mr. Hain: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he was consulted about the proposed closure of British Gas Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood [holding answer 26 November 1993]: I understand that British Gas is considering restructuring to become more efficient and competitive and that it has not yet reached a final decision. The future of British Gas Wales is a matter for the company to decide.

Local Government Finance

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will specify for each local authority the amount of accumulated capital receipts.

Mr. Redwood: The information requested is given in the table.

Usable cash backed accumulated capital receipts at 31 March 1993.

DEFENCE

Forces (Resignations)

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many members of Her Majesty's forces leave before the end of their contract; and what is the ethnic breakdown.

Mr. Hanley: In 1992-93, the latest year for which figures are available, 24,616 service personnel left the armed forces before the end of their commission or engagement. This figure includes those who left on redundancy terms, but excludes those who died or left for medical or compassionate reasons.

Information on the ethnic origins of those leaving the armed forces is not available.

Ethnic Minorities

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the total number of members of Her Majesty's forces from ethnic minorities.

Mr. Hanley: The information is not available at present. My Department will however shortly be undertaking a survey of the ethnic origins of serving personnel as part of our implementation of in-service ethnic monitoring.

Skyguard

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what capacity the Skyguard system has for passive monitoring of the height and speed of low-flying aircraft; and what use is made of this capacity when the system is used for covert monitoring of low flying.

Mr. Hanley: The Skyguard radar system is an active system which has no capacity for passive monitoring of the height and speed of low-flying aircraft.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what surveys have been conducted of the actions taken by military aircrew when they become aware of the location or presence of a Skyguard radar monitoring low flying.

Mr. Hanley: No such surveys have been conducted.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what information he has on which nations possess the Skyguard-Oerlikon anti-aircraft system.

Mr. Hanley: Nations which possess this system include: Argentina, Austria, Canada, Egypt, Greece, Iran, Malaysia, Saudi Arabia, Spain, Switzerland, Taiwan, the United Arab Emirates and the United Kingdom.

Minehunting

Mr. James Hill: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what assessment he has made of the United Kingdom's minehunting capability; and if he will make a statement;

(2) when he expects to achieve a flotilla of 25 mine counter measures vessels;

(3) when he expects to issue an invitation to tender for a further batch of Sandown minehunters.

Mr. Aitken: The Government are committed to retaining a capable and effective mine counter measures fleet. We therefore intend to continue over the next decade with our modernisation programme, which will entail the procurement of further Sandown class single-role minehunters and a mid-life update for the Hunt class. As we made clear in this year's Statement on the Defence Estimates, it is our intention to build up to a 25-strong fleet, consisting solely of highly capable Hunt and Sandown class vessels. The timing of this build-up will be dependent on the in-service dates of further Sandown class vessels. We expect to make an announcement on future orders for the Sandown class shortly.

Forces Pay

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the rates of pay of British forces serving in central Bosnia and Germany; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: United Kingdom service personnel are paid the same rates of basic pay irrespective of where they are serving.

Total remuneration will however vary depending on a range of factors including the allowances to which personnel are entitled. Personnel in Germany receive local overseas allowance—LOA—paid to compensate for the additional costs of living there compared to the United Kingdom. No LOA is payable in the former Yugoslavia but personnel deployed to the former Yugoslavia from Germany continue to receive a significant element of their LOA in recognition of their continuing financial commitments in Germany—70 per cent. for married personnel, 40 per cent. for single personnel.

In addition, married personnel in the former Yugoslavia are entitled to separation allowance and all personnel receive the United Nations set allowances to cover incidental expenses and rest and recreation leave. Food and accommodation charges have been waived for all personnel in the former Yugoslavia in recognition of the conditions under which they are serving.

United Nations

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what representations he has made to his counterparts in NATO, the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe and the Western European Union in seeking to gain support for strengthening the United Nations, as indicated in paragraph 50 of the Government's reply to the fourth report of the Defence Committee of Session 1992-93, House of Commons Paper 988.

Mr. Hanley: The Government see a clear role for organisations such as NATO, the CSCE and WEU in supporting the conflict management and prevention activities of the United Nations. All three are already providing such support, in the former Yugoslavia and elsewhere. Considerable work is also under way within these organisations on how they might best contribute to and support United Nations activities in the future. The United Kingdom is a full and active participant in this work.

Queen Elizabeth Military Hospital

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether high alumina cement was used in the construction of the Queen Elizabeth military Hospital at Woolwich.

Mr. Hanley: An inspection of available information shows no specific evidence of high alumina cement being used in the construction of this hospital.

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what has been the total annual maintenance expenditure on the Queen Elizabeth military hospital at Woolwich for each year since 1982; and what is the budgeted expenditure in the current year.

Mr. Hanley: The budgeted expenditure for works maintenance at the Queen Elizabeth military hospital, Woolwich in 1993-94 is £1,990,000. Corresponding figures for 1990-91, 1991-92 and 1992-93 were £1,030,000, £2,040,000 and £2,430,000 respectively. Prior to 1990, works maintenance expenditure was the responsibility of the Property Services Agency and my Department does not hold any recorded information.

Low Flying

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what measures have been introduced to improve the geographical spread of low flying in the United Kingdom low-flying system since the report by the National Audit Office in 1990.

Mr. Hanley: In 1992, a fast jet turn-round facility was established at RAF Leuchars to enable low-flying training in the United Kingdom by RAF aircrews based in Germany to be carried out in the relatively lightly used northern half of Scotland. In addition, a continuous review of the United Kingdom low-flying system is carried out which ensures that avoidances, which tend to channel activity, only continue to apply where absolutely necessary.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the maximum permitted speeds for each type of aircraft during (a) the run-up to simulated targets and (b) practice interceptions and fighter evasion, during low-level sorties at (i) 250 ft and (ii) 100 ft, in the United Kingdom low-flying system; and if he will indicate the date on which each specified limit was introduced.

Mr. Hanley: For military aircraft operating in the United Kingdom low-flying system at 250 ft above ground level, the maximum speed permitted overland during run-up to simulated targets or during practice interceptions is 550 knots, except for F111 and F15E aircraft which are limited to 520 knots and Hawk aircraft which are limited to 500 knots. The maximum speeds for military aircraft flying at 100 ft above ground level are as follows:

Military aircraft	Knots
Jaguar	520
Tornado	500
Hawk	480
Harrier GR5/7	420

Speed restrictions for most of the aircraft concerned were introduced in January 1991, although further restrictions were introduced for Jaguar and F15E aircraft in April 1992.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many Royal Air Force fast jet pilots currently hold a qualification to fly at 100 ft above ground level.

Mr. Hanley: The information is not available.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many operational low-flying sorties were authorised in (a) the Borders tactical training area, east, and (b) the Borders tactical training area, west, in each month from January 1991 to the latest available date.

Mr. Hanley: Figures showing the number of operational low-flying sorties flown in the borders tactical training area are not available. However, the number of operational low-flying movements authorised into the borders tactical training area, east, and borders tactical training area, west, in each month from January 1991 to the latest available date are as follows:

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what information has been collected since the Royal Air Force Strike Command trial in 1988-89, on the amount of actual low flying carried out by Royal Air Force aircrew.

Mr. Hanley: Since mid-1989 information has been collected showing the amount of time spent in different height bands by Royal Air Force Strike Command aircraft while operating in the United Kingdom low-flying system. Collection of the information continues.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence on what date the first operational low-flying sortie took place in the Borders tactical training area, west.

Mr. Hanley: Operational Low Flying was first carried out in the borders tactical training area, west, on 29 June 1988.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what records are held of low flying between the hours of 11 pm and 7 am.

Mr. Hanley: Records of low-level sorties flown between these times will be held on the flight authorisation sheets held by flying stations and on the low-level booking sheets held by the tactical booking cell at RAF West Drayton. Such sorties are not, however, separately identified in the statistics maintained for central management purposes.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what measures have been adopted since 1989 to achieve a more even distribution throughout the working week of low-flying training over the United Kingdom.

Mr. Hanley: Every effort is made to ensure as even as possible a distribution of activity throughout the working week, subject to the constraining factors of aircraft availability, support and engineering staff availability, range opening times, normal operating hours of the United Kingdom low-flying system and suitable weather conditions.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what restrictions are placed on low flying in low-flying area 16; and what advice is given to aircrew booking into that area, when low-flying area 20 is active.

Mr. Hanley: Low flying is normally permitted down to a minimum height of 250 ft minimum separation distance within the whole of low-flying area 16. When low-flying area 20T—the borders tactical training area—is active, aircraft not conducting operational low flying are not permitted to operate below 500 ft in that part of LFA 16 which overlays LFA 20T. Aircrew are notified of the times when LFA 20T is active by means of notices to airmen.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will place in the Library a copy of the March 1989 report on the Royal Air Force Strike Command investigation of the amount of low flying carried out by aircrew.

Mr. Hanley: The document requested is classified and cannot be released.

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many operational low-flying sorties were authorised in the area covered by the Borders tactical training area in each year between 1979 and the formal incorporation of the training area in 1984.

Mr. Hanley: No operational low flying was conducted in the area now covered by the Borders tactical training area between 1979 and November 1983, when a six-month trial of operational low flying was begun in the area prior to its formal incorporation into the United Kingdom low-flying system in 1984. During this period, a total of 373 movements were authorised into the borders tactical training area.

Civil Aircraft (Interception)

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the regulations governing the practice interception of non-co-operating civil aircraft by Royal Air Force fighters.

Mr. Hanley: Royal Air Force regulations specifically state that no practice interceptions are to be made on civilian aircraft.

Bosnia

Mr. Cummings: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what winter apparel has been issued to date to British forces serving in central Bosnia; and if he will make a statement;

(2) when the British forces serving in central Bosnia will be issued with Arctic kit including special warm clothing during the winter; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: Issues of winter clothing to British troops in central Bosnia commenced on 14 November 1993. The majority of troops have been issued with winter clothing items including cold weather caps, arctic gloves, wristlets, arctic socks, face masks, Norwegian shirts, wet weather boots and cover-alls. A delay in issuing winter clothing to a small percentage of the troops has been experienced due to the closure of the route between Split and Vitez. The route has now been reopened and all troops have now been issued with the full complement of winter clothing.

IMS Ltd.

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many staff were employed by IMS Ltd. at each location in each year between 1987 and 1991.

Mr. Aitken: IMS is a private limited company, which ceased trading in July 1991 and is in the process of rundown. Internal management matters are the responsibility of the company. However, figures from the company's published annual accounts are available as follows:

1987	160 employees (114 United Kingdom based)
1988	132 employees (102 United Kingdom based)
1989	96 employees (65 United Kingdom based)
1990	61 employees (42 United Kingdom based)
1991	29 employees (three United Kingdom based)

Tornado

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what changes have taken place in the requirements for competency in medium and/or high altitude weapons delivery for operational Tornado aircrew over the past four years.

Mr. Hanley: Since 1991, crews are required to complete two medium-level weaponry profiles prior to being awarded combat ready status. They are then required to complete 12 medium-level weapons profiles as part of the aircrew annual training syllabus. In addition, designated thermal imaging and laser designator crews are afforded extra sorties as are those on specific operational duties. Weapon delivery can only be undertaken at low and medium level by Tornado aircraft.

Live Weapons (Carriage)

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the regulations governing the carriage of live weaponry on military aircraft using civil airports in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Hanley: Military aircraft carrying live weapons plan not to use civil airports in the United Kingdom. Where, for safety reasons, an aircraft has to land as a matter of urgency however, an approach and landing may be made to a civil airport. In such cases the airport authorities are informed that weapons are being carried before the aircraft lands. On landing, all necessary precautions are taken to ensure the safety of the public and surrounding area.

Arms Transfers

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what steps he intends to take to encourage international responsibility in arms transfers.

Mr. Aitken: The United Kingdom is an active participant in a number of multilateral export control regimes covering weapons of mass destruction. These include the missile technology control regime, Nuclear Suppliers Group and Australia Group—which deals with chemical and biological weapons. Through our membership of the EC and P5 we have agreed harmonised criteria concerning the export of defence equipment. We are also involved in the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe and negotiations among COCOM partners, the latter relating to replacing COCOM controls with an arrangement to cover conventional arms and dual-use equipments more generally. The United Kingdom has been at the forefront of moves to promote greater transparency in conventional arms transfers through the United Nations register of conventional arms.

Nuclear Test Ban Treaty

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans Her Majesty's Government have to discuss with non-governmental organisations the present status of instruments of verification, as part of the policy announced in the Queen's Speech to take part in negotiations towards a verifiable and comprehensive nuclear test ban treaty.

Mr. Hanley: We are currently considering how best to establish cost-effective and sufficient verification measures as part of our policy to move towards a verifiable and comprehensive nuclear test ban treaty. We will consult non-governmental bodies as necessary.

Forces (Suicides)

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the number of suicides recorded in Her Majesty's forces in each of the last five years, and the ethnic breakdown of these.

Mr. Hanley: According to our records, the number of deaths in the armed forces recorded as suicide in each of the last five years is as follows:

	Numbers
1988	42
1989	36
1990	48
1991	43
1992	35

Of the 43 personnel who committed suicide in 1991, two were Gurkhas. No further information in respect of the ethnic origins of those who committed suicide is available.

Desert Storm Syndrome

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many current or former service men have contacted his Department since August indicating they believed themselves to be suffering from Desert Storm syndrome arising from toxic poisoning or uranium contamination during the Gulf war.

Mr. Hanley: Three former members of the armed forces have contacted my Department since the beginning of August believing themselves to be suffering from medical conditions which they attribute to exposure to oil fire smoke—one individual—or to depleted uranium—two individuals. In the same period, a further two former service men have contacted my Department believing themselves to be suffering from symptoms connected to their service in the Gulf, but without specific reference to the possible causes. There have been no such approaches in the period from serving armed forces personnel.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what steps he has taken to monitor the congressional hearings currently being held into claims that service men involved in the Gulf war, including United States service men on joint operations with United Kingdom service men, are suffering from Gulf war syndrome.

Mr. Hanley: Members of the British embassy and defence staff in Washington have attended the recent congressional hearings and have forwarded to my Department comprehensive details of the discussions which have taken place. They are also actively liaising with the Department of Defence, Health Service and Veterans Affairs officials to ensure that the United Kingdom is kept fully up to date with current developments, including any further congressional hearings which may take place.

Lockerbie

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the current radius of the avoidance area around the town of Lockerbie.

Mr. Hanley: It is not our practice to release detailed information on flying restrictions in individual areas.

Depleted Uranium

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list those countries he knows to possess depleted uranium bullets or shells.

Mr. Hanley: The United Kingdom, the United States and Russia have publicly acknowledged that they have depleted uranium ammunition.

Civil Servants

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list for each civil service grade in his Department (a) the total number of persons employed and (b) the total number of women employed.

Mr. Aitken: The following information relates to staff employed at 1 April 1993, and shows full-time, part-time and full-time equivalent numbers, which count part time as half.

There are some 500 departmental grades and some 850 industrial grades used in the Ministry of Defence, most of which are managed locally. A detailed breakdown of these could only be provided at disproportionate cost and effort.

Nuclear Weapons

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how his policies discourage non-nuclear countries from developing nuclear weapons of their own.

Mr. Hanley: A total of 157 countries have already committed themselves to non-nuclear weapon status by acceding to the nuclear non-proliferation treaty as non-nuclear weapon states. We look to these states to honour their obligations under the treaty. We extend to all of them our standard security assurances which remove the fear that nuclear weapons might be used to coerce non-nuclear states. We play an active part in defusing regional tensions which might fuel proliferation. We continue to urge the remaining 28 non-parties to the treaty to accede at the earliest possible date. We have demonstrated our readiness to reduce our own nuclear force levels wherever we can. We are ready to participate fully and constructively in negotiating a verifiable comprehensive test ban treaty.

Pindar Project

Mr. Spellar: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what investigations he has conducted into cost overruns on the Pindar project.

Mr. Hanley: Pindar project costs have been the subject of a number of thorough reviews and the lessons learnt are being implemented.

Aircraft Interceptions

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the regulations governing the conduct of practice interceptions by aircraft carrying live air-to-air missiles.

Mr. Hanley: The regulations are: prior to a specific alert state, only designated United Kingdom quick reaction alert—(Interceptor) QRA(I)—aircraft, with a properly constituted crew may carry out interceptions with an aircraft armed with missiles or gun and missiles. During QRA(I) scrambles, a live armed QRA(I) aircraft may intercept its designated target provided the aircraft captain ensures that:

Airways traffic is avoided

The firing trigger is not operated

The sighting system aiming point is not placed on the target

Before closing below 10 nautical miles with the target aircraft, the fighter pilot is to confirm with the intercept controller that the "armament safety check is complete."

The only exception to this regulation is training undertaken by air defence aircraft in the Falkland Islands where practice interceptions with armed aircraft are permitted but against other military aircraft only.

Ministerial Speech

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will place a copy of his speech to the Centre for Defence Studies on 16 November in the Library.

Mr. Hanley: Yes.

WE177 Nuclear Bomb

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his policy on the future of the WE177 free-fall nuclear bomb in relation to the introduction of the Trident submarine.

Mr. Hanley: We plan on exploiting the flexibility and capability of the Trident system to provide the vehicle for our sub-strategic deterrent when the WE177 eventually leaves service.

Trident

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what will be the factors taken into account by his Department when determining the size of the United Kingdom's strategic nuclear capability deployed on Trident.

Mr. Hanley: We will deploy on Trident only the minimum nuclear capability which we judge necessary to provide effective deterrence, presenting any potential aggressor with the prospect of unacceptable damage.

Minehunting

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the United Kingdom's minehunting capability.

Mr. Hanley: The Government are committed to retaining a capable and effective mine counter measures fleet. We therefore intend to continue over the next decade with our modernisation programme, which will entail the procurement of further Sandown class single role minehunters and a mid-life update for the Hunt class. The 1993 statement on the Defence Estimates makes clear our intention to build up to a fleet of 25 of these highly capable vessels. We expect to make an announcement on future orders for the Sandown class shortly.

Mr. David Hart

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence on what basis he has employed Mr. David Hart to work in his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: Mr. Hart is not an employee of the Ministry of Defence. He is one of several people who provide informal and unpaid advice to my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Defence from time to time.

ENVIRONMENT

Local Government Finance

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the amount of loan debt for each local authority in England in its capital account, excluding debt related to trading services, for the year 1992-93, together with his estimate of the amount of capital expenditure not authorised by Her Majesty's Government.

Mr. Baldry: Statistics on loan debt excluding trading services debt are no longer collected by the Department. However, the Chartered Institute of Public Finance and Accountancy publishes figures for most local authorities. The most recent publication is "Capital Payments, Financing and Debt Statistics 1991-92".

The amount of capital expenditure undertaken by local authorities is entirely for them to determine within the resources available to them. Central Government support for authorities' capital expenditure is set out in the statistical supplement to the "Autumn Statement"—"Public Expenditure Analyses to 1995-96: Statistical Supplement to the 1992 Autumn Statement", Her Majesty's Treasury 1993, Cm 2219.

Ms Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will specify for each local authority the amount of accumulated capital receipts.

Mr. Baldry: I am arranging for information on the usable receipts held by each local authority in England at 1 April 1993 to be placed in the Library of the House.

Amusement Arcades

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many times the planning inspectorate has overruled local authorities and allowed the establishment of amusement arcades opposite the entrances to secondary schools since 1979.

Mr. Baldry: This information is not held in the inspectorate's records.

Overseas Visits

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many overseas visits he has made since his appointment; and if he will list the places visited, the costs of the visits and the cost to public funds.

Mr. Gummer: Since my appointment I have made four overseas visits. They are:

Places Visited and Purpose	Cost of Visit £
New York
To address the UN Commission on Sustainable Development	9,321·50
Luxembourg
Meeting of the Environment Council	1,013·12
Brussels
Bilateral with the EC Commissioner	870·30
Monte Carlo
To support Manchester's bid to host the Olympic games	2,517·55

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many visits abroad he has made during 1993; and what was (a) the cost to public funds and (b) the purpose of each visit.

Mr. Gummer: Since January 1993 either I or my right hon. and learned Friend the then Secretary of State have made 10 overseas visits. They are:

Places Visited and Purpose	Cost of Visit £
Washington
Discussions with the relevant members of the new Administration	12,024·37
India
Discussions on international environmental issues of importance to both India and the United Kingdom	5,586·36
Brussels

Places Visited and Purpose	Cost of Visit £
Informal Environment Council	822·93
Canada
International Environment Ministers Conference	6,689·13
Lucerne
European Environment Ministers Conference	1,162·58
Nairobi
Meeting of the United Nations Enviroment Programme Council	7,916·32
New York
To address the UN Commission	9,321·50
Luxembourg
Meeting of the Enviroment Council	1,013·12
Brussels
Bilateral with the EC Commissioner	870·30
Monte Carlo
To support Manchester's bid to host the Olympic Games	2,517·55

Rents

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what the average cost rent will be for social housing produced at (a) current and (b) projected housing association grant levels for (a) 1994-95 and (b) 1995-96.

Sir George Young: The cost rent of any housing association development will vary depending on the nature of the particular development and the circumstances of the individual association.

Local Government Review

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the local authorities he has visited since his appointment; and what is the total number of representations and correspondence he has received concerning the local government review.

Mr. Gummer: Since my appointment, I have visited the following local authorities:

Monday 14 June — Manchester city council
Wednesday 14 July — Liverpool city council
Friday 16 July — Nottinghamshire county council
Wednesday 8 September — Derby city council
Wednesday 29 September — Southend-on-Sea borough council
Wednesday 29 September — Thurrock borough council
Wednesday 13 October — London borough of Tower Hamlets
Friday 15 October — South Cambridgeshire district council
Tuesday 19 October — London borough of Newham
Friday 22 October — Gloucester city council
Monday 8 November — Kent county council
Gravesham borough council
Dartford borough council
Gillingham borough council
Thursday 11 November — Leicester city council
Friday 12 November — Peterborough city council

A total figure for the number of items of correspondence I have received on the Local Government Commission's reviews is not available, except at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what discussions have taken place with the Local Government Commission concerning the possible creation of a new unitary authority straddling the Yorkshire and Lancashire border.

Mr. Baldry: The Local Government Commission has discretion, where it judges it necessary, to make a formal request to my right hon. Friend that the area of review be extended to include localities bordering on that area. The commission has not made such a request in respect of either the Humberside, Lincolnshire and North Yorkshire or the Lancashire review areas.

Mrs. Angela Knight: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what decisions he has reached on the Local Government Commission's reports on Derbyshire and on Cleveland and Durham; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: I have today written to Sir John Banham, chairman of the Local Government Commission, about the commission's reports "Final Recommendations on the Future Local Government of Derbyshire" and "Final Recommendations on the Future Local Government of Cleveland and Durham".

Having considered the commission's recommendations for Derbyshire and County Durham, together with representations made to me, I am not at present satisfied that the proposals in respect of those areas meet the criteria in section 13(5) of the Local Government Act 1992. I am still considering the commission's recommendations for Cleveland.

I have therefore, under section 15(6) of the Local Government Act 1992, directed the commission to conduct further reviews of Derbyshire and County Durham, having regard to the revised policy and procedure guidance issued to it on 2 November and 22 November respectively.

As with the other reviews which I announced on 22 November, I have directed the commission to start on 13 December 1993 and to report on or before 30 December 1994. I will be discussing target dates for final reports with the commission when it has consulted local authorities in these two areas.

These two reviews were conducted in accordance with the original policy guidance which I issued to the commission in July 1992. The revised policy guidance which I issued on 2 November clarified the Government's views on a number of issues, including unitary authorities and the importance of local consensus. Representations have been made to me by local authorities in Derbyshire and Durham that they should be given the opportunity to make fresh proposals on the basis of the new guidance. I consider that the local authorities and people of these areas ought to be given that chance.

A copy of my letter to Sir John Banham has been placed in the Library.

GATT

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of the implications for (a) the United Kingdom environment and (b) the environment of the United Kingdom's trading partners of the implementation of the proposals in the Uruguay round of the general agreement on tariffs and trade.

Mr. Yeo: A successful outcome to the Uruguay round of the general agreement on tariffs and trade will bring lower tariffs on goods and a significant liberalisation of trade in services from which all countries will benefit. This should increase the resources available to finance environmental improvements and should help to promote sustainable development.

Radioactive Waste

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he has taken to implement paragraph 22.4 of chapter 22 of the Agenda 21 report from the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development, on the minimisation of generation of radioactive wastes.

Mr. Yeo: Paragraph 22.4 of the Agenda 21 report from the United Nations Conference on Environment and Development reflects current United Kingdom policies and practices.

Inner-city Initiative

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will name each urban programme authority and state the amount of aid they have received under each Government inner-city initiative since 1979.

Mr. Baldry: Several Government Departments contribute to urban regeneration through a wide range of programmes. The total support provided by my Department's targeted urban group of programmes since 1981 is as follows:

	Outturn prices £ million
1981-82	160
1982-83	283
1983-84	326
1984-85	449
1985-86	437
1986-87	428
1987-88	516
1988-89	598
1989-90	817
1990-91	970
1991-92	987
1992-93	987
1993-94	[1]927

[1] provision

Comprehensive information for all eligible areas is not readily available. Further information by programme is set out in the relevant departmental annual reports and public expenditure White Papers.

Planning Inspectorate

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the workings of the planning inspectorate and list the number of occasions on which it has overruled local authorities in each year since 1979.

Mr. Baldry: The information requested is listed.

Section 78 Planning Appeals

Household Waste

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of the applicability of the German household waste management system to the United Kingdom.

Mr. Yeo: The approach taken in Germany to household waste management, as epitomised by the recent German packaging ordinance, has resulted in the collection of large quantities of recyclable material, without a corresponding increase in domestic processing capacity or market demand. The resulting imbalance between supply and demand has depressed prices for recyclable material across Europe. This approach proved very costly to German consumers and industry and has put at risk the recycling infrastructure in other EC member states.

The lessons which we have learned are the importance of setting realistic targets for the recycling and recovery of waste; of gearing those targets to the development of processing capacity and markets; of involving local authorities in the collection rather than insisting on separate waste collection systems; and of giving energy recovery from waste a role where recycling is not practicable or environmentally beneficial.

We believe that industry is in the best position to devise the most efficient and cost-effective means of achieving high recovery levels. That is why, in our producer responsibility initiative, we have challenged the packaging industry to devise a plan by Christmas to secure recovery of between 50 per cent. and 75 per cent. of all packaging waste by the end of the decade.

London Pensions Fund Authority

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how many people are employed by the London Pensions Fund Authority; and what is its total annual salary expenditure;

(2) what is the total area of office accommodation occupied by the London Pensions Fund Authority; what is the rent per square foot; and what is the total annual cost of its accommodation.

Mr. Baldry: In its annual report and accounts for the year 1992-93, the London Pensions Fund Authority reported that there were 99 members of staff at the financial year end. The annual report also indicated that salary expenditure for the year was £2,359,000 and premises costs were £1,276,000. The total area of the office accommodation and the rent per squre foot are questions for the authority to consider and I have written to the chairman asking him to reply direct to the hon. Gentleman on these points.

1 Victoria Street, London

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects the building contract in respect of work at 1 Victoria street, London SW1 to commence; and what is the total cost incurred to date by his Department in respect of these premises since they were vacated in September 1991.

Mr. Gummer: Property Holdings and DTI have concluded negotiations with the freeholders. DTI has now commenced work on the refurbishment of this building. The total cost incurred during the period the building has been empty is £4·4 million up to 9 November 1993.

Toxics Release Inventory

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to introduce a toxics release inventory for pollution management along the lines of the system used by the United States Environmental Protection Agency.

Mr. Yeo: As announced in April this year, an annual inventory of releases of polluting substances, from processes subject to regulation by Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution under the integrated pollution control system introduced by part I of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 and under radioactive substances legislation, is being established. Detailed information will be available through the public register arrangements under both regimes and the first inventory data will be published in due course.

Biodiversity

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he last met the executive director of the United Nations Environment Programme to discuss the United Nations treaty on biodiversity.

Mr. Yeo: I met Elizabeth Dowdeswell, the executive director of UNEP, earlier this month when she was on a short visit to the United Kingdom. We discussed a number of issues of common interest including the convention on biological diversity.

National Recycling Forum

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment at what level his Department was represented at the National Recycling Forum's annual meeting on 24 and 25 November.

Mr. Yeo: My Department maintains a wide range of contacts on recycling with businesses, trade associations, local authorities and voluntary bodies but was not represented at the National Recycling Forum's annual meeting in November.

Development Agencies

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the development agencies together with their directors; and how much has been paid to each director, including expenses, in each of the past five years and this year to date.

Mr. Gummer: Information about the remuneration of chairmen, deputy chairmen and members appointed to non-departmental public bodies for which I am responsible is contained in the annual HMSO publication "Public Bodies", copies of which are held in the House of Commons library. "Public Bodies 1993" will be published shortly. I shall write with a list of current board members. Similar lists for the past five years are not available. Information on expenses is not held within the Department.

Dioxin Emissions

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has received from the European Council of Vinyl Manufacturers regarding the proposals arising from its recent study on dioxin emissions from VCM and PVC plants.

Mr. Yeo: My Department is not aware of having received any information from the European Council of Vinyl Manufacturers regarding its recent study on "dioxin" emissions from VCM and PVC plants.

Housing

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what percentage of council properties in England is unfit to rent.

Sir George Young: Local authorities report the numbers of their own dwellings that are unfit, whether occupied or not, in their annual housing investment programme—HIP1—returns.

Some 150,000 council properties in England, 4 per cent. of the total number of local authority dwellings, were reported as unfit at 1 April 1993.

Waste Management Licences

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects waste disposal licences under the Control of Pollution Act 1974 to convert automatically to waste management licences under the Environmental Protection Act 1990.

Mr. Yeo: It is the Government's intention to bring the waste management licensing provisions of part II of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 into force on 1 May 1994. Waste disposal licences will convert automatically to waste management licences on that day.

Council Tax

Mr. Hutton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many appeals against banding under the council tax have been made in the current year; what is the average length of time taken to hear those appeals; and how many were successful.

Mr. Baldry: I would refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Raynsford) on Friday 26 November, Official Report, column 259.

A meaningful figure cannot yet be given on the average length of time taken to hear appeals, since a great many cases are being settled by agreement between the taxpayer and the Valuation Office agency, and only a few have been transmitted as appeals to valuation tribunals.

Thermal Oxide Reprocessing Plant

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) whether he has received written representations from the European Commission or any EC member states concerning an environmental impact assessment of THORP under EC directive 85/337/EEC;

(2) if he will list those countries which have written to his Department concerning an environmental impact assessment of THORP under EC directive 85/337/EEC; and what his reply was, placing copies of all correspondence in the Library, including copies of any correspondence with the Commission.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the European Commission inquiry into the legality of the THORP project.

Mr. Yeo [holding answer 24 November 1993]: The United Kingdom has received a letter from the Commission seeking information in relation to the thermal oxide reprocessing plant at Sellafield in Cumbria. Since the start of the second consultation period on the revised draft authorisations for Sellafield, letters referring to directive 85/337/EEC have been received from Ministers of the Republic of Ireland and Denmark, and Ministers of Sweden, Norway and the Netherlands have written about environmental impact assessments in connection with Parcom recommendation 93/5. Correspondence between the United Kingdom and the Commission or foreign Governments is treated in confidence.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Personal Investment Authority

Mr. French: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he last met the chairman of the Securities and Investments Board to discuss the future of the Personal Investment Authority; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Nelson: I meet the chairman regularly to discuss SIB's responsibilities under the Financial Services Act 1986, which include the recognition of self-regulating organisations.

Incomes

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the minimum income (a) of the 1 per cent. with the highest incomes and (b) of the 10 per cent. with the highest incomes for each year since 1979 at current prices; and what were these figures at constant 1993 prices.

Mr. Nelson: The figures are given below.

Gross personal income
The top decile point and top percentile point for persons aged 16 and over

£ per year

	At current prices		At constant 1992 prices
	Top 10 per cent.	Top 1 per cent.	Top 10 per cent.	Top 1 per cent.

1992	20,300	44,700	20,300	44,700

The figures in the table are rounded to the nearest £100. The constant price figures are calculated using the retail prices index.
Source: Central Statistical Office, based on family expenditure survey.

The figures should be treated with considerable caution as they are subject to large sampling errors because of the small sample sizes, particularly for the top 1 per cent.

EC Budget

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are the present positions of the European Commission and other member states of the EC in the Council of Ministers towards the means of funding the EC and of the possible increase in the resource base of the EC beyond the present own resources.

Sir John Cope: When it met in Edinburgh on 11 and 12 December 1992, under the chairmanship of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, the European Council reached a rigorous agreement about the Community's finances for the period to 1999. My right hon. Friend reported the conclusions to the House on 14 December 1992, Official Report, columns 23-40. They remain the position of the member states and the Commission. Discussions are currently in progress in Brussels about the Commission's proposals for a new own resources decision to give effect to the changes agreed by the Edinburgh European Council to the own resources system.

Capital Gains Tax

Mr. Mandelson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give for each year since 1979 the total tax yield from individual gains tax and inheritance tax; and if he will give for each year since 1988-89 the number of individual taxpayers liable for capital gains tax by their highest marginal rate of tax.

Mr. Dorrell: The available information on net receipts each year since 1979-80 from capital gains tax, capital transfer tax and inheritance tax is given in the table. Separate figures on capital gains tax receipts for individuals and trusts are not available, but, in terms of tax liabilities, individuals account for between 85 per cent. and 90 per cent. of the total.

Taxation

Mr. Mandelson: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give for each year since 1979 (a) the total income, both earned and unearned (b) the total national insurance contributions and (c) the total income tax paid by (i) the top 1 per cent., (ii) the top 5 per cent., (iii) the top 10 per cent., (iv) the bottom 50 per cent. amd (v) all taxpayers.

Mr. Dorrell: Readily available estimates based on the survey of personal incomes are in the tables. For 1978-79 and 1989-90, married couples are counted as one taxpayer and their incomes are combined. Following the introduction of independent taxation, for 1990-91 onwards, husbands and wives are counted separately. The estimates of total income relate to income subject to income tax and exclude non-taxable income such as certain social security benefits.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Robert B. Jones: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the current average cost of preparing answers to (a) written and (b) oral parliamentary questions.

Mr. Dorrell: The current average cost of preparing an answer is assessed as £97 for a written question and £225 for an oral question.

Lending Institutions

Mr. Darling: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what proposals he has to bring centralised lending institutions within the scope of the Financial Services Act 1986 and the Banking Act 1987.

Mr. Nelson: The Financial Services Act applies to firms carrying on investment business in the United Kingdom. The Banking Act applies to firms engaged in deposit taking in the United Kingdom. There are no plans to amend the scope of either Act.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Law Commission Report

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department when he proposes to bring forward legislation to enact the recommendations of the Law Commission contained in its report "Landlord and Tenant Law: Privity of Contract and Estate", No. 174; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John M. Taylor: Legislation to give effect to the Government's decision to implement the recommendations in the Law Commission's report "Landlord and Tenant Law: Privity of Contract and Estate"—Law Com. No. 174—for future leases, but not for existing leases, will be introduced as soon as there is a suitable opportunity.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Arts Funding

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what representations he received on 23 November in regard to the risks to continuity and innovation in the arts of cuts in public funding.

Mr. Brooke: I received a number of representations on 23 November and I have since had a meeting with representatives of the National Campaign for the Arts, the group which organised the lobby of Parliament on that day.

London Orchestras

Mr. Simon Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what meetings he has held with representatives of (a) the London Philharmonic orchestra, (b) the Philharmonic orchestra and (c) the Royal Philharmonic orchestra since the beginning of the Arts Council's review of the funding of the London orchestras; and if he will make a statement on the matters discussed during such meetings.

Mr. Brooke: I have held no such meetings.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Hong Kong

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to repeal the Broadcasting Authority Ordinance in Hong Kong before the handover of the colony in 1997.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The Hong Kong Government intend to enact in 1994 an omnibus broadcasting Bill to consolidate and update the present legislation on television broadcasting. On enactment of the omnibus broadcasting Bill, the Broadcasting Authority Ordinance will be repealed. This proposal is not related to the transfer of sovereignty in 1997.

Mr. Sims: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whose responsibility it will be to submit an annual report on adherence to the international covenant for civil and political rights within Hong Kong to the United Nations after 1997; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: China is committed under international law in the joint declaration to ensure that the provisions of the international covenant for civil and political rights as applied to Hong Kong will remain in force after 1997. The responsibility for submitting reports on Hong Kong after 1997 will therefore pass to China. We are discussing with the Chinese in the Sino-British joint liaison group the mechanisms by which this might be achieved.

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the future of Radio Television Hong Kong.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The Hong Kong Government are continuing to consider the question of corporatisation of Radio Television Hong Kong. No final decisions have been taken.

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of whether the Emergency Regulations Ordinance applicable in Hong Kong is in conflict with the Bill of Rights Ordinance.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The question of whether the Emergency Regulations Ordinance applicable in Hong Kong is consistent with the Bill of Rights Ordinance is currently under review by the Attorney-General of the Hong Kong Government. This review is expected to be completed in December.

Christians (Persecution)

Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action he proposes to take over the persecution of Christians for their faith in Pakistan.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory : We have regularly raised with the Pakistani Government our concerns about the treatment of all minorities in Pakistan including Christians. My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs most recently raised this issue during his visit to Pakistan earlier this month. We shall continue to make known our concerns.

United Nations Centre for Human Rights

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many fax machines the United Nations Centre for Human Rights has.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The United Nations office in Geneva operates a central fax system, with hourly distributions. The Centre for Human Rights has one fax machine of its own.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what view he has formed about the adequacy of the resources available to the United Nations Centre for Human Rights.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: We regard human rights as a priority of the United Nations. The resources now available to the Centre for Human Rights do not allow it to carry out all the tasks mandated to it. We support the efforts of the United Nations Secretary-General to increase substantially the resources available to the centre from within existing and future regular budgets, through redeployment from areas of lower priority.

Matrix Churchill

Mr. Robert Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what provision is made in the recent compensation claim made through his Department by MC Realisation—Matrix Churchill—to the United Nations to include money to compensate the ex-employees of Matrix Churchill.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Price Waterhouse acting as administrative receivers has submitted a claim to the United Nations Compensation Commission on behalf of MC Realisations (Birmingham) Ltd.—in receivership—formerly Matrix Churchill Ltd. However, we cannot divulge the content of this or any other of the claims submitted. Requests for information on the substance of the claim should be addressed to Price Waterhouse.

Sudan

Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what action he proposes to take over the persecution of Christians for their faith in Sudan.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: We have made clear to the Sudanese Government, both bilaterally and with other member states of the European Union, our growing concern at their record on human rights and their lack of respect for fundamental freedoms, freedom of religion among them. We were active at the last session of the United Nations General Assembly and the United Nations Commission on Human Rights in highlighting the situation in Sudan, and in particular in securing the appointment of a public rapporteur. The rapporteur has now issued an interim report, and hopes to visit Sudan again shortly.

Ascension Island

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to safeguard the numbers of sea birds on Ascension Island.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The programme of feral cat culling has been enhanced by the setting of more traps. The success rate has been good. Since January this year up to the end of October, 269 cats had been culled. The administrator has installed a barrier at the entrance to the breeding grounds to prevent access by vehicles. This has substantially reduced the risk of damage to eggs by people walking near to nesting sites. We shall keep the situation under review.

BBC World Service

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many staff the BBC World Service had (a) in 1991-92 and (b) 1992-93; and how many it has at present.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: In 1991-92 the total staff complement of the BBC World Service, including BBC Monitoring, was 2,826. The equivalent figure for 1992-93 was 2,941. At the end of September 1993 there was a total of 2,920 staff.

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many hours of programmes to (a) Africa and (b) Europe the BBC World Service broadcast in (i) 1991-92 and (ii) 1992-93; and how many hours will be broadcast in 1993-94.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The information requested is as follows:

	1991-92 hours	1992-93 hours	1993-94 hours
Sub-Saharan Africa	13,500	13,850	14,310
Europe	21,550	22,060	23,240

Each regional total includes broadcast figures for World Service in English.

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to increase funding for the BBC World Service.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Plans for future funding of the BBC World Service will be disclosed in due course.

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what were the transmission hours of the BBC World Service (a) in 1991-92 and (b) 1992-93; and what will be the transmission hours in 1993-94.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: In 1991-92, World Service's total transmitted hours were 42,436, and in 1992-93, 43,797. The estimate for 1993-94 is 45,220. These figures do not include programme material not directly broadcast but sent via satellite, on disc or on cassette, to be available for local rebroadcasting.

There is also a significant amount of local rebroadcasting from direct transmissions. Figures for these are: 1991-92, 2,895 hours; 1992-93, 15,527 hours; and the estimate for 1993-94 is 18,700 hours.

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his most recent estimate of the number of people living outside the United Kingdom who listen to BBC World Service broadcasts.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Latest estimates by the BBC World Service, based on audience research, indicate that the regular global audience for World Service broadcasts in all languages, outside the United Kingdom, is in the region of 130 million. This figure does not include any information on audiences in certain countries, such as China, Burma and Vietnam, where reliable data are not available.

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what funding has been made available to the BBC World Service in (a) 1991-92, (b) 1992-93 and (c) 1993-94.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The total grants-in-aid to the BBC World Service were £156·75 million in 1991-92 and £166·91 million in 1992-93. The total provision for 1993-94 is £175·87 million. These figures include the Ministry of Defence contribution to BBC Monitoring.

HOME DEPARTMENT

London Prisons

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to meet governors of London prisons to outline his policy on prison matters; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: My right hon. and learned Friend currently has no plans to meet governors of London prisons. On 3 November he made a speech about imprisonment to the prison service conference, to which senior governors were invited.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to extend privatisation and market testing in the prison service in London.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the director general of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from D. Lewis to Mr. Jeremy Corbyn, dated 30 November 1993:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply directly to your recent Question about privatisation and market testing in the Prison Service in London.

As the then Home Secretary announced on 16 February, the court escort and custody service in the Metropolitan Police District is to be contracted out in 1994. The contracted service will be phased in beginning in July 1994. The other identified candidates for market testing in the Prison Service in London are the work of the Parole Board Secretariat, some registry work and some information technology work. Consideration is being given to what further candidates might be added.

You will also be aware of the Home Secretary's announcement on 2 September that about 10 per cent. of prisons, twelve in all, will be managed by the private sector. No decision has been made as to whether any of these establishments will be in London.

Secure Training Centres

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the time scale for the building of the proposed secure training centres; and where the centres are to be located.

Mr. Maclean: The creation of secure training centre places will start as soon as possible after the necessary legislation has been enacted. The Government have announced their intention to introduce such legislation in this Session of Parliament. No final decisions have been taken about where secure training centres will be located.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what guidance his Department intends to issue on the referral of juvenile offenders to the proposed secure training centres.

Mr. Maclean: The secure training order will be a sentence of the court. The statutory criteria for the order will be set out in the forthcoming criminal justice Bill.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how his Department will monitor and run the proposed secure training centres; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: Secure training centres are to be provided by agreements with organisations from the public, private or voluntary sectors following a process of competitive tendering. A draft specification issued on 30 July to potential providers indicated the likely requirements of the type of regime operating in the centres. Arrangements for monitoring regimes in these centres will be included in legislation which I will shortly be introducing.

Murder (Life Sentences)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will instigate a review to consider changing the law in respect of mandatory life sentences for murder; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: We have no plans to instigate such a review.

Racial Offences

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total number of prosecutions for incitement to racial hatred (a) in each year since 1965 under section 5(1)(a) of the Public Order Act 1986 and (b) for each year since 1987 under sections 17 to 23 of the Public Order Act 1986; how many of these prosecutions have been successful in each relevant year under each Act; and how many prosecutions under each Act in each relevant year have been against ethnic minority individuals or groups.

Mr. Maclean: I will write to the hon. Member.

Football Offences

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total number of prosecutions for each relevant year to date under section 3 of the Football (Offences) Act 1991; and how many of these in each year have been successful.

Mr. Maclean: In England and Wales in 1991 there were six prosecutions under section 3 of the Football Offences Act 1991, five of which resulted in a conviction.

For 1992—which is provisional—there were 31 prosecutions under section 3 of the aforesaid Act which resulted in 17 convictions.

Juvenile Offenders

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how many juveniles were (a) cautioned and (b) prosecuted by the police in (i) Barnsley, (ii) Doncaster, (iii) Rotherham, and (iv) Sheffield for each year since 1990 and this year to date; and how many of those prosecuted were committed by the courts;

(2) how many juveniles convicted of a crime in (a) Barnsley, (b) Doncaster, (c) Rotherham, and (d) Sheffield had committed an offence which was drug related, in each year since 1985 and for this year to date.

Mr. Maclean: The available information is given in the tables. It is possible to identify separately only those who have been cautioned or convicted for drug offences. It is not recorded, for other offences, whether they were drug related.

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what were the most common crimes committed by persons aged under 16 years in the Lancashire constabulary's Pennine F division for each year since 1985; and of those juveniles convicted of an offence over this period, what was the average sentence served.

Mr. Maclean: Information collected centrally shows only the police force area in which the crime was recorded. The tables show the number of juveniles aged 10 to under 16 years of age cautioned, convicted and the average sentence length given by type of court in the Lancashire constabulary for 1985 to 1992.

Illegal Immigrants

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list by police force, and by year for the last five years, the number of United Kingdom people arrested helping illegal immigrants into this country; how many were subsequently found guilty in the courts; and what sentence they received.

Mr. Maclean: Information on arrests is not collected centrally. Neither is the nationality of an offender recorded. The tables show the number of defendants prosecuted at magistrates courts and tried at the Crown court for the offence of "knowingly facilitating or assisting the entry of an illegal entrant" under section 25(1) of the Immigration Act 1971 by police force area and result for the years 1988 to 1992.

Prison Overcrowding

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the present level of prison overcrowding as a percentage for each prison in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the director general of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from D. Lewis to Mr. Keith Vaz, dated 30 November 1993:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about overcrowding in each prison in the United Kingdom.

The table shows those prisons in England and Wales that were overcrowded on 24 November. The percentage overcrowding is calculated from the extent to which population exceeds the certified normal accommodation (CNA) available for use.

Protection of Property

Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he intends to review the doctrine of minimum force in relation to the actions a home owner may take to protect himself and his property.

Mr. Maclean: On 16 November, the Law Commission published the report of its review of offences against the person—Law Com 218, a copy of which is in the Library. The commission's review of the law in this area covers the issues raised in this question. The Government are presently giving careful consideration to the commission's report.

Girl Prisoners

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his answer of 23 November 1993, Official Report, column 29, on what grounds his Department considers that holding girls of 16 and 17 years with adult women prisoners is the best option for holding them, in their own interests.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Twenty girls under 18 years old are held with other female young offenders in establishments which also hold adult women. These arrangements allow them the freedom and choice of activities available in a larger community that would not otherwise be possible. Holding them separately would involve either a national unit for their detention, and consequent dislocation from their home area and a weakening of family ties, or keeping them in very small isolated units. Neither option would serve their best interests.

Mr. Thomas Mason-Rushton

Mr. Corbett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what specific steps he will now take to ensure that Mr. Thomas Mason-Rushton, presently held in Her Majesty's prison Whitemoor, is guaranteed immediate access to the medical treatment for his known medical condition.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the director general of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from D. Lewis to Mr. Robin Corbett, dated 30 November 1993:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about the medical treatment for Mr. Thomas Mason-Rushton who is at Whitemoor prison.

Mr. Mason-Rushton is at present suffering from a chronic infection. A specialist physician with considerable experience of the management of Mr. Mason-Rushton's condition visits the prison at regular intervals. Mr. Mason-Rushton refuses to see this specialist, however, or to become involved in any of the other locally available medical facilities relating to his illness. It would seem that this is because Mr. Mason-Rushton wishes to return to a London prison to visit a particular London hospital. This is despite there being adequate NHS facilities throughout the country for the treatment of his condition.

There is 24 hour nursing cover at Whitemoor and a doctor on call around the clock. In the event of an emergency, Mr. Mason-Rushton would be transferred immediately to the appropriate local NHS hospital.

Immigration Detention Centres

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) when he plans to cease holding asylum seekers in the Prison Service;

(2) by how many places he intends to increase immigration detention centres.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The opening of Campsfield House detention centre on 29 November provided 200 additional detention spaces. In addition, we plan to increase the number of places available in immigration detention centres by another 135. However, there will be a continuing need for some detainees held under powers contained in the Immigration Act 1971—including some asylum applicants—to be accommodated in Prison Service establishments for the foreseeable future.

Blakenhurst Prison

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the capacity of Her Majesty's prison Blakenhurst as specified by contracts; what is the current number of prisoners at the prison; how many have been transferred to other prisons in recent weeks; what current plans there are for transfer to other prisons; and to which prisons prisoners have been sent.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the director general of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from D. Lewis to Ms Joan Ruddock, dated 30 November 1993:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply directly to your recent Question about the numbers of prisoners at HMP Blakenhurst.

The certified normal accommodation of Blakenhurst prison is 649 but the contract provides that the roll should grow at the rate of approximately 100 prisoners per month. The target under the contract is that the prison should reach capacity by the end of the year. In fact, the number of prisoners on 26 November was 625 and the population reached as many as 644 on 23 November. Between 1 and 26 November 98 prisoners were transferred to other prisons.

It is, of course, a primary part of the function of a local prison to classify prisoners and to allocate them to trainers and the 98 movements were part of these normal arrangements. There are no special plans to transfer prisoners from Blakenhurst. Prisoners have been transferred from Blakenhurst to Ford, Bullingdon, Stafford, Ashwell, Sudbury, Featherstone, Hewell Grange, Channings Wood and Brockhill.

Prison Ships

Mr. Hutton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the statutory provisions which authorise the use of prison ships.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Sections 33, 35 and 36 of the Prisons Act 1952—as amended by section 87(8) of the Criminal Justice Act 1991—deal with the Secretary of State's powers to provide prisons.

We are considering this legislation carefully to see whether it would cover the use of marine detention vessels. We would not attempt to hold prisoners in such vessels unless we were satisfied about the legality of such action.

Metropolitan Police

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what stage the market testing of operations undertaken by the Metropolitan police service has reached.

Mr. Charles Wardle: A market-testing programme for the Metropolitan police which covers the period up to August 1995 has been prepared. The estimated annual value of the areas of work involved is £85 million.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department why a letter to him from the chair of the Association of London Authorities about asylum seekers and refugees dated 9 November 1992 was not responded to until 14 October 1993.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Between October 1992 and November 1993, over 1,500 written representations were received from hon. Members, interested organisations and members of the public about general asylum issues. The small unit dealing with this correspondence was also responsible for supporting the passage of the Asylum and Immigration Appeals Act 1993 which came into force in July this year. The priority which had to be given to the new legislation regrettably resulted in long delays in replying to general correspondence.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many asylum seekers are currently detained in Britain and of those how many are being held with (a) people convicted on criminal charges and (b) people awaiting trial.

Mr. Charles Wardle: On 29 November 1993, 472 people detained under the powers contained in the Immigration Act 1971 had claimed asylum. Information about those held with convicted prisoners and people awaiting trial is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Remand Prisoners

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many remand prisoners were being held in police cells in London on the last day for which figures are available.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the director general of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from D. Lewis to Mr. Jeremy Corbyn, dated 30 November 1993:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about the number of prisoners in police cells in London.

No remand prisoners are currently being held in police cells in London and it is many months since such action was necessary.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the cost per day of holding a remand prisoner in (a) a police cell and (b) prison.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the director general of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from D. Lewis to Mr. Jeremy Corbyn, dated 30 November 1993:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about the daily costs of holding a remand prisoner in (a) a police cell and (b) prison.

In 1992-93 the average daily cost of holding prisoners was £254 in police cells and £75 in local prisons and remand centres. The costs of remand prisoners are not recorded separately from those of other inmates.

Crime Prevention Board

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) how the effectiveness of the National Board for Crime Prevention will be measured;

(2) what quantifiable targets have been set for the National Board for Crime Prevention.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The National Board for Crime Prevention was set up earlier this year as one element of the Government's crime prevention strategy. It is an ad hoc advisory body whose members serve voluntarily and without remuneration. As the board has no executive powers, it would not be appropriate to set performance targets for it.

The board has identified its initial priorities as retail crime, car crime, and young people and crime. Only when its recommendations and advice are implemented can methods for measuring their effectiveness be devised.

Racial Harassment

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what measures the Government are promoting in the current Session of Parliament to prevent racial harassment.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The Government condemn racial harassment and fully support initiatives of the police and other agencies arising from recommendations of the racial attacks group.

We will be looking closely at the recommendations of the Home Affairs Committee following the investigation of racial attacks, and will be considering whether further Government action would be effective in helping prevent racial harassment.

Domestic Violence

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will make a statement on the zero tolerance campaign against domestic violence being undertaken by the Association of London Authorities;

(2) what resources he will allocate to support the Association of London Authorities zero tolerance campaign against domestic violence.

Mr. Maclean: The response to domestic violence involves a number of Government Departments whose work needs to be co-ordinated at ministerial level. Although such central co-ordination is important, the Government believe that effective action against domestic violence requires the commitment and involvement of local agencies, both statutory and voluntary, working in concert to develop local preventive strategies. The zero tolerance publicity campaign against domestic violence being undertaken by the Association of London Authorities is one such example.

Although the Home Office is unable to assist directly with the financing of the proposed publicity campaign, the issue of raising public awareness in this complex area is one which will be given early consideration by the ministerial group on domestic violence.

Regional Expenditure

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will provide a table showing for each standard region, with Greater London shown as a separate region, the total expenditure in 1992-93, and the budgeted expenditure in 1993-94, 1994-95 and 1995-96 in respect of (a) safer cities, (b) section 11 grants, part to be included in single regeneration budget, (c) ethnic minority grant and (d) ethnic minority business initiative.

Mr. Charles Wardle: I will write to the hon. Member.

Police Cells

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) whether remand prisoners will be held in police cells in London in the coming year;

(2) what additional resources will be provided to the Metropolitan police service to ensure adequate facilities for and security of prisoners held in police cells in London.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: It is not possible to give any assurance that remand prisoners will not be held in police cells in London in the future. A number of urgent measures are being taken to accommodate the ongoing rise in the prison population without resorting to the use of police cells.

In the event that prisoners have to be held in police cells, the arrangements for reimbursement of expenditure incurred by police forces in providing adequate facilities and security are set out in Home Office circular 36/1993 to clerks to police authorities and chief officers of police, a copy of which is in the House of Commons Library.

Prison Escapes

Mr. Hutton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many category C prisoners escaped from custody in each year since 1979; and how many were subsequently recaptured.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the director general of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from D. Lewis to Mr. John Hutton, dated 30 November 1993:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about how many Category C prisoners escaped from custody in each year since 1979 and how many were subsequently recaptured.

This information is not available in the form you request, and could only be obtained at disproportionate cost. Incidents of escape from custody are recorded according to the security category of the prison from which the prisoner escapes and not by the security category of the prisoner.

Information about escapes has only been recorded centrally since 20 June 1988. During the period 20 June 1988 to 31 October 1993 the number of prisoners who escaped from category C prisons is as follows:

Period	Number
20 June to 31 October 1988	45
1 November 1988 to 31 October 1989	98
1 November 1989 to 31 October 1990	124
1 November 1990 to 31 October 1991	185
1 November 1991 to 31 October 1992	138
1 November 1992 to 31 October 1993	102

Information about the recapture of escaped prisoners by the prisoner's security category could only be obtained at disproportionate cost. Of the total of 1,917 prisoners of all security categories who escaped from custody during the period 20 June 1988 to 31 October 1992, 1,750 have been recaptured, four died whilst unlawfully at large and 163 remain unlawfully at large.

TRANSPORT

Overseas Visits

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many visits abroad he has made during 1993; and what was (a) the cost of each visit to public funds and (b) the purpose of each visit.

Mr. MacGregor: I have made eight visits abroad so far during 1993. The cost of each visit, including some travel costs of accompanying officials, was as follows:

Destination	Date	Cost (£)	Purpose
Brussels	9 January	282	Speaker at Aviation Conference
Brussels	25 January	1,089	Joint EC Transport and Environment Council
Brussels	14-15 March	1,553	EC Transport Council
Oslo/Gothenburg	9-11 May	1,194	Fact-finding tour on congestion charging technology
Luxembourg	7-8 June	2,611	EC Transport Council
Paris	14 June	484	Paris Air Show
Luxembourg	19 June	2,523	Additional EC Transport Council
USA	12-16 September	7,450	To negotiate aviation liberalisation with United States Transportation Secretary and fact-finding tour on highways issues

West Coast Main Line

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the conclusions of the Hambros study into possible joint public/private sector financing initiatives for the west coast main line.

Mr. Freeman: I expect to be able to do so very shortly.

MV Avon

Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish the report of the inquiry into the incident in which the MV Avon ran ashore off Browndown, Gosport, on 21 July.

Mr. Norris: In accordance with normal practice in circumstances such as this, the report will not be published but a copy of the summary report will be provided to anyone who can show a legitimate interest.

Bomb-proofing

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what has been the cost, by location, of bomb-proofing the Department's premises.

Mr. Norris: It remains the Government's practice not to comment on security matters.

Trans-Pennine Study

Mr. Hendry: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement as to the outcome of consultations on the Trans-Pennine study strategy report.

Mr. Key: I have now considered all the replies to the consultation on the Trans-Pennine study strategy report.

The responses to that consultation were divided on the desirable way forward. While there were many who saw the need for improvements to the road network in the Pennine region for economic reasons, there were many who rejected any further major road improvements because of the likely impact on the natural environment.

I have therefore decided to end public uncertainty and proceed with a limited package of measures focused on particular problems. No new schemes will be added to the national roads programme at this stage.

Although the A69 was outside the study area it was identified as a significant strategic route in responses and I will consider the need and justification for its specific improvement in the programme review which is currently under way.

We have already recognised the strategic importance of the A66 in our current programme of improvements and I do not intend to propose further schemes for the A66 at this stage. There will be no improvements to routes east of the M65 at Colne.

The M62 will remain the main trans-Pennine route and we will be taking forward improvements to the motorway already in the national programme. Following the recent decision to take the M1-M62 link out of the programme, we shall be investigating the need for increasing the capacity of the relevant lengths of the M1 and M62, to deal with increasing levels of traffic, to improve road safety and help economic growth in the area. Any proposals for further improvements which may emerge from these investigations will be considered for entry to the trunk road programme at a later date, and would be subject to the usual consultations and statutory procedures.

We remain committed to our policy that no major development should take place in national parks, save in exceptional circumstances. We stand by our decision at the start of the consultation period that we will not upgrade the A628-A616 to dual carriageway through the Peak district national park. No additional major schemes will be added to the national programme in this corridor, although some minor, limited, schemes may be necessary to relieve environmental problems and improve safety.

Some respondents called for traffic restraint measures to be adopted in the Peak district national park. Whilst such measures would reduce traffic in the park they would also increase the pressure on the routes to the south of the park and so the Department will not be pursuing this option.

A number of responses asked us to look at the scope for transferring passenger traffic from road to rail. A Trans-Pennine rail study, undertaken by a consortium of local authorities and passenger transport authorities, has indicated that any improvements to the rail network would have only a marginal effect on road traffic flows.

London Transport

Mr. Tracey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will set financial objectives for London Transport.

Mr. MacGregor: I have today written to the chairman of London Transport in the following terms:

"As of course you know, Section 16 of the London Regional Transport Act 1984 gives me power to determine financial objectives which I consider it reasonable for London Regional Transport, or any of its subsidiaries, to achieve. This letter sets out the financial objectives which I have, with the approval of the Treasury and after consultation with London Transport, determined for London Underground Limited and London Buses Limited for the period up to and including the 1995-96 financial year. A separate letter from Handley Stevens to Alan Watkins sets out the objectives determined with respect to LT's other subsidiaries and activities.

London Underground Limited (LUL)

I do not need to emphasise the view which you and I both share that safety remains LUL's—and indeed LT's—top priority. I have also set objectives, agreed with you and now incorporated in LUL's Customer Charter, for the quality of service on LUL. The financial objectives for LUL complement these measures by seeking to ensure that the costs of operating the Underground system represent value for money and are kept to the minimum consistent with the achievement of your safety and quality of service objectives. In this connection, I greatly welcome the LUL Company Plan and the good progress made so far in implementing the improvements in efficiency and cost reductions that the Plan entails. The objectives set out below are based on achievement of the reductions in operating costs promised in the Company Plan programme in the autumn of 1991, which prompted Government to invest public funds in implementation of the Plan.

The objective, I have set for LUL unit costs (defined as operating costs, excluding depreciation and renewals, divided by loaded train miles) is that they should be reduced to no more than £16·20, in 1993-94 prices, for the financial year ending 31 March 1996.

I wish to supplement this objective by one in the form of the percentage which revenue represents of operating costs for LUL (for this purpose operating costs include depreciation but exclude renewals). The objective is that this percentage should be at least 105·6 per cent. for the financial year ending 31 March 1996. This figure is consistent with my unit costs objective and with the provision for depreciation for 1995-96 shown in your 1993 Corporate Plan, and the revenue forecast shown in that Plan as amended by your subsequent forecasts.

I also attach importance, in the context of the pursuit of value for money and cost reduction, to an increasing proportion of LUL's expenditure being subject to market testing. As you know, my officials are consulting LUL on the basis for setting precise targets in this regard. My intention is that such targets should attract bonus of at least 5 per cent. of salary in the Board Performance Bonus schemes for 1994-95 and 1995-96. I would also wish you to include in LT Annual Reports, starting with that for 1993-94, a report on progress on the LUL market testing programme, including a measure or measures showing as a proportion of the appropriate base the amount of work which has been market tested during the year in question, compared with the equivalent amount for the previous year.

Finally with respect to LUL, I would like to see the establishment of a measure, agreed with Government, showing the full economic costs to the public sector of the services provided by LUL. This should include a figure representing the opportunity cost of the asset base. This measure should be published in LT's Annual Report and Accounts for the year 1993-94 and for each subsequent year.

London Buses Limited (LBL)

The current objective is that LBL should achieve, for as long as this remains relevant, a 5 per cent. return on those of its tendered operations which are subject to "gross cost" contracts. We will set fresh financial objectives for bus services purchased by LT in the light of our recent announcement on the future of London's bus services. New targets for 1994-95 and 1995-96 will be set by the end of March 1994.

Public Accountability

As in previous years, performance and progress against these objectives, and against your safety and quality of service objectives, should be published each year in LT's Annual Reports and Accounts."

As my letter states, objectives with respect to LT's subsidiaries and activities, other than London Underground and London Buses, have been set in a separate letter from my Department to the LT's chief executive and deputy chairman, Dr. Alan Watkins. The following is a summary of these objectives:

LT Central Services. Gross costs to be no more than £57 million in 1993-94; a fresh objective for the period up to 1995-96 to be set by 31 March 1994.

Victoria Coach Station. Return on turnover to be at least 5·8 per cent. in 1995-96.

LT PASS. Total costs in 1995-96 to be no more than 2·6 per cent. of gross ticket sales.

LT Museum. Revenue in 1995-96 to be at least 56 per cent. of costs.

Dial-a-ride. Operating costs per trip in 1995-96 to be no more than £9·30, at 1993-94 prices.

LT Property. Net operating costs in 1995-96 to be no more than £1·6 million at 1993-94 prices. Rental income to increase by 1·1 per cent. in 1993-94. Targets for rental income in subsequent years, linked to an appropriate index of performance in the property market, to be set by 31 March 1994.

LT Advertising. Sale of LTA to be completed by 30 June 1994.

Coaches (Safety)

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many coaches in England and Wales were tested for roadworthiness in each year since 1979; how many failed this test; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Key: Vehicle testing is conducted by the Vehicle Inspectorate Executive Agency (VI). The annual statutory testing of public service vehicles began in 1982. The statistics are not produced on a regional basis and therefore relate to all first annual tests conducted in England, Scotland and Wales. Additional information on PSV testing and retests can be found in current and past editions of the VI annual report and accounts.

Year	Number of tests	Initial failures[1]	Final failures[2]

[2] Final failures are those following rectification of minor defects.
[3] Statistical information on initial failures is unavailable.

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many fatal coach crashes there have been in each year since 1979; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Key: The number of fatal coach accidents and their resulting fatalities are shown for each year from 1979 to 1992 in the table.

All accidents involving coach occupant fatalities

Severn Bridge

Dr. Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what were the annual average daily traffic flow figures for the Severn bridge, for each year since 1983 and the current year.

Mr. Key [holding answer 29 November 1993]: The figures are shown in the table. Since the start of one-way tolling on 26 April 1992 only westbound traffic flows were recorded, until 4 November 1993 when an additional automatic counting system was installed to monitor eastbound traffic.

Two-way flows Year to 31 March	Annual average daily traffic

PRIME MINISTER

National Identity Card

Mr. Spellar: To ask the Prime Minister, pursuant to his answer of 25 November, Official Report, column 107, which Departments are keeping the question of a national identity card under review.

The Prime Minister: The question of a national identity card scheme is a matter for the Home Office.

Housing

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Prime Minister if he expects to be able to meet the Government's commitment to provide 153,000 homes for those in housing need by the year 1995-96.

The Prime Minister: Yes.

Crime Prevention

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Prime Minister how often the ministerial group on crime prevention meets; when it last met; and in what form its deliberations are published.

The Prime Minister: The ministerial group on crime prevention meets about three times per year. The last meeting was held on 16 November 1993. Its most recent report, entitled "Reducing the Costs of Crime: Measures Taken by Government Departments", was published in November 1992; a copy has been placed in the Library of the House. The minutes of its meetings are not published.

Fund-raising Events

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list the fund-raising events for which (a) 10 Downing street and (b) Chequers have been used for events since he became Prime Minister; what events are planned for the future; and if he will make a statement.

The Prime Minister: Since November 1990 there have been a total of 31 receptions, dinners or other functions at No. 10 Downing street for charities or voluntary bodies and three at Chequers. The organisations concerned were:

(a) 10 Downing street
NSPCC
Surrey County Cricket Club Youth Trust
Lords Taverners
MENCAP
Age Concern
EUREKA
Wordsworth Trust
Huntington's Disease Association
Action Research
Anthony Nolan Bone Marrow Trust
National Council of Hospice and Specialist Palliative Care
Crossroads Care (two functions)
Animal Health Trust
ORT
Youth Clubs (UK)
ChildLine
Silver Trust
Marie Curie Cancer Care
Excalibur Scheme
Motability
Westminster Foundation for Democracy
London Community Cricket Association
International Spinal Research Trust
Cambridge Arts Theatre Trust
YMCA
Leeds International Piano Competition
Westminster Medical School Research Trust
The Shakespeare Globe Trust
National Council for Voluntary Organisations
Consortium for Street Children

(b) Chequers
MENCAP
ARC
CORDA

I am not prepared to give advance notice of functions at No. 10 or at Chequers, whether official or non-official.

Mr. Beith: To ask the Prime Minister what plans he has to permit fund-raising events to be held at No. 10 Downing street; which organisations will be eligible to apply for such functions; and what charges will be levied for the use of the premises, attendance of staff and other costs which might otherwise fall on public funds.

The Prime Minister: When charitable or other non-official events are held at No. 10 Downing street, the organisers are responsible for all catering and staff costs, as well as other miscellaneous direct costs. Organisers may use the kitchens or other facilities at No. 10 Downing street.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Prime Minister how many functions have been held at 10 Downing street since 5 July at which funds have been raised for political parties, or for which tickets have been sold for the benefit of political parties.

The Prime Minister: None.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make it his policy to allow 10 Downing Street to be made available to political parties other than the Conservative party for the purposes of fund raising.

The Prime Minister [holding answer 29 November 1993]: As under previous Administrations, the use of 10 Downing street for non-official or party functions is a matter for the Prime Minister.

Security and Intelligence Agencies

Sir David Mitchell: To ask the Prime Minister what is the expenditure of the security and intelligence agencies.

The Prime Minister: The aggregate provision for the security and intelligence agencies in 1994-95 will be around £900 million, including about £100 million for the attributed costs of Ministry of Defence personnel who mainly assist GCHQ in its functions. The provision for the agencies is planned to reduce by over 4 per cent. in the following two years.

Precise figures for the 1994-95 aggregate budget will be given in the main estimate for the new single intelligence vote, to be presented to Parliament next March, after appropriate charging arrangements for departmental support for the agencies have been determined.

The provision for 1993-94 is carried in part by the Cabinet Office—£197 million on class XIX, vote 2 "Cabinet Office: Secret Service"—and in part by the Ministry of Defenc, roughly 80 per cent. of the balance, and the Foreign Office, 20 per cent., which at present carry the whole of the cost of GCHQ.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Land Reclamation

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what initiatives his Department has taken to promote United Kingdom expertise in decontamination of soil and land reclamation.

Mr. McLoughlin: My Department works together with the Department of the Environment, and other bodies, on a number of activities to promote United Kingdom expertise in decontamination of soil and land reclamation. Some of these provide financial support for private sector projects in new technology—for example under the LINK, environmental technology innovation scheme and Euroenviron programmes.

DTI also promotes export opportunities in this area as part of our general support for the United Kingdom environmental industry, by improving the access of overseas firms to United Kingdom technology.

The Laboratory of the Government Chemist is active in promoting awareness of contaminated land and the need for investigation, as well as acting as a consultancy.

Green Business Parks

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the development of green business parks.

Mr. McLoughlin: I welcome any commercially sound development which helps business to improve its environmental performance or which furthers the growth of the United Kingdom's capability in the field of environmental technology and services.

Nuclear Industry

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on progress made in commissioning the Sizewell B nuclear plant.

Mr. Eggar: Nuclear Electric continues to make good progress on the Sizewell B project. The company is confident that the project can be completed within the timetable committed at the Sizewell B public inquiry and within budget.

Energy Advisory Panel

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the outcome of the first meeting of his energy advisory panel held on 22 November.

Mr. Eggar: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) on 26 November, Official Report, column 254.

Industry (Costs)

Mrs. Lait: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what evidence he has that the principle of best available techniques not entailing excessive cost is not causing excessive costs to British industry where it is applicable.

Mr. McLoughlin: I would refer my hon. Friend to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment and Countryside on 26 November, Official Report, columns 255-56.

Trading Standards Departments

Sir David Steel: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what estimate he has made of the effects of the local government review on the number of trading standards departments in (a) Scotland and (b) the United Kingdom.

Mr. McLoughlin: None. The effects will depend on the future number of local authorities and the arrangements made for trading standards functions to be carried out. Some authorities may join together to set up a combined trading standards department as have the five authorities in west Yorkshire.

Nirex Rock Characterisation Facility

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what information has been presented to justify expenditure on the Nirex rock characterisation facility; and if he will publish it.

Mr. Eggar: Expenditure proposals by UK Nirex Ltd. are a management matter for the company and its shareholders, who are represented on the board of the company.

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the latest cost estimate of the Nirex rock characterisation facility; on what date the planning application will be submitted; and what is the proposed date of its opening.

Mr. Eggar: These are management matters for UK Nirex Ltd. However, I understand that the company currently estimates the cost of constructing the rock characterisation facility at around £120 million, and that the company hopes to be in a position to submit the relevant planning application early in 1994. The applications and documentation accompanying it will include information about time scales.

EC Consumer Council

Ms Quin: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the outcome of the EC Consumer Council of 19 November.

Mr. McLoughlin: The Council discussed the draft timeshare directive, and agreed on a common position by a qualified majority vote.

Industry Council

Ms Quin: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the outcome of the Industry Council of 18 November.

Mr. Sainsbury: I would refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to her on 26 November, Official Report, columns 251-52.

Gas and Electricity (Standing Charges)

Mr. Madden: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what action he has taken to encourage gas and electricity companies to reduce or cancel standing charges, with particular reference to pensioner households; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: The level of standing charges is a matter for the Directors General of Gas Supply and of Electricity Supply respectively.

Combined Heat and Power, Leicester

Mr. Vaz: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the involvement of Warren Springs in the application by Leicester Combined Heat and Power to develop a CHP scheme in Leicester; what was the cost to public funds of this involvement; what are the position and salary scale of Dr. Rampling; on whose invitation Dr. Rampling attended the meeting in Leicester on 9 November; and what was the cost of attendance by Dr. Rampling at that meeting.

Mr. McLoughlin: I have asked the chief executive of Warren Spring Laboratory to write to the hon. Member.

Letter from D. Cormack to Mr. Keith Vaz, dated 26 November 1993:

Warren Spring Laboratory (WSL) has the remit to recover its costs through the execution of contract work for both government and non-government customers. In this case WSL was acting under contract to Leicester CHP Limited, to study the distillation of oil from waste tyre pyrolysis, to evaluate its possible use as a fuel for CHP application.

It is normal WSL practice to provide high quality objective scientific and technical data and evaluations, on all its contract work. This is recognised by its customers, and understood by all parties who may have an interest in any particular issue.

There was no cost to public funds of this involvement. All Dr. Rampling's activities, including meetings with interested parties at the invitation of Leicester CHP Ltd, are charged to Leicester CHP Ltd under the contract, at a rate which covers all his costs, including his salary, according to Treasury rules under which the Laboratory operates as a full economic cost recovery Agency.

Chad

Mr. Bates: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on trade with Chad.

Mr. McLoughlin: United Kingdom exports to Chad in the year to September 1993 were valued at £1·94 million up 55·02 per cent. on £1·25 million the previous year. In 1992 the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development United Kingdom market share in Chad was 2·1 per cent.; in 1991 it was 2·5 per cent. United Kingdom imports from Chad in the year to September 1993 were valued at £0·87 million down from £2·36 million for the year to September 1992.

Gas (Exempt Supplies) Act 1992

Mr. Duncan: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he expects to announce the commencement of the Gas (Exempt Supplies) Act 1992.

Mr. Eggar: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave him on 25 June 1993, Official Report, column 294. It is still our intention to bring the Gas (Exempt Supplies) Act 1993 into force by mid-1994.

Smoking

Mr. Sims: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what steps he is taking to enforce restrictions on smoking within his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: Smoking is permitted only in a few specified areas. A copy of my Department's current smoking policy will be lodged in the Library of the House.

Insolvency

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many investigations the Insolvency Service agency has conducted into independent practitioners during each year since 1990 and so far in 1993.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: The Insolvency Service undertakes routine monitoring visits to practitioners to test their compliance with the legislation. Detailed special inspections are carried out where the facts of the case suggest that this is merited. The following figures are on a financial year basis: detailed records were not maintained prior to 1991-92.

	Numbers
Monitoring visits
1991-92	31
1992-93	147
1993-94 (to date)	135
Special inspections
1991-92	2
1992-93	9
1993-94 (to date)	5

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when the Stoy Hayward review of the future of the Insolvency Service will be placed in the Library.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: I am currently considering what further work needs to be done following the Stoy Hayward review and shall announce to the House in due course what the next steps will be, including any plans for making public the contents of Stoy Hayward's report.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many independent practitioners have been struck off as a result of complaints made about their conduct to the Insolvency Service agency.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: Since the introduction of the requirement to be authorised in the Insolvency Act 1986, 12 insolvency practitioners have had their authorisations withdrawn by their respective authorising bodies. In 11 of these cases, the initial complaint was made to the Insolvency Service.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many complaints the Insolvency Service agency received about the conduct of independent practitioners during each year since 1990 and so far in 1993.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: The Insolvency Service agency does not keep a record specifically relating to complaints about the conduct of insolvency practitioners, but receives a range of correspondence relating to the administration of insolvencies.

Mr. Peter Joyce, the agency's chief executive, answered letters, some of which contained criticism of practitioners, totalling 26 in 1991, 85 in 1992 and 50 to 31 October 1993.

In addition, I and my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade have responded to letters from hon. Members concerning specific insolvencies totalling 399 in 1991, 355 in 1992 and 314 to 31 October 1993. Officials have answered on our behalf 207 letters in 1992 and 147 to 31 October 1993. Information on how many of these letters contained complaints about independent practitioners could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

No central record is kept of complaints about the conduct of insolvency practitioners made direct to official receivers.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how much of the Stoy Hayward review of the future of the Insolvency Service cost; and whether it came from the Insolvency Service agency budget.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: The cost of the review, which is commercially confidential, was paid for from Insolvency Service resources.

Insolvency Service

Mr. Mills: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what savings he estimates will result from the transfer of aspects of the Insolvency Service from his Department to the Association of Chartered Accountants and the Institute of Professional Accountants.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: Each of the professional bodies recognised by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to authorise insolvency practitioners has undertaken to commence routine monitoring of its own practitioners and is developing systems to take on this work which is presently carried out by my Department's Insolvency Service.

We presently expect there to be savings of between two and three man years in the long term as a direct result, but this is dependent on the continuing progress of the professional bodies towards becoming fully operational in this area.

British Coal

Mr. French: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what change has been made to British Coal's external financing limit for 1993-94.

Mr. Eggar: British Coal's external financing limit for 1993-94 has been changed from £1,880 million to £1,750 million. The revised financing requirement reflects reduced estimates of expenditure by the corporation.

Utilities (Meter Reading)

Mr. Ainger: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what representations he has received regarding fuel and power companies reading meters annually only, estimating the intervening bills; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: Representations received by my Department on these matters are passed on to the independent regulators who each have a duty to protect the interests of consumers.

Mr. Ainger: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what research his Consumer Affairs Division has carried out into the costs to consumers resulting from estimation of quarterly fuel and power bills by the companies.

Mr. Eggar: Representations received by my Department on these matters are passed on to the independent regulators who each have a duty to protect the interests of consumers.

Wind Power

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what percentage of electricity generated in Wales is attributable to wind power; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: As at 30 September 1993, the installed electrical capacity of wind projects in Wales commissioned under the first two orders of the non-fossil fuel obligation totalled approximately 86 MW, representing about 1·2 per cent. of the total electrical installed capacity of about 7 GW in the Principality. The proportion of electricity actually generated by wind in Wales will depend on a number of factors, including the performance of the non-wind plant.

Regulations (Impact Assessment)

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement setting out the detailed arrangements which will be adopted for the assessment of the impact on companies which will precede all future regulations, indicating what role businesses will play in that assessment and the way in which the results of the assessment will be published.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: The detailed arrangements for assessing the impact on companies of proposed regulations are set out in "Checking the Cost to Business: A Guide to Compliance Cost Assessment", a copy of which I am arranging to be deposited in the Library of the House. As indicated in paragraph 9, section 1 of this booklet, business should be encouraged to comment critically on the assessment so that the final assessment is as accurate as possible. The arrangements for publishing the results of the assessment for proposed domestic legislation were set out in my written reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Colchester, North (Mr. Jenkin) on 19 October, Official Report, column 202. The arrangements for publishing the assessments for proposed EC legislation were set out in the written reply by my right hon. Friend the Lord President of the Council to my hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, South-West (Mr. Page) on 19 July, Official Report, column 24.

Regional Grants

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will provide a table showing for each standard region, with Greater London shown as a separate region, the total expenditure in 1992-93, and the budgeted expenditure in 1993-94, 1994-95 and 1995-96 in respect of (a) regional enterprise grant and (b) English Estates.

Mr. Sainsbury: Details of expenditure on the regional enterprise grants scheme and by English Estates for 1992-93 are shown in the Industrial Development Act 1982 annual report, a copy of which has been placed in the Library of the House.

For 1992-93, the London city challenge and task force areas were eligible for regional innovation grants, the only part of the Greater London region eligible for either element of the regional enterprise grants scheme. Provision for regional enterprise grants in 1993-94 in England is £8·8 million. This is not allocated on a regional basis. The regional enterprise grants scheme in England is to become part of the single regeneration budget from 1 April 1994 as announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment on 4 November 1993, Official Report, columns 515-25. Figures for forecast capital expenditure by English Estates in 1993-94 are as follows:

Forecast expenditure (£ million)

	1993-94
North East	17·4
North West	19·2
Yorkshire and Humberside	9·6
West Midlands	1·0
East Midlands	1·8
South West	1·8
South East (former Chatham dockyard)	20·2
Greater London	0

English Estates will be incorporated into English Partnerships next spring. English Partnerships is currently in the process of drawing up its first corporate plan and regional budgets are not yet available.

Coal Industry

Mr. Kevin Hughes: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) what was the average figure for the last six months of cost per gigajoule for each British Coal pit;

(2) what were the average figures for output per man shift for the last six months for each of the pits in British Coal;

(3) what are the latest figures for output per man shift in each of the British coal pits;

(4) what were the figures for the costs per gigajoule of coal produced for each pit in the Northern region of British Coal for each of the last 12 months;

(5) if he will list the latest figures he has for costs per gigajoule of the coal being produced in each British Coal pit.

Mr. Eggar: These are matters for British Coal.

Mr. Kevin Hughes: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what were the figures for output per man shift for each pit in British Coal northern region for the last 12 months.

Mr. Eggar: This information is not available in the detail requested. The figures for the whole of the northern region were:

Average output per manshift worked

	Tonnes
1992
October	4·12
November	4·30
December	4·23
1993
January	4·58
February	4·99
March	5·48
April	4·26
May	4·03
June	4·43
July	6·61
August	6·13
September	6·17

Mr. Kevin Hughes: To ask the President of the Board of Trade on how many occasions Bentley colliery has been penalised in a contract for supply to electricity generators for (a) the chlorine content and (b) the sulphur content of its fuel.

Mr. Eggar: These detailed points relate to supply contracts and are matters for British Coal.

Mr. Kevin Hughes: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what figures he has, in terms of cost per gigajoule, on the prices being paid by electricity generators for British coal.

Mr. Eggar: The prices paid by the electricity industry to individual coal supplies are confidential to the companies concerned. The average price of all coal purchased by the major United Kingdom electricity generating companies is however published in table 26 of "Energy Trends", the Department's monthly statistical bulletin. In the second quarter of 1993 the average price was £1·64 per gigajoule.

Mr. Kevin Hughes: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) what were the profit and loss figures for each British Coal pit for (a) the last six months, (b) the first six months of this year and (c) each of the last three financial years;

(2) if he will list British Coal pits in order of profitability in the last 12 months;

(3) what was the total profit for each British Coal pit over the last five years.

Mr. Eggar: The profitability of individual pits is a matter for British Coal.

Redundant Steelworkers

Mr. Hardy: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if the maintenance of ISERBS—iron and steel employees readaptation benefits scheme—arrangements for redundant steelworkers in the United Kingdom will be considered at the next meeting of the appropriate committee of the EC.

Mr. Sainsbury [holding answer 26 November 1993]: Steel issues concerning the treaty of Paris are discussed in the European Coal and Steel Communities working group. We are aware of no plans for ISERBS to be on the agenda of the next meeting.

RECHAR

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the procedures for approving projects designed to attract Rechar money after 1 January 1994.

Mr. Sainsbury [holding answer 29 November 1993]: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave him on 2 November, Official Report, column 96.

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list those representations which he has received (a) in favour and (b) against the proposal to establish Rechar II.

Mr. Sainsbury [holding answer 29 November 1993]: I have received numerous representations, from both within and outside Parliament, with regard to the establishment of a Rechar II programme.

Postal Services

Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what assessment his Department has made of postal administrations, in Canada, the United States of America, Ireland, France, Germany, Italy, Sweden and the Netherlands; in respect of their (a) quality of service achievements for first class letters, (b) volume of mail delivered, (c) number of delivery points, (d) turnover and profit, (e) definition of monopoly position, (f) regulator (g) ownership and (h) proposals for privatisation.

Mr. McLoughlin [holding answer 29 November 1993]: As part of the Post Office review, we have considered developments in a number of countries, including those mentioned by the hon. Member and also others such as Australia and New Zealand.

My Department does not hold detailed information such as that sought on all the countries listed by the hon. Member. Some of the information is available for EC countries in the EC Commission's Green Paper—COM(91)476—published in June 1992. Geographical and other differences, particularly density of population, mean that such data are not always instructive in making comparisons between them or with the United Kingdom.

Important developments in overseas postal administrations include the abolition of the postal monopoly in Sweden from 1 January 1993 and the proposal of the Netherlands Government to sell a substantial stake in the postal administrations' holding company in 1994. Competitive reforms are being considered in most of the countries mentioned and some are considering the conversion of their postal administrations to plc status, with or without privatisation. There is, however, no set pattern of reform yet emerging in any of these areas.

We will continue to follow these developments with interest in reaching decisions on the Post Office review.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Child Support Agency

Mrs. Jane Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what is his latest estimate of the number of maintenance requirement assessments completed by the Child Support Agency since April;

(2) what is his latest estimate of benefit savings achieved by the Child Support Agency since April.

Mr. Burt: The administration of the Child Support Agency is a matter for Ros Hepplewhite, the chief executive. She will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from R. Hepplewhite to Mrs. Jane Kennedy, dated 29 November 1993:

I have been asked to reply to your Questions to the Secretary of State about estimates of maintenance assessments completed by the Child Support Agency since April 1993 and benefit savings achieved since April 1993.

The number of maintenance assessments completed to 31 October is 56,800. The benefit savings so far reported by the Agency in the same period is £142 million. This does not represent the total amount of savings achieved by the Agency because some are scored retrospectively.

I hope you will find this reply helpful.

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what target he has set the chief executive of the Child Support Agency for the time taken to respond to letters from hon. Members; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Burt: The administration of the Child Support Agency is a matter for Ros Hepplewhite, the chief executive. She will write to my hon. Friend.

Letter from R. Hepplewhite to Mr. David Lidington, dated 29 November 1993:

I have been asked to reply to your Question to the Secretary of State about the targets he has set for the time taken to respond to letters from honourable Members.

All letters from Members of Parliament addressed to me are acknowledged and I aim to respond within an average of 20 working days. Recent press interest has stimulated a great deal of correspondence from constituents and although that target is not being met at the moment, the necessary steps are being taken to ensure that correspondence from Members will be answered as promptly as possible.

I hope you will find this helpful.

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will give a breakdown of the representations received regarding the operation of the Child Support Agency on the basis of (a) sex of the applicant and (b) region; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Burt: Between April 1993 and November 1993 the Department of Social Security headquarters and the Child Support Agency headquarters received in the region of 3,000 written representations covering a range of views about child support issues.

The cost of establishing the number of written representations made to field offices and Child Support Agency centres would be disproportionately high. The number of representations made in person or by telephone, the region from which the people who have made representations came from and their sex is not recorded.

Mr. Hall: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the number of cases dealt with so far by the Child Support Agency, by constituency.

Mr. Burt: I understand from Ros Hepplewhite, the chief executive of the Child Support Agency, that information in the form requested is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

However, a report showing the agency's national performance is available each month in the Library.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how the chief executive of the Child Support Agency's performance-related pay is calculated; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Burt: The nature of the Child Support Agency chief executive's performance package was set out in my response to my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) on 5 November, at column 588. The amount of the chief executive's total remuneration in any year will be published in the agency's annual report for that year.

Repetitive Strain Injury

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if sufferers from repetitive strain injury qualify for sick pay.

Mr. Scott: Employers administer and pay statutory sick pay. Subject to the satisfaction of the other qualifying conditions, payment is made whenever the employer is satisfied that his employee is incapable of doing the work required under his contract of service, whatever the cause of incapacity.

Whether or not occupational sick pay is payable in these circumstances will depend on the terms of individual schemes.

Pensioner Incomes

Mr. Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the total number of single pensioners who are calculated for (a) income support purposes, (b) housing benefit purposes and (c) council tax benefit purposes, to have notional income from savings of £1, £2, £3, £4, £5, £6, £7, £8, £9, £10, £11, £12, £13, £14, £15, £16, £17, £18, £19 and £20 per week.

Mr. Burt: The information is in the tables. Details in respect of council tax benefit are not available.

[1] Single pensioners are defined as people in receipt of income support and/or housing benefit aged 60 or over who do not have a partner.

[2] The figures have been rounded to the nearest thousand.

Mr. Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what percentage of (a) single pensioners and (b) pensioner couples were receiving means-tested benefits in the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Burt: The information is in the tables:

	Number of cases	Percentage
Income support:
Single pensioners	1,463,000	33·3
Pensioner couples	254,000	9·8

3. Percentages are of the estimated numbers of single pensioners and pensioner couples in private households in Great Britain.

4. For income support, housing benefit, community charge benefit and disability working allowance pensioners are cases where the recipient and/or the partner are aged 60 or over. For family credit pensioners are cases where the main earner is aged 60 or over.

Mr. Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will express the value of the state pension for a single person as a percentage of average male earnings at April.

Mr. Hague: The answer is 15·9 per cent.

Source: Employment Department's new earnings suvey—all adults average weekly earnings.

Mr. Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his best estimate of the number of pensioner households with total weekly incomes below income support level.

Mr. Hague: Information is not available in the precise form requested. The latest estimates for the take-up of income-related benefits are for 1989 and show that there were around 1·3 million pensioners who were eligible for but not claiming income support.

Estimates of take-up of income support are subject to particular uncertainty because of under-reporting of receipt of benefit in the family expenditure survey on which the figures are based. This particularly affects pensioners who often fail to distinguish between retirement pension and income support which are paid as one combined payment.

Personal Pensions

Mr. Bates: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people paid contributions to a personal pension in the latest tax year for which figures are available; and how the total is divided between (a) the self-employed, (b) employees not contracted out of the state earnings-related pension scheme, (c) employees contracted out of SERPS paying only the minimum needed to contract out and (d) employees contracted out of SERPS paying more than the minimum needed to contract out.

Mr. Hague: The number of people paying contributions to a personal pension scheme during the financial year 1991-92 is in the table.

	Million
(a) Self employed contributors	0·5
(b) Employed contributors (not contracted out of SERPS)	2·2
(c) Employed contributors (contracted out of SERPS, receiving DSS minimum contributions to their scheme only)	3·0
(d) Employed contributors (contracted out of SERPS, making personal payments in addition to DSS minimum contributions)	2·1
Total	7·8

Notes:

1. Data derived from Inland Revenue Statistics.
2. The figure for the number of self-employed contributors is an estimate only.

Mr. Bates: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what assessment he has made of the proportion of the money contributed to a typical personal pension at the rebate only level by a man of 30 years which would be absorbed in expenses, charges and commission during the lifetime of the contract up to maturity;

(2) what assessment he has made of the proportion of the money contributed to a typical personal pension at the rebate only level by a man of 30 years which would be absorbed in expenses, charges and commission during the lifetime of the contract if it were terminated after five years;

(3) what assessment he has made of the proportion of the money contributed to a typical personal pension at the rebate only level by a man of 30 years that would be absorbed in expenses, charges and commission in the first year of the contract.

Mr. Hague: Charges associated with personal pensions vary according to the investment base underlying the policy and also between different personal pensions providers. Consideration of the level of charges associated with appropriate personal pensions is a matter for individual investors in their choice of scheme. The DSS has recently published a new guide for potential personal pension investors suggesting questions to ask before deciding on a scheme. The guide advises potential investors to ask about cost and benefits of schemes offered to them and to compare different products available.

Mr. Bates: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what proportion of those covered by personal pensions at the rebate only level are entitled only to the minimum benefits needed to contract out of SERPS.

Mr. Hague: All holders of appropriate personal pensions are contracted out of SERPS. The benefits received from a rebate only plan take the form of an annuity purchased with the fund produced by the investment of the rebate together with any incentives, additions and tax relief payable.

National Insurance

Mrs. Roe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether he has yet completed his review of national insurance contributions for 1994-95.

Mr. Lilley: I have completed the annual review under section 141 of the Social Security Administration Act 1992. My proposals will take effect from 6 April 1994. The levels of contributory benefit expenditure I am maintaining, and the extra help with fuel costs which I am making available to pensioners, widows and people receiving invalidity benefit, will mean a continuing shortfall in the national insurance fund between income and outgoings. The stability of the fund will be maintained partly by means of the Treasury grant introduced by the Social Security Act 1993 and partly by means of the 1 per cent. increase in national insurance contributions for employees and the self-employed which was announced in the Budget last March.

Employers and Employees

In line with the Social Security Contributions and Benefits Act 1992, the lower earnings limit for class 1 contributions is to be raised to £57 a week, which is the nearest whole pound to the basic retirement pension rate for a single person from April 1994. The upper earnings limit is to be raised to £430 a week which is slightly less than 7·5 times the new basic pension rate as provided by the Social Security Contributions and Benefits Act. These new earnings limits will replace the current ones of £56 and £420 respectively.

There will be no change to the initial rate of 2 per cent. payable by employees on the first £57 of weekly earnings, but the main rate payable on employees' earnings between £57·01 and £430 a week will increase from 9 per cent. to 10 per cent. as already announced.

For employers, I am proposing to reduce the standard rate of contribution from 10·4 per cent., to 10·2 per cent., a reduction of 0·2 per cent. I also propose to decrease, from the same date, the reduced rates which employers pay for lower-paid workers. The reduction will be 1 per cent., giving new rates for 7·6 per cent., 5·6 per cent. and 3·6 per cent. These reductions will therefore be especially helpful to employers of the lower-paid, often smaller employers, and should more than offset extra costs which employers meet as a result of changes to the reimbursement provisions for statutory sick pay.

The thresholds for the special reduced rates will also be raised so that from April 1994 they apply to weekly earnings which fall below the ceilings of £100, £145, and £200 respectively, compared with £95, £140, and £195 at present.

Not Contracted-Out Employees and their Employers

Neither the employee nor his employer will have to pay any contributions if earnings are less than £57 a week. Employees earning up to about £64 a week will pay slightly less in contributions. Employees earning above £64 but not more than the existing upper limit of £420 will generally pay more contributions, ranging from a few pence to £3·56. Employees with earnings above £420 a week will pay a maximum increase of £4·56. For employers, the reduction in their contributions will depend on the level of the employee's pay.

Contracted-Out Employees and their Employers

Those with earnings between £63 and £420—the former upper earnings limit—will pay more contributions, ranging from a few pence up to £3·58 a week more. Those who earn more than £420 will pay contributions on the next £10 of earnings from next April—up to £430 a week, the proposed upper earnings limit, a maximum increase of £4·40 a week. Contracted-out employees who earn £62 or less will pay the same or slightly less.

For employers, the reduction will again depend upon the level of employee's pay.

Self-employed people

Although contributions for employees are to increase, I do not propose to raise the flat rate class 2 contribution other than in line with inflation. It will therefore increase by 10p to £5·65.

However, class 4 contributions, payable by those self-employed people with profits above a certain level, will be increased by 1 per cent. to 7·3 per cent. The annual limits of profits will be raised to £6,490 and £22,360 from £6,340 and £21,840 respectively. Self-employed people who pay only class 2 contributions will pay an extra £5·20 a year in 1994-95.

The changes for class 4 contributions mean that some lower earners will pay less or no class 4 contributions; higher earners will pay a maximim of £187·21 more.

Class 3—voluntary—contributions

The rate of class 3 contributions will be raised by 10p to £5·55 a week.

National Health Service Allocation

The allocation to the national health service, currently 1·05 per cent. from employees and 0·9 per cent. from employers, remains unchanged.

Treasury Grant

In accordance with section 2(2) of the Social Security Act 1993, I propose to maintain the level of the national insurance fund during 1994-95 by means of a grant from the Treasury. I estimate that the grant required will be approximately 6·4 billion.

As usual, I shall by laying a draft order before Parliament together with a report by the Government Actuary describing the effects of my proposals.

Benefits (Uprating)

Mr. Leigh: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will set out details of the new rates of benefits proposed from April 1994 and the details of help to be made available to meet the cost of VAT on domestic fuel.

Mr. Lilley: The annual uprating of social security benefits will take place, as usual, in the first full week of the tax year—which in 1994 will be the week beginning 11 April.

Expenditure on social security will be £83 billion in 1994-95, £87·8 billion in 1995-96 and £91·7 billion in 1996-97. The settlement fulfils the Government's commitment to the needy, the sick, the elderly, to disabled people and to families. It gives the promised help to those who may have most difficulty in meeting the cost of VAT on domestic fuel.

I have reviewed social security benefits in accordance with section 150 of the Social Security Administration Act 1992. My proposals, which are set out in the schedule, fully reflect the commitment to increase all major benefits in line with inflation. The statutory instruments to implement them will be laid before both Houses for debate. My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland proposes to introduce similar changes for Northern Ireland.

All national insurance benefits will be uprated at least in line with the annual increase in the retail prices index up to September, which this year is 1·8 per cent.

In addition, all pensioners who receive a full basic pension, including those receiving income support, will gain an extra 50p per week for single people and 70p per week for couples to help meet the cost of VAT on fuel. This help will double in April 1995 when VAT on fuel rises to the standard rate. Widows and people receiving invalidity benefit, invalid care allowance, severe disablement allowance, war pensions unemployability supplement and disabled people on income support will receive similar increases in both April 1994 and April 1995.

Income-related benefits are normally uprated by the Rossi index—RPI less certain housing costs—which this year increased by 3·5 per cent. in the year to September. In April 1994, however, extra help will be provided to people receiving income support by bringing forward by a year the effect of VAT on domestic fuel on the Rossi index. Next April their benefits will go up by a total of 3·9 per cent. This is more than the rate at which earnings are rising. These increases will feed through into other income-related benefits: family credit, disability working allowance, housing benefit and council tax benefit.

Altogether, the total package of extra help through the social security system will be worth more than £1·5 billion over the next three years. More than 15 million people will gain. By paying the additional increase from April 1994, the Government have ensured that help will be available before payment is due on bills which include VAT.

The Government's success in keeping inflation low has maintained the value of benefits between upratings. This contrasts with the erosion of purchasing power between upratings during the high inflation of the 1970s. Since September, there has been a further welcome fall in the rate of inflation.

The main features of my uprating package are:

Retirement Pension

Retirement pension which is received by 10 million people will rise by £1·50 per week to £57·60 for a single person and by £2·30 to £92·10 for a couple. Not only does this mean a bigger rise next year but it builds in a permanent enhancement to the basic pension which will be uprated in future years.

Invalidity Benefit

Invalidity pension will increase by £1·50 to £57·60 per week for a single person and the basic rate of severe disablement allowance will rise from £33·70 to £34·80 per week.

Unemployment Benefit

Unemployment benefit for a single person will rise from £44·65 to £45·45 per week.

Child Benefit

Child benefit will be fully uprated in line with prices meaning £10·20 per week for the first or eldest eligible child and £8·25 for each subsequent child.

War Pensions

War pensions will be uprated fully in line with prices. Also, the special MOD payments to pre-1973 war widows, which are the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence, will rise in line with the RPI —from £47·84 to £48·70 per week.

Non-dependant Deductions

From next April, I propose to increase the level of non-dependant deductions to income-related benefits to £5, £9, £13 and £25 per week. At the same time, income thresholds and the thresholds for second adult rebates will be raised by up to £4 per week.

Residential Care and Nursing Home Limits

The limits for existing income support recipients living in residential care homes will be increased by £9 per week for the elderly and very dependent elderly, and by £7 per week for other groups. There will also be a £5 increase to the London extension for residential care homes. All nursing homes limits will be increased by £10. The residential allowance paid under community arrangements will be increased by £3 per week to £53 in London and £48 elsewhere.

Note: The Overlapping Benefits Regulations provide for the rate of child dependency increases, guardian's allowance and child special allowance to be adjusted where the increase or allowance is payable for the eldest eligible child for whom Chb is also payable. The weekly rate of the increase or allowance is reduced by the differential (less the 75p derived from the October 1991 increase in Chb) between the rate of Chb payable for the oldest eligible child and that payable for a subsequent child. This gives a rate of £9·80 (1993) and £9·80 (1994).

Income Support

Mr. Dewar: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people in receipt of income support are presently having mortgage interest payments made on their behalf; and what is the total cost to his Department at the latest date for which figures are available.

Mr. Burt: Five hundred and sixty-two thousand income support recipients have mortgage interest included in their assessment; the annual equivalent of the amount so included is estimated at £1,270 million.

Source: Income support statistics quarterly inquiry, February 1993.

Ministerial Hospitality

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security, pursuant to his answer of 23 November 1993 Official Report, columns 34-35, if he will specify the nature of the ministerial hospitality in his Department during the financial year 1992-93 for each event, giving the cost in each case.

Mr. Hague: Information is not available in the form requested. The main items of expenditure are in the table:

Expenditure on DSS Ministerial hospitality 1992-93

Minister of State's reception in honour of organisations representing disabled people	5,710·05
Ministerial hospitality at other smaller functions, totalling	6,845·84

Ministers (Private Residences)

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what visits have been made by officials to private residences of Ministers in his Department since April 1992.

Mr. Hague: Officials sometimes visit Ministers' private residences mainly to collect or drop off urgent papers. Records of such visits are not kept.

Ministerial Offices

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how much has been spent on furnishing and decorating Ministers' offices in his Department since April 1993.

Mr. Hague: There has been no such expenditure on Ministers' personal accommodation during the current financial year.

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how much has been spent on alcohol in Ministers' offices in his Department since 9 April 1992.

Mr. Hague: The total amount spent is £6,136·79.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Burundi

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) what is the Government's assessment of the level of humanitarian needs in Burundi; and what action the Government and the EC are taking to meet those needs;

(2) how much humanitarian aid has been sent from Britain and the EC to Burundi; and of this how much was designated for refugees.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We have provided £463,000 to United Nations agencies, the International Red Cross movement and Y Care International in response to their appeals for assistance for some 920,000 refugees and displaced Burundis. This includes £50,000 to the International Commission of the Red Cross for those in the north and east of the country. The EC has committed over 8·5 mecu including 3 mecu for those displaced in Burundi.

We remain ready to consider any further appeals for assistance to the region in collaboration with fellow donors including EC and other NGOs.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

POLIS (Searching)

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Chairman of the Information Committee what plans he has to increase the value and sales of the parliamentary on-line information system by (a) extending the coverage of parliamentary questions by allowing political party to be specified in the search terms and (b) developing the system to allow for free text on-line searching of Hansard.

Mr. Gary Waller: Access by users outside Parliament to the parliamentary on-line information system (POLIS) is via a commercial service provider who markets it on behalf of the House. The House receives income in the form of royalties. The ability to search the databases by political party is not available on the public version of POLIS and there are no immediate plans to include it. The full text of Hansard is available for purchase on CD-ROM disk, published by HMSO and Chadwyck Healey but is not available on the POLIS public user service.

I will arrange for the hon. Member's question to be drawn to the attention of the company which will be providing the POLIS 3 public user service.

Toilet Rolls

Mr. Barnes: To ask the Chairman of the Accommodation and Works Committee what is the latest available annual figure for the amount of money spent on the provision of toilet rolls, hand towels and soap in the Palace of Westminster.

Mr. Ray Powell: This is a matter for the Serjeant at Arms.

Veal

Mr. Morley: To ask the Chairman of the Catering Committee if he will list the last three occasions on which the House of Commons canteens served veal; and what was its country of origin.

Mr. Colin Shepherd: All veal purchased by the Refreshment Department is of British origin and reared by the Quantock method. Detailed operations of the Department are a matter for the Director of Catering.

HEALTH

GP Services

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what were the transaction and computing costs of general practitioner fund-holding schemes, in total and for each NHS region, both in cash terms and as percentages of total fundholding expenditure.

Dr. Mawhinney: This information is not available centrally. The hon. Member may wish to contact the chairmen of regional health authorities for details.

Consultants

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will publish a table showing the total number of finished consultant episodes within each English health region for (a) 1990-91, (b) 1991-92 and (c) 1992-93.

Mr. Sackville: The information is shown in the table.

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans she has to increase the number of consultants in the NHS.

Dr. Mawhinney: The Government encourage consultant expansion in line with the "Achieving a Balance" policy agreed with the medical profession and the national health service. However, it is a matter for each employing body to determine the number of consultants needed in each specialty in the light of local needs and competing priorities. Copies of "Achieving a Balance" are available in the Library.

Midwives

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action is being taken to encourage health authorities and trusts to offer midwife-only beds and midwife-only care to low-risk pregnant women in all maternity units.

Mr. Sackville: In September 1992, the national health service management executive wrote to all regional general managers listing issues needing to be kept under review. The list included the development of midwife led maternity services. More recently, in August 1993, the expert maternity group report "Changing Childbirth" emphasised that there are no legal restrictions preventing midwives from admitting women in labour to maternity unit beds. The report recommended, among other things, that the national health service should ensure that women can book with a midwife for their entire episode of care if that is what they want. This report has been the subject of wide consultation and comments on the report are being given careful consideration in the Department. Specific action to be taken in the national health service will be notified as soon as Ministers have completed their consideration of the responses to the report. Copies of both the letter and the report are available in the Library.

Perinatal Epidemiology Unit

Mrs. Wise: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will place in the Library a copy of a report of her Department's review of the national perinatal epidemiology unit, together with the report which the unit prepared for the review.

Dr. Mawhinney: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave to the hon. Member for Sheffield, Brightside (Mr. Blunkett) on 26 November at columns 242-44.

Sexual Harassment

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans she has to counteract sexual harassment in the NHS.

Mr. Sackville: Harassment at work in any form is unacceptable and should be treated as a disciplinary offence. Management and staff representatives in the Whitley council reached agreement last year on combating harassment at work. Employing authorities in the national health service are responsible for determining their own local policies on strategies to combat harassment at work, in line with this framework.

Acute Hospital Beds

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many patients die each year in acute hospital beds; and what percentage of patients with cancer die in acute hospital beds each year.

Mr. Sackville: In 1989-90, the latest year for which figures are available, an estimated 292,000 people died in national health service hospitals from all causes. Over the same period, 143,000 people died in England from cancer, of whom an estimated 63,000—44 per cent.—died in NHS hospitals.

Departmental Budget

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will publish the projected outturn figures for her Department's budget for 1993-94.

Mr. Sackville: The forecast outturn for Government spending in 1993-94 for health and personal social services is £30,053 million, of which outturn for the national health service is £29,215 million.

Immunisation

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans she has to include the Rubella vaccination alone among those girls who have not had the MMR vaccination in the targets for general practitioners.

Mr. Sackville: None. Rubella immunisation is recommended for schoolgirls aged between 10 and 14 years. The majority of these immunisations are given in schools as part of the schools health service. Where the vaccine is administered by a general practitioner a fee is paid. It would not, therefore, be appropriate to include rubella immunisation in the target scheme for general practitioners.

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what were immunisation rates for (i) BCG and (ii) rubella, which have not been part of the MMR programme, in each of the last five years.

Mr. Sackville: The information available is for numbers immunised in England for 1988-89 to 1991-92 as shown in the table. Data for 1992-93 are not yet available.

Number of Immunisations: 1988-89 to 1991-92

1989-90[1]	219	197
1990-91	199	479
1991-92	221	460

[1] The school BCG programme was suspended in 1989 as there were insufficient supplies of BCG vaccine.

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what percentage of targeted children receive the (a) DTP, (b) polio, (c) MMR and (d) HIB immunisation, by district health authority.

Mr. Sackville: Information available for DTP, polio and MMR for the financial year 1991-92 is shown in table 7 of statistical information on "Vaccination and Immunisation", a copy of which is available in the Library. No data are yet available about the take-up of Hib immunisation.

Notifiable Diseases

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many cases of (a) dysentery, (b) typhoid, (c) paratyphoid, (d) malaria, (e) tuberculosis and (f) jaundice were reported in 1992.

Mr. Sackville: The information is shown in the table.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people aged (a) 16 or 17 years and (b) 18 to 24 years living in the Don Valley constituency were unemployed according to the 1991 census; what this was as a percentage of each age group; and how this compares with the 1981 census.

Mr. Sackville: The available information is shown in the table. Statistics for age groups 16 to 17 and 18 to 24 could be produced only at disproportionate cost for 1981 and, at this stage, for 1991. Final 1991 census statistics for parliamentary constituencies will be available early in 1994.

Abortion

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list the number of terminations of pregnancy performed in England by regional health authority of the patient's usual residence for 1992.

Mr. Sackville: This information is not yet available centrally.

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health in how many regions of the NHS more terminations of pregnancy are performed in non-NHS hospitals than in NHS hospitals at the last date for which figures are available; what were the figures for the previous year; and what plans she has to ensure that access to the termination procedure within the NHS is consistent throughout the health regions.

Mr. Sackville: The information requested is shown in the tables for England for 1990 and 1991. Arrangements for abortion services under the national health service are the responsibility of individual district health authorities in the light of their assessment of local needs and priorities.

Fund-holding GPs

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what evidence she has received on the extent to which fund-holding patients are being seen ahead of non-fundholding patients who have greater clinical need.

Dr. Mawhinney: On investigation such allegations prove to be unfounded. Emergency and urgent cases are always given priority, and hospitals are prevented from offering contracts to one purchaser which would disadvantage the patients of another.

Geriatric Population

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will estimate the increase in the geriatric population in the next 10 years.

Mr. Sackville: There is no statistical definition of the term "geriatric population", but the population of the United Kingdom aged 75 and over is projected to rise from 3,974,000 in mid-1993 to 4,530,000 in mid-2003, an increase of 14 per cent. according to the Government Actuary's 1991-based projections.

London Ambulance Service

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for Health in what percentage of incidents the London ambulance service failed to meet its call-out time standards in the financial year 1992-93, and in each month to date of the current financial year.

Mr. Sackville: The percentage of calls to which the London ambulance service failed to respond within 14 minutes in 1992-93 and in each month April-October 1993, is shown in the table.

Public Health Medical Staff

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list for 1992 the number of public health medical staff by grade and sex.

Dr. Mawhinney: The available information is shown in the table. Information relating to Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland are matters for my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Wales and for Scotland and my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

[1] Whole-time equivalents.

Home Visits

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list for 1992-93 for health visitor services (a) the total number of persons visited at home by age group, (b) the total number of visits, (c) the total number of whole-time equivalent staff and (d) the total number of health visitor students.

Mr. Sackville: Information is collected centrally only on the number of whole-time equivalent health visiting staff and the total number of health visitor students. Data for 1992-93 will be available in summer 1994.

Cortico-steroids

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what changes have been made by the Medicines Control Agency concerning the information available for both doctors and patients arising from its investigation into the issue of immunosuppression in patients being treated with cortico-steroids and the possibility of infections including chickenpox; and if she will publish the report of the investigation.

Mr. Sackville: No changes have been made to date. This matter is still under consideration and advice is being sought from the committee on the safety of medicines.

Waltham Forest Health Authority

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action she is taking to reduce the projected deficit by Waltham Forest health authority; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Sackville: The projected deficit of Redbridge and Waltham Forest health authority will be managed by the district health authority with assistance from North East Thames regional health authority. The hon. Member may wish to contact Sir William Staveley, the chairman of the North East Thames regional health authority for details.

Key Workers (Care Programme)

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health who is responsible for training for key workers in their duties under the care programme approach; and how this will be funded.

Mr. Bowis: Health authorities, national health service trusts, local authority social services departments, and private and voluntary organisations involved in the delivery of mental health services, are responsible for ensuring that those members of their staff likely to be identified as key workers are trained in their duties under the care programme approach. Best professional practice is covered in pre-registration training courses for mental health professionals, which are funded centrally or regionally. Employing agencies meet the costs of any post-registration training they consider appropriate.

The Department is currently considering what further training is required for key workers.

Lexie McConnell

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action has been taken arising from the report by the chief executive of the management executive into the case of Lexie McConnell; and if she will make public his report.

Dr. Mawhinney: Following an investigation by the national health service management executive into the case of Lexie McConnell, there was found to be no denial of patients charter rights. A letter setting out these findings was sent to Mr. and Mrs. McConnell in July.

Occupational Health Service

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many medical and nursing staff worked in occupational health in the NHS for the last five years for which figures are available; and what were the grades of those employees.

Mr. Sackville: The information is shown in the table.

Mental Health

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when fresh guidelines will be issued, and what form the guidance will take, to ensure that psychiatric patients are not discharged from hospital inappropriately and that those who leave get the right support from the different agencies.

Mr. Bowis: The guidance, which is part of our 10 point plan for developing successful and safe community care, will draw together the principles and practices which should apply in assessing when psychiatric patients may suitably and safely leave hospital and in ensuring that the necessary care and support are provided when they do. Work on the guidance is well advanced and we shall be issuing it for consultation shortly.

Prescriptions

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list for each health authority in South Yorkshire the number of prescriptions issued where the patient was (a) exempt from NHS payment charges, (b) required to pay the NHS charge and (c) was a private patient.

Dr. Mawhinney: The available information is shown in the table.

Numbers (thousands) of prescription[1] items dispensed in family health services authorities in South Yorkshire in 1992

FHSA	Exempt[2]	Chargeable[3]
Barnsley	1,959	392
Doncaster	2,551	535
Rotherham	1,857	376
Sheffield	4,412	838

[1] The analysis is based on a 1 in 20 sample of all prescriptions dispensed by community pharmacists and appliance contractors only. Dispensing doctors, and prescriptions submitted by prescribing doctors for items personally administered, are not analysed into exempt, non-exempt or other categories.

[2] Exempt prescriptions also include prescriptions dispensed to patients entitled to charge remission under the national health service low income scheme, and prescriptions for contraceptives.

[3] Chargeable prescriptions include prescriptions dispensed to patients holding prescription prepayment certificates.

Notes:

Information is not collected on private prescriptions.

Influenza Vaccination

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list by regional health authority the current waiting time for people wishing to be inoculated against influenza; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Sackville: This information is not available centrally. I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Chorley (Mr. Dover) on 29 November at column 305 regarding influenza vaccine supply.

Special Needs Management Allowance

Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment she has made of the impact of reductions in the transitional special needs management allowance on projects providing homes for people with drink, drug and mental health problems.

Mr. Bowis: Transitional special needs management allowance is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment.

Ambulance Service (Doncaster)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what considerations underlie the classification of Doncaster as a rural area for ambulance purposes.

Mr. Sackville: The formula for classification of national health service ambulance services as urban or rural was introduced following the acceptance of a recommendation made in an independent consultant's report in 1990. Those ambulance services serving an area with an overall population density of greater than 2·5 people per acre were classified as urban. Others were classified as rural. The population density formula acknowledges the higher number of longer distance journeys travelled by ambulance services in less densely populated rural areas.

Doncaster falls within the overall area served by the South Yorkshire Metropolitan ambulance and paramedic service. That area is classified as urban.

Cancer (Funding)

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proportion of funding for work on cancer is allocated to screening and prevention programmes.

Mr. Sackville: This information is not available centrally.

NHS Trusts

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many chairmen of NHS trusts have not had their contracts renewed in each of the last three years.

Dr. Mawhinney: The number of chairmen of national health service trusts who have not been given a further term, or have stood down when their period of office expired, in each of the last three years is as follows:

1991 – None
1992 – 2
1993 – 14

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will replace the payment of salaries/emoluments to chairmen and non-executive directors of health authorities and NHS trusts with a system based on payment for loss of earnings.

Dr. Mawhinney: No.

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the numbers of female, male and ethnic minority directors, and chairs of NHS trusts, district health authorities and regional health authorities.

Dr. Mawhinney: Information is not available centrally for executive members or directors. For non-executives, some 36 per cent.—1,429 out of 3,920 chairmen and non-executive appointees to national health service authorities and trusts—are women. Three per cent., 117 appointees, are from ethnic minority groups.

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many hours a week a chairman of a national health service trust is required to work; and what is the hourly rate of remuneration.

Dr. Mawhinney: Chairmen of boards of national health service authorities and trusts are part-time appointments and minimum hours are not set. They are remunerated within a range £15,125 to £19,285 per annum according to the trust's turnover.

Intensive Care, Doncaster

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list by year for the last four years, and the current year to date for the Doncaster area the number of cases in which people with life-threatening conditions and in need of intensive care have been referred to hospitals outside the Doncaster area; to which hospitals they were referred; what assessment she has made as to the adequacy of intensive care provision in the Doncaster area for the coming winter months; what action she will be taking; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Sackville: This information is not available centrally. The hon. Member may wish to contact Mr. J Smith, chairman of Doncaster health authority for details.

Junior Doctors

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidelines she has issued on the amount of sleep junior doctors should have in each 24 hours and in each week.

Dr. Mawhinney: None.

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make a statement on the changes she has planned to the new deal for junior doctors.

Dr. Mawhinney: We have no plans at present to change the new deal for junior doctors.

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans she has to implement the new deal on junior doctors' hours.

Dr. Mawhinney: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave to the hon. Member for Bristol, South (Ms Primarolo) on 28 October at column 767.

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans she has to ensure that provider units meet targets set by her in the junior doctors' new deal.

Dr. Mawhinney: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave her on 28 October at column 767.

Health Service, London

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when she will announce her final plans for the restructuring of the NHS in London.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans she has for the future pattern of acute health care in London; and what financial arrangements have been made for the closure of hospitals in London in 1994-95.

Dr. Mawhinney: The Government's strategy for the future of London's acute health services is set out clearly in "Making London Better". Proposals for a number of specific changes to the pattern of services will be put forward shortly and, where appropriate, will be subject to formal consultation. As indicated in "Making London Better", resources will be available to ensure that any changes take place in an orderly fashion and no proposal will be agreed unless it offers a sound basis for delivering a high quality and cost-effective service to patients.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what consideration has been given to the establishment of a regional health authority for the Greater London area.

Dr. Mawhinney: The Department is currently consulting on proposals to determine new national health service regions and establish new regional health authorities. Copies of the consultation document "Managing the New NHS" have been sent to all Members of Parliament and are available in the Library. In the configuration of regions shown in the document, the Greater London area is divided between the proposed North Thames and South Thames regions. This configuration was chosen after considering a range of options, including options involving the establishment of a single regional health authority for the Greater London area, because it most closely met the criteria of minimising disruption to the work of the national health service; maintaining a spread of medical schools across the regions; ensuring that individual regions would be administratively manageable; and respecting natural lines of communication such as road and rail links.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what progress has been made on improving primary health care in London.

Dr. Mawhinney: In "Making London Better", the Government gave a commitment to invest £170 million on capital projects over six years. £40 million was made available in 1993-94 and has been used to fund primary health care development plans in each of the 12 family health services authorities within the London initiative zone (LIZ). It is expected that the extra LIZ moneys will fund over a hundred capital schemes this year. In addition, £7·5 million was made available over three years to fund voluntary sector projects to help prevent admission to hospital or facilitate early discharge. Thirty-one voluntary sector projects have already been approved as part of this initiative at a cost of £5 million.

Hospital Charges

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans she has to charge hospital in-patients for food.

Mr. Sackville: None.

Winyard Report

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make a statement on the Winyard report.

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when the report of the working party chaired by Dr. Graham Winyard is to be formally published; and when the Department will issue a formal response.

Dr. Mawhinney: On 9 June 1993 I asked the medical director of the national health service management executive, Dr. Graham Winyard, to carry out a review of current medical staffing policies. The terms of reference were:

(i) To identify and consider the options available for the continued implementation of current NHS medical workforce policies including Achieving a Balance and the New Deal. This work is to be carried out in the context of the internal market, and the proposed changes in specialist training and taking into account resource constraints and managerial feasibility.

(ii) To make any recommendations to the Minister for Health for implementing any changes which may need to be made to existing policies by 31 October 1993.

Membership of the working group included representatives of the medical profession and NHS management.

Dr. Winyard has now submitted his report and we are considering a number of recommendations for changes to current medical staffing policies.

Women Consultants

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the percentage of women consultants at the latest available date.

Mr. Sackville: As at September 1992, 16·3 per cent. of hospital consultants in England were women.

Quest Cancer Test Trial

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was her decision on funding the Quest HDA cervical cancer test trial; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Sackville: Since 1988, Quest has not made a bid to the Department for research funding.

Hospital Budgets

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many hospitals have overspent their budgets so far in the current year.

Mr. Sackville: The information is not available centrally.

Family Practitioner Budgets

Mr. Jim Cunningham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many family practitioners have reduced their budgets for purchasing hospital treatment (a) nationally and (b) in the Coventry area; what effects she expects the reduced budgets to have on patient care and on the jobs of medical staff, with particular reference to the Coventry area and on the west midlands; and what reasons she has been given for the reductions.

Dr. Mawhinney: Regional health authorities are responsible for setting general practitioner fundholder budgets, under guidance issued by the national health service management executive EL(93)93, copies of which are available in the Library. These budgets are set at the beginning of the financial year and cannot be reduced mid-year.

Elderly Patients (Specialist Treatment)

Sir Michael Grylls: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will issue guidance to both local health authorities and residential nursing homes for the elderly as to the responsibility for payment for essential specialist medical items necessary for the post-operative and continuing care of elderly patients.

Mr. Bowis: A large number of such items are available on national health service prescription.

Responsibility for prescribing drugs, dressings and appliances generally rests with the doctor who has clinical responsibility for the patient's care.

Guidance to health authorities in EL(91)127 advised that in some cases, responsibility for prescribing for discharged patients should remain with consultants rather than general practitioners, for example where drugs or appliances were only available through hospitals.

In December 1992 the Department issued guidance to both health authorities (HSG(92)50) and local authorities (LAC(92)24) about their respective responsibilities for funding community health services for people placed by local authorities in nursing and residential care homes after 1 April 1993.

Copies of EL(91)127, HSG(92)50 and LAC(92)24 are available in the Library.

Qa Business Services

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what studies he has made of the status of ex-Government employees and their pensions in the pension funds of (a) West Midlands regional health authority and Qa Business Services and (b) Harland and Wolff.

(2) what advice has been received from Government Actuaries on the surpluses in the pension funds of (a) West Midlands regional health authority and Qa Business Services and (b) Harland and Wolff.

Dr. Mawhinney: I have been asked to reply.

None so far as the West Midlands regional health authority pension fund and Qa Business Services pension fund are concerned. Information regarding Harland and Wolff is a matter for my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland.

WALES

Travellers

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he proposes to make a statement concerning his revised policies for camps for itinerants in Wales.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The Government announced their revised policy on sites for itinerants on 31 March 1993.

Private Patients

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what steps he is taking to ensure that private patients are not put in for free tests in NHS hospitals in Wales at the expense of delays for NHS patients.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: There is nationally agreed guidance on private practice in health service hospitals. This requires local managers and clinicians to ensure there is no conflict between private practice and NHS work and that private patients should not receive services at the expense of NHS patients. I expect all health authorities and national health service trusts to ensure that there is the fullest compliance under this guidance.

Nuclear Plants

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what assessment he has made of the relationship between the operation of the nuclear plants at Wylfa and Trawsfynydd and the incidence of cancer recorded in the latest Welsh cancer register for Gwynedd.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: The latest published registration rates for individual cancers in Gwynedd are contained in "Cancer Registration in Wales: 1984-86".

Registration rates for all cancers in Gwynedd, while not the highest, are 4 per cent. higher than for Wales as a whole, taking account of the age distribution of the Gwynedd population. The main cancers which contribute to the higher registration rates are of the stomach, colon, pancreas, lung, gall bladder, kidney, breast, uterus, ovary and prostate, and myeloid leukaemia. The pattern of a higher incidence of some cancers in Gwynedd has been known for more than 80 years.

Current expert opinion on the risks of exposure to radiation indicates that the low radiation doses to the population that may have arisen from Trawsfynydd or Wylfa could not be the cause of this higher incidence.

However, the registration data for Gwynedd are being examined currently to determine the incidence of certain other types of cancer in the vicinity of Trawsfynydd and Wylfa nuclear installations. The results will be made available in due course.

Development Agencies

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the development agencies together with their directors; and how much has been paid to each director, including expenses, in each of the past five years, and the current year to date.

Mr. Redwood: The information requested is as follows:

Members of the boards are reimbursed for expenses incurred in carrying out board duties; records of expenses are not held centrally.

Postal and Proxy Votes

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how much he will spend in the lead-up to the European and local elections next year on promoting the use of postal and proxy votes by sick, disabled and absent voters; what arrangements are in place for this exercise; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Nothing. The arrangements are a matter for my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary and he has already made a statement.

EC Cereal Aid

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what were the factors involved in the decision to recognise Wales as a separate harvest region for the purposes of the EC cereal aid proposal; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood: The decision to establish Wales as a separate yield region was made by the United Kingdom Agriculture Ministers in the light of circumstances relating to all four countries and having regard to the terms of Council Regulation 1765/92.

Livestock Quotas

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what proposals he has for measures to ensure that farmers in Wales are enabled before the end of the current year to ascertain their livestock quotas; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood: Over 90 per cent. of sheep and suckler cow producers in Wales have been notified of their quota allocations. The remaining producers' allocations are dependent upon their application for national reserve quota and the resolution of outstanding queries, some of which require clarification from the European Commission and some from the producers themselves. It is not possible, therefore, to predict with any certainty when all the remaining producers will receive their allocations.

Premature Deaths

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many premature deaths there were in Wales in the latest year for which figures are available; what is this figure as a percentage of the total number of deaths; and what is this percentage as a percentage of the United Kingdom average.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: There is no generally accepted definition of premature death. There were 6,016 deaths of Welsh residents under the age of 65 in 1992, representing 17·8 per cent. of all deaths. This was 97 per cent. of the equivalent United Kingdom figure of 18·4 per cent.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Richards: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what are his proposals for local government revenue spending in 1994-95.

Mr. Redwood: I propose to set total standard spending in Wales for 1994-95 at £2,704·8 million. This figure includes the £86 million for care in the community announced by my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State on 2 November. It represents an increase of 4·2 per cent. including community care resources or a 2·3 per cent. excluding care in the community.

I propose to set central government support for TSS through aggregate external finance at £2,419·2 million. The additional £86 million in community care resources the increase is 3·3 per cent., or 1·3 per cent. excluding care in the community.

Within AEF I propose to make available £1,740·1 million in revenue support grant, £464·0 million in distributable non-domestic rates and £215·1 million in specific and supplementary grants.

The non-domestic rate poundage for 1994-95 will increase by 1·8 per cent. to 44·8 pence in the pound in line with the increase in the retail prices index for the 12 months to September 1993.

My proposals constitute a realistic package. They will enable local authorities to maintain services, given the sharp fall in inflation. Local authorities will need to assess carefully their expenditure priorities and look to achieve the best value for money in providing services. I am sure that Welsh local authorities will exercise prudence in making their budgetary decisions for the coming financial year.

My Department has today written to the local authority associations to consult them on my proposals for revenue support grant in 1994-95. I will announce provisional standard spending assessments for individual Welsh authorities and my provisional capping criteria in mid-December; and my final settlement proposals early in the new year.

Moated Sites

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) what action his Department is currently taking to record and preserve moated sites of archaeological interest; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will list the (a) surveys and (b) excavations that are currently being carried out of moated sites of archaeological interest.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Responsibility for the subject of the questions has been delegated to Cadw: Welsh Historic Monuments Executive Agency under its chief executive, John Carr. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Mr. E. A. J. Carr to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 30 November 1993:

Moated Sites of Archaeological Interest in Wales

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your two recent Parliamentary Questions about moated sites of archaeological interest in Wales.

The Secretary of State's policy on archaeological remains on land and how they should be preserved or recorded is set out in Planning Policy Guidance 16 (Wales): Archaeology and Planning a copy of which is in the Library of the House. As the guidance makes clear, archaeological remains are a finite, non-renewable resource which in many cases are vulnerable to damage and destruction. Accordingly, to protect vulnerable moated sites the Agency has completed a scheduling enhancement exercise of all known sites in Wales. 110 such sites have been evaluated, of which 65 are scheduled as monuments of national importance under the Ancient Monuments and Archaeological Areas Act 1979. Details of both the scheduled and unscheduled sites in Wales are contained in the Sites and Monuments Records held by the four regional Archaeological Trusts in Wales.

Insofar as preservation is concerned Cadw's Field Monument Wardens keep the condition of these important monuments under close review.

While scheduled monument consent is required for works to monuments of national importance the Agency's records do not identify such activity by monument type. Works at unscheduled monuments do not require consent from the Secretary of State and consequently the Agency has no information in respect of such sites.

Gardens of Historic Value

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list (a) the applicants for European Community financial assistance under the current year's awards for the conservation of gardens of historic value and (b) details of the reasons for those that failed to secure such funding; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Responsibility for this subject has been delegated to Cadw: Welsh Historic Monuments. I have asked the chief executive, John Carr, to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Mr. E. A. J. Carr to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 30 November 1993:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your Question about Welsh projects submitted for consideration under the European Commission's pilot projects scheme to conserve Europe's built heritage.

Under the 1993 scheme of 'Gardens of Historic Interest', the following applications were made:

Applicant	Garden
Clwyd County Council	Gardens at Bunkers Hill Cottages, Wrexham, Clwyd
Swansea City Council	Gardens at Sketty Hall, Swansea, West Glamorgan
Welsh Historic Gardens Trust	Gardens at Hafod, Pontrhyd y Groes, Dyfed

Cadw offers the Commission a view on the merits of each application submitted under the scheme, but the decision on whether a grant will be offered is taken by the Commission itself, on the advice of an international panel of experts. It is not the Commission's practice to comment on why any of the applications fail to receive assistance.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Rural Housing

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps will be taken to reappraise the rural priority areas in respect of housing rural unfitness.

Mr. Atkins: This is a matter for the Northern Ireland Housing Executive, but the chief executive has advised me that rural priority areas—RPAs—are being reappraised as part of a wider review of the executive's rural housing policy. The executive hopes to extend RPA status to other areas, by reviewing the relevant unfitness criteria under which an area qualifies for such status. The executive will also be seeking to improve the effectiveness of action in RPAs by increasing the involvement of its district/regional offices and by closer co-operation with local voluntary groups. Existing RPA's will still be targeted for grant aid where there is a continuing need.

Terrorism

Mr. Trimble: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what inquiries are being made into the involvement of the terrorist known as the Jackal in the murder of Adrian Carroll.

Sir John Wheeler: Criminal investigations into the murder of Adrian Carroll are continuing. All evidence or information which comes to the knowledge of the police is fully investigated.

Boarding Schools

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many boarders there were at each boarding school in Northern Ireland at the most recent available date.

Mr. Ancram: At the end of October 1993 the number of boarders in each boarding school was as follows:

	Number
Voluntary Grammar Schools
Campbell College, Belfast	94
Coleraine Academic Institution	78
Dominican College, Portstewart	35
Friends School, Lisburn	44
Hunterhouse College, Belfast	82
Methodist College, Belfast	177
Portora Royal School	16
Royal School, Armagh	66
Royal School, Dungannon	39
St. Colman's College, Newry	58
St. Patrick's Grammar School, Armagh	72
Victoria College, Belfast	48
Controlled Grammar Schools
Coleraine High School	34

Countryside

Mr. A. Cecil Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on preservation of the countryside in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Atkins: The Government are continuing their work to maintain and enhance the quality of the countryside and to protect habitats and landscape, thereby providing enjoyment and pleasure for present and future generations. This work is undertaken on a number of fronts, including the declaration of areas of special scientific interest, environmentally sensitive areas, areas of outstanding natural beauty and national nature reserves.

Environmental Protection Act 1990

Mr. A. Cecil Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans he has to extend the Environmental Protection Act 1990 to Northern Ireland.

Mr. Atkins: Legislation broadly equivalent to the Environmental Protection Act 1990 is being introduced in Northern Ireland by a series of Orders in Council.

An Order in Council containing enabling powers to deal with genetically modified organisms similar to the provisions in part VI of the Act was made in July 1991 and will come into operation by means of a commencement order once the necessary regulations enacting its provisions have been finalised.

A further Order in Council containing provisions on litter equivalent to those in part IV of the Act will shortly be laid before Parliament and should become operative early in 1994.

I have already announced my plans for two further Orders in Council to introduce provisions on air pollution and waste management control respectively, similar to those in parts I and II of the Act. These are now being prepared. I hope to lay both draft orders before Parliament by the end of 1994.

Hedgerows

Mr. A. Cecil Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on hedgerow preservation in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Atkins: The Government are encouraging hedgerow improvement through financial incentive schemes operated by the Department of Agriculture and the Department of the Environment. Both Departments provide advice on hedgerow management.

Mr. A. Cecil Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether the hedgerow incentive scheme applies to Northern Ireland.

Mr. Atkins: The hedgerow incentive scheme is operated by the Countryside Commission and applies only in England. In Northern Ireland the Department of Agriculture and the Department of the Environment have schemes which provide financial incentives for hedgerow improvement and both Departments provide advice on hedgerow management.

Postal and Proxy Votes

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how much he will spend in the lead-up to the European and local elections next year on promoting the use of postal and proxy votes by sick, disabled and absent voters; what arrangements are in place for this exercise; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ancram: The nature and extent of advertising or publicity related to the European parliamentary elections in 1994 have yet to be decided. Any advertising there might be on absent voting would not be directed at any specific groups of electors. Local elections have already taken place in Northern Ireland, in May this year.

EC Students

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the total estimated cost per annum for the provision of university and third-level education for European Community students studying in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Ancram: The total costs of making provision for EC students undertaking third-level education at institutions in Northern Ireland is not available in the form requested.

However, the estimated cost to public funds of tuition fees for students in institutions in Northern Ireland from EC countries, including the Republic of Ireland, and holding mandatory or postgraduate awards in the 1992-93 academic year, was £4·586 million.

School Extensions

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what progress has been made with the proposed major school extension schemes at (a) Comber high school and (b) Regent House grammar school.

Mr. Ancram: An economic appraisal recommending a new school for a long-term enrolment of 540 pupils has been approved for Comber high school and planning of this is at outline sketch plan stage.

An economic appraisal recommending the extending and refurbishing of the existing premises has been approved for Regent House school. A schedule of accommodation is being considered by the school and the South-Eastern education and library board.

Forensic Science Departments

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what proposals he has to provide permanent forensic sciences departments following the destruction of the forensic science laboratory at Newtownbreda in September 1992; and if he will make a statement.

Sir John Wheeler: Following the serious damage to the laboratory on 23 September 1992 it was relocated at Seapark outside Carrickfergus in County Antrim. The location of the laboratory in the longer term remains under consideration.

Student Nurses

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many student nurses there are at present; how many of them originate from the Republic of Ireland; how many nurses are unemployed; and if he will make a statement on job prospects for nurses.

Mr. Ancram: At 31 October there were 2,316 student nurses in training in Northern Ireland of whom 263 originate from the Republic of Ireland, while at 14 October 1993 there were 701 unemployed claimants who last worked in the nursing profession in general.

My hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley) wrote to you in April this year about job prospects in the nursing profession. He explained that improved retention of nursing staff has reduced employment opportunities for newly qualified nurses and that the proposals for rationalisation of services will impact on nurse employment in the future. The position has changed little since April as decisions have yet to be taken on the rationalisation of the service. Until these decisions are taken, it is not possible to assess accurately the implications for the nursing profession.

Republic of Ireland (Links)

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what research he has commissioned into the benefits of closer trading and other links between Northern Ireland and the Republic; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: None. Other bodies have, however, examined the potential benefits of increased cross-border trade and, while their estimates differ considerably, all agree that more trade is possible and can benefit both parts of Ireland. The two Governments are co-operating to promote trade in a number of ways, and are jointly organising a conference on cross-border trade in Dublin on 15 December.

Gardens of Historic Value

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list (a) the applicants for European Community financial assistance under this year's awards for the conservation of gardens of historic value and (b) details of the reasons for those that failed to secure such funding; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: The following applications were received:

(1) Antrim Borough Council, Antrim Castle gardens, Co. Antrim
(2) Armagh District Council with the Armagh Regeneration Trust and the Mall Trustees, Armagh Mall, Co. Armagh
(3) Mr. B. T. Little on behalf of the Duke of Abercorn, Barons Court, Co. Tyrone
(4) Mrs. J. R. Beresford-Ash, Ashbrook, Drumahoe, Co. Londonderry
(5) Mr. J. Langham, Tempo Manor, Co. Fermanagh
(6) Mr. G. B. L. Brown, Walworth, Co. Londonderry
(7) Mr. M. G. Parkinson on behalf of Belfast City Council, Botanic Gardens, Belfast
(8) Clandeboy Estate Company Ltd., Clandeboye House, Bangor, Co. Down

All applications were forwarded to the Commission of the European Communities. The Antrim castle gardens application was the only one which was successful in being awarded financial assistance. The Commission was responsible for the assessment of all applications. I am not in a position to comment on the reasons for its decisions.

Road Schemes

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what progress has been made with the new road schemes at (a) Comber bypass and (b) Forster Green junction.

Mr. Atkins: Work on the next phase of the Comber bypass scheme and on the Forster Green junction improvement will start in the 1997-98 and 1996-97 financial years respectively, subject to the availability of finance.

SCOTLAND

Paisley

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to support Paisley being awarded city status; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: None. City status in Scotland can be achieved only through the granting of a royal charter. It has no statutory significance in Scotland and there has been no such grant in modern times.

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on his proposals for the future local government arrangements for the Dykebar area of Paisley.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 25 November 1993]: I have written to the hon. Member about this and I will arrange for a copy of the letter to be placed in the Libraries of the House.

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will visit the Glenburn, Hunterhill, Dykebar, Lochfield, Foxbar, Thrushcraigs and South End areas of Paisley to assess the need for public sector housing investment and economic regeneration.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: My right hon. Friend has no plans to visit Paisley. Officials from the Scottish Office Environment Department recently met with representatives of Renfrew district council and Scottish Homes to discuss the housing problems in the district.

Public Appointments

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many persons are currently included in his Department's public appointments list; and how many of these are women.

Mr. Lang: The number of people currently on the Scottish Office public appointments list is constantly changing. At present there are in the region of 2,500 people on the list of whom some 880 or 36 per cent. are women. Until recently, the proportion of women on the list averaged 25 per cent. The higher proportion is a result of action taken by my Department to increase the number of women on the list. I am always happy to receive the names of people based in Scotland, of either sex, who are interested in undertaking public appointments work.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland to how many and which organisations he is able to make appointments; and what are the top salary levels of these appointments.

Mr. Lang: The nationalised industries, non-departmental public bodies and NHS bodies sponsored by the Scottish Office to which I make appointments are listed in the Cabinet Office publication "Public Bodies". The information includes the number of appointments I make to each body and the remuneration where appropriate. The 1992 edition is available in the Libraries of the House and the 1993 edition is scheduled to be published in mid-December.

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a document, similar to the one recently published by the Secretary of State for Wales, entitled "Public Bodies: Appointments Made by the Secretary of State for Wales", listing detailed information concerning appointments made by him to public bodies in terms of (a) appointments, (b) remuneration, (c) occupations of appointees and (d) time commitment.

Mr. Lang: A list of members of bodies listed in the Cabinet Office publication "Public Bodies" whom I appoint is being updated. I am considering how the information might most conveniently be made available.

Sheltered Housing

Sir David Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received concerning private owner-occupied sheltered housing; what help is available to those living in non-regulated or non-registered accommodation; and if he will consider setting up an ombudsman scheme.

Mr. Lang: The Scottish Office has received a number of representations about private owner-occupied sheltered housing, most of which have alleged a lack of control over managing companies and agents operating these developments. These representations are essentially about contractual issues between the parties concerned and it would be inappropriate for the Government to intervene. Independent legal advice should be sought in such cases.

Details of various cases have been passed to the Scottish law Commission which is considering particular aspects of sheltered housing in connection with its work on the abolition of the feudal system and the law of the tenement. We shall study carefully any recommendations that the commission may make.

Written Answers

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many written parliamentary questions he or his predecessors have answered in each year since 1979.

Mr. Lang: Figures before the 1980-81 parliamentary Session are not held centrally. Annual figures from 1980 onwards for House of Commons written questions answered by Scottish Office Ministers are as follows:

Year	Annual number
[1]1980	355
1981	1,588
1982	1,618
1983	1,750
1984	2,009

Elderly Forums

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what financial support his Department has provided to elderly forums; what plans he has to develop the elderly forum movement; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The Scottish Office currently provides financial assistance to two elderly forums through the urban programme at an estimated cost of £149,138 in the present financial year. Grant of 75 per cent. is payable by the Scottish Office on approved expenditure. The projects cover eligible areas in Strathclyde and Edinburgh. As for the future development of elderly forums, this is a matter for the forums themselves to take forward. In this connection, local authorities have powers under section 10(3) of the Social Work (Scotland) Act 1968 to grant aid voluntary organisations in providing social welfare in their areas.

Fox Hunting

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his policy on fox hunting on estates and property owned or managed by his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Hector Monro: Fox hunting on land owned by my right hon. Friend and managed by the Forestry Commission is permitted only where it has traditionally taken place or where the right to hunt or to grant facilities to hunt has been reserved in the title. No permissions are currently granted for the hunting of foxes on any of the remaining land owned by my right hon. Friend.

Pupils (Behavioural Problems)

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his most recent estimate of the number of children of school age in Scotland who do not attend school for reasons associated with behavioural problems; and if will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Figures for non-attendance at and exclusions from schools for reasons associated with behavioural problems are not held centrally; nor is sufficient information centrally available on which to base informed estimates.

Regulations which came into force in 1993 now require education authorities to collect information on schools attendance and truancy. This information will be published in school handbooks from December 1994 and will also be the subject of report by the audit unit of Her Majesty's inspectorate. Discussions are currently proceeding with education authorities about the collection of exclusion figures across Scotland on a consistent basis.

Rents

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a table showing the average weekly rental charge for houses owned by (a) Renfrew district council, (b) Eastwood district council, (c) Inverclyde district council and (d) Scottish Homes or its predecessors since 1983; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The table shows the average weekly unrebated rent for Renfrew, Eastwood and Inverclyde district councils, Scottish Homes and its predecessor, the Scottish Special Housing Association since 1983-84:

	Renfrew district council £	Eastwood district council £	Inverclyde district council £	SSHA/ Scottish Homes £
1983-84	8·33	10·52	8·31	11·96

Correspondence

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how long on average it takes his Department to reply to letters from hon. Members; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: My Department has set a target of replying to correspondence from hon. Members and others within 17 working days of receipt. During the period 1 August 1992 to 31 July 1993—the first year of operation of the target—11,279 items of such correspondence were dealt with. Fifty-five per cent. of these letters received a substantive reply within the 17 working day target, and 86 per cent. were answered within 30 working days. Replies may be delayed because it is necessary to gather information from various sources; in such cases, the normal procedure is for an interim reply to be issued.

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has further to develop the concept of infobuses on the model of that provided by Renfrew District Disability Council; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: As the provision of information on disability matters is the responsibility of local authorities, it is for these bodies to determine the level and nature of the service to be provided.

HIV Education

Mr. Chisholm: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the Government's policy on HIV education in Scottish schools.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The Government attach high priority to the provision of HIV education in schools. The school curriculum in Scotland is not statutorily prescribed and responsibility for the detailed curricular content, including that in relation to HIV education, rests with education authorities and individual head teachers.

The Government's policy is to encourage schools to tackle HIV education within a comprehensive programme of health and social education. This co-ordinated approach is designed to ensure that information about HIV is given not in isolation but as part of a programme that considers a number of issues relating to moral choices and healthy living.

To assist schools, national guidance is issued by the Scottish Office Education Department and the Scottish Consultative Council on the Curriculum. Guidelines on health education were issued recently by the Scottish Office as part of the 5 to 14 programme on environmental studies. That gives health education a firm place in the curriculum and highlights AIDS as a key feature. In addition, in 1992 the Scottish Office published a booklet entitled "HIV and AIDS: A Guide for the Educational Services in Scotland". This was distributed to all education authorities and schools in Scotland.

Homelessness

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many people were defined as homeless in (a) Inverclyde, (b) Strathclyde and (c) Scotland as a whole in each of the past five years.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The most recent published information is set out in the table.

Households assessed as homeless[1] 1987 to 1991-92

	Inverclyde	Strathclyde	Scotland[2]
1987-88	178	4,509	9,595
1988-89	112	4,551	9,644
1989-90	142	5,150	11,470
1990-91	156	7,333	14,900
1991-92	146	9,663	17,600

[1] Figures do not include households assessed as potentially homeless. In 1991-92 no households in Inverclyde, 3,537 households in Strathclyde and 8,700 households in Scotland were so assessed.
[2] Figures up to 1989-90 relate to the number of case returns received from local authorities. From 1990-91 figures are based on authorities' estimates of the total number of applicants.

Abbeyfield Housing Movement

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the work of the Abbeyfield housing movement in Scotland.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The work of the Abbeyfield housing movement in Scotland is consistent with the Government's care in the community policy. My right hon. Friend regards the movement as making an important contribution to the welfare of elderly people who no longer wish or who are unable to live in their own homes, or who need additional care. In 1992-93, Scottish Homes, the organisation responsible for funding registered housing associations, provided 11 locally based Abbeyfield societies with £500,000 in grant through its development programme.

Housing

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a table showing the number of homes built by (a) local authorities, (b) housing associations and (c) private developers in each year since 1980 in (i) Inverclyde and (ii) Strathclyde; and what is his current estimate for such completions in 1993.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Information on the number of dwellings completed in Inverclyde district and Strathclyde region by local authorities, housing associations and private developers, for the years 1980 to 1992 and the first half of 1993, is set out in the table. Further information on house completions across Scotland is available in the quarterly statistical bulletin "Housing Trends in Scotland" published by the Scottish Office.

[2] Figures are for quarters 1 and 2 only.

Advocates Depute

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many advocates depute there are; and how many are women.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: There are 13 advocate deputes, of whom four are women.

Procurators Fiscal

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many procurators fiscal there are; and how many are women.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: There are 42 procurators fiscal, of whom two are women. The total number of legal staff in the procurator fiscal service is 271, of whom 109 are women.

Home Insulation

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to introduce a home insulation programme; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The home energy efficiency scheme is funded by the Energy Efficiency Office of the Department of the Environment on a Great Britain basis. The scheme provides grants for loft, tank and pipe insulation, draughtproofing and energy advice to low-income households in receipt of certain social security benefits and regulations have been laid to abolish the client contribution. Housing authorities have powers to give improvement and repairs grants to householders, which can include works for energy efficiency measures. Scottish Homes can also provide grants in certain designated areas.

Student Support

Mr. Kynoch: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give details of any changes in the student support and tuition fee arrangements for Scottish domiciled students in session 1994-95.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I am publishing today the main rates of maintenance allowances payable under the students allowances scheme and the postgraduate students allowances scheme, including rates for those courses which do not attract student loans, together with the rates of various supplementary allowances payable to both undergraduate and vocational postgraduate award holders.

The support available to undergraduate students in 1994-95 through the main rates of maintenance grant and loan, taken together, will be 4 per cent. higher than in 1993-94, thus maintaining its value in real terms. Within that total, the main loan rates will be on average 44 per cent. higher than in 1993-94, offset in part by a reduction in the main rates of maintenance grant. The Government believe in principle that a higher share of the maintenance costs of higher education should be borne by graduates, now that student numbers have expanded so rapidly. No students will, however, be required to begin paying back their loans until after they leave their course and are earning more than 85 per cent. of national average earnings —currently about £14,000 per annum.

Tuition fees will continue to be reimbursed to institutions through the student support system on behalf of eligible students. The maximum rate of reimbursement will be reduced by 45 per cent. in each of the three subject bands for undergraduate courses in order to ensure that planned numbers are not exceeded. Higher education institutions will be compensated through grant in aid payable by the Scottish Higher Education Funding Council.

These changes are consistent with those for England and Wales announced by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Education. Details have been placed in the Library.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Kynoch: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will announce details of the 1994-95 Scottish local government finance settlement.

Mr. Lang: Following is the information.

Government Supported Expenditure

I propose that Government-supported expenditure—GSE—for 1994-95 should be set at £6,013·6 million. This is an increase of 3·52 per cent. on the current year's figure after adjusting for the transfer of responsibility for the careers service from local to central Government. Excluding the further transfer of resources to local authorities for their care in the community and independent living fund responsibilities, the increase is 2·25 per cent.

Grant-Aided Expenditure

I estimate that the local authorities will incur £753·5 million on loan and leasing charges in 1994-95. This amount is top-sliced from GSE leaving a residual amount for grant-aided expenditure—GAE—of £5,260·1 million. This figure is 3·42 per cent. higher than that for the current year—again after adjusting for the careers service transfer —or 2·23 per cent. after taking account of transfers to local authorities next year. I shall announce GAE figures for individual local authorities as soon as possible.

Aggregate External Finance

I further propose that Government-determined support for local authority current expenditure—aggregate external finance—should be set at £5,272·0 million for 1994-95. This is an increase of 2·41 per cent. on the current year's figure—again including an adjustment for the careers service transfer—or 0·97 per cent. excluding resources being transferred to local authorities to meet the cost of additional responsibilities, especially care in the community. In determining this AEF figure, I have assumed that local authorities will contribute £12·5 million to the next stage of unified business rate policy. I am announcing separately today details of the total reduction which I plan to make in Scottish business rates next year.

Provisional Capping Principles

To assist local authorities in their budgeting process, I have again decided to announce provisional capping principles for the year ahead. I have the power to cap a Scottish local authority either where I consider that its planned expenditure is excessive or where there is an excessive increase in its planned expenditure as compared with the previous year. My intended capping principles for 1994-95 are:

1. any increase in budget between 1993-94 and 1994-95 of more than 1·75 per cent. will be an excessive increase if the resulting budget is above the local authority's grant-aided expenditure—GAE—assessment for 1994-95;
2. any increase in budget between 1993-94 and 1994-95 of more than 1·25 per cent. will be an excessive increase if the resulting budget is over 5 per cent. above the local authority's GAE assessment for 1994-95;
3. any increase in budget between 1993-94 and 1994-95 of more than 0·75 per cent. will be an excessive increase if the resulting budget is over 10 per cent. above the local authority's GAE assessment for 1994-95; and
4. any budget for 1994-95 more than 12·5 per cent. above the local authority's GAE assessment will be excessive save that:
   (a) if that budget is 30 per cent. or less above the authority's GAE assessment for 1994-95 and that budget is no greater than the budget set by that authority for 1993-94, the authority will not be capped;
   (b) if that budget is not more than 60 per cent. or less above the authority's GAE assessment for 1994-95 and that budget is at least 5 per cent. below the budget set by that authority for 1993-94, the authority will not be capped;

(c) if that budget is at least 10 per cent. below the budget set by the authority for 1993-94, the authority will not be capped.

These principles are necessarily provisional. Before taking my decisions on capping, I will, of course, take into account all appropriate considerations.

Council Tax Transitional Relief Scheme

In the current year, provision was made for a transitional relief scheme to ensure that during the phasing-in of the council tax no household faced too great an increase in its bill as a result of the change in the tax system. I intend that this scheme will continue in 1994-95 so that those taxpayers who faced the largest increases in the current year will continue to receive assistance at an appropriate level. In general, they will receive the amount of relief granted in 1993-94 less an amount ranging from £67 a year for band A to £137 a year for band H. I estimate that this scheme will cost approximately £5 million and this will be funded in addition to the AEF sum announced above.

In determining the local government finance settlement for next year, I have taken full account of the views the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities has expressed to me. However, as I made clear to the convention at a meeting on 29 October, I regard its proposals as unrealistic, especially given the Government's view that increases in pay for public sector employees next year would require to be funded by efficiency savings. I made it clear to COSLA at the above meeting that I expected this policy to apply to Scottish local authorities and the settlement I am announcing today has been determined on that basis. The settlement includes provision for additional burdens being placed on local authorities next year including the introduction of devolved school management, child care and preparing for local government reform and water and sewerage restructuring.

Having regard to the low level of inflation and the Government's approach to public sector pay, this is a realistic settlement. I hope that in the light of it, local authorities will budget sensibly for next year. If they do not, I shall not hesitate to use my capping powers.

Rates

Mr. Kynoch: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on non-domestic rates for 1994-95.

Mr. Lang: The Government remain firmly committed to the objective of reducing Scottish business rates to the level of the English national non-domestic rate—NNDR. I intend to prescribe rate poundages for 1994-95 at a level which will mean that Scottish businesses will pay £60 million less than they would otherwise have done next year. This reduction takes account of the business rates measure which my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced in his Budget speech earlier today. I have decided that the most effective way to apply this measure to Scotland is to make a reduction in rate poundages next year which is £10 million greater than would otherwise have been possible.

As a result of the Government's unified business rates policy and our earlier decision to limit increases in poundages to no more than the rate of inflation from 1989-90 onwards, the total reduction in Scottish business rates is now around £500 million.

The table shows the 1994-95 rate poundages which I intend to prescribe for each local authority in an order which I shall lay before the House very shortly. On the basis of those poundages, ratepayers in Berwickshire, Tweeddale, Moray and Gordon will join those in Kincardine and Deeside, Orkney and Shetland in being levied rates at the English NNDR level. Businesses in all other areas will have a cash reduction in their rates. All businesses benefit from the fact that, because of the low level of inflation, 1993-94 poundages have been uprated by only 1·7 per cent. I have again decided to make larger reductions to those poundages furthest from the English NNDR. As a result, the poundage reductions in real terms range from over 9·5 per cent in the case of Glasgow to 0·25 per cent. in the case of Gordon.

Local authorities are being asked to contribute by means of efficiency savings £12·5 million to the £60 million reduction in business rates. The remaining £47·5 million reduction in non-domestic rate income will be offset by an increase in revenue support grant within the total of aggregate external finance for Scottish local authorities for 1994-95 which I have announced separately today.

I have decided that the reduction in poundages should again be accompanied by a reduction in industrial derating. The level of derating will be reduced from 17·5 per cent. in the current year to 10·0 per cent. next year.

EDUCATION

Schools, Castle Point

Dr. Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what percentage of children in Castle Point will be educated in grant-maintained schools in the primary sector and in the secondary sector by 1 January 1994; and what outstanding grant-maintained status applications there are for schools in Castle Point.

Mr. Robin Squire: Information on schools by parliamentary constituency is not collected centrally.

It is estimated that by January 1994 11 per cent. of primary and 61 per cent. of secondary pupils in Essex will be in self-governing schools.

On 29 November 24 schools—17 primary, seven secondary—in Essex had applications for grant-maintained status awaiting a decision, of which seven had a proposed incorporation date of 1 January.

Literacy

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what information he has on the proportion of those in social classes IV and V who are assessed as having difficulties with literacy and other basic skills.

Mr. Boswell: Information on the incidence of literacy and numeracy difficulties by social class is not currently available, but the Government-funded adult literacy and basic skills unit is currently working on an analysis of relevant research data, the results of which are expected to be published in the new year.

Education and Training

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will provide a table showing for each standard region, with Greater London shown as a separate region, the total expenditure in 1992-93, and the budgeted expenditure in 1993-94, 1994-95 and 1995-96 in respect of grants for education support and training, part to be included in single regeneration budget.

Mr. Forth: The only part of the grants for education support and training to be included in the single regeneration budget from 1 April 1994 will be the programme, "Raising Standards in Inner City Schools." The allocations made under this programme in 1992-93 and 1993-94 are shown in the table. Expenditure figures for 1992-93 are not yet available. Allocations for 1994-95 have not yet been decided and will be announced in due course. The programme ends in 1994-95.

Student Loans

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will give details of the support that will be given to students through mandatory awards and loans in the academic year 1994-95.

Mr. Patten: I have laid before Parliament today the Education (Mandatory Awards) (No. 2) Regulations 1993 and, together with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland, the Education (Student Loans) (No. 2) Regulations 1993. The regulations include the new rates of grant and loan for the academic year 1994-95.

The rates of loan available to students in 1994-95 will be 44 per cent. higher on average than in 1993-94. Taken together with the reduction in grant which I announced separately today, that will provide for a total level of support available through the main rates of grant and loan together which will be 4 per cent. higher than this year, thus maintaining its value in real terms.

The main rates of grant and loan set out in the regulations are as follows:

£	Grant	Loan (full year)	Total
Students living away from parents' home:
In London	2,560	1,375	3,935
Elsewhere	2,040	1,150	3,190
Students living at parents' home	1,615	915	2,530

Note.—The loan rates shown here apply to students throughout the United Kingdom. The grant rates apply to students from England and Wales. The equivalent arrangements for Scotland and Northern Ireland are being announced separately.

In addition, the parental and spouse's contribution scales are adjusted so that the contribution from a parent or a spouse whose residual income rises in line with average earnings will continue to fall in real terms. The supplementary allowances payable as part of the mandatory award are increased by 4 per cent. Loan rates for final year students are increased in proportion to the full-year rates of loan.

The number of students in higher education is now higher than ever before: the participation rate of young people has more than doubled in the past five years. Against that background, the Government believe in principle that graduates—as the main beneficiaries of higher education—should contribute a higher share of its costs. But no student will need to begin paying back their loan until after they have left their course and their income is higher than 85 per cent. of national average earnings—that is nearly £14,000 in today's prices. The Government will continue to keep the level of repayments under review.

Departmental Expenditure

Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will make a statement about his Department's expenditure plans for the financial years 1994-95 to 1996-97.

Mr. Patten: As my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced in his statement today, the Department for Education and OFSTED's spending programme in 1994-95 will total £10,487 million. That total is £670 million or 6·8 per cent. higher than equivalent expenditure in 1993-94.

Total expenditure in 1995-96 is planned to be £11,059 million and in 1996-97 £11,392 million.

Within these totals the Government have given priority to improving standards in schools through the self-governing—grant-maintained—schools programme. The planned growth in further education student numbers announced last year, to take the 16 to 18-year-old participation rate to record levels, will be sustained. Participation by young people in higher education will be stabilised at its present record level while higher education capital spending will be enhanced to meet the needs created by the recent rapid expansion in HE student numbers. In one of the most stringent public expenditure surveys for many years, the Government are reinforcing their commitment to education with 4·9 per cent. real terms growth in their expenditure on education over the next three years.

Self-governing schools

More than 1,000 schools have voted yes to self-governing status in ballots. The Government's expenditure plans provide for continuing growth in the sector in line with the forecast in the White Paper "Choice and Diversity" (Cm 2021) that, by 1996, most maintained secondary schools, as well as a significant proportion of maintained primary schools, would be self-governing.

The great bulk of recurrent funding for self-governing schools is found within the totals for local authority expenditure. Central Government will increase their recurrent and capital grants to self-governing schools substantially over the next three years as their numbers grow. Central Government expenditure on self-governing schools is planned to total £157 million in 1993-94 and £244 million, £446 million and £595 million in 1994-95, 1995-96 and 1996-97. The plans also allow for the Funding Agency for Schools, which will be established from 1 April 1994.

Capital Expenditure on Schools

Total central Government provision for capital expenditure on self-governing, voluntary-aided and LEA-maintained schools is £600 million, £606 million and £643 million in 1995-95, 1994-96 and 1996-97. Further details of annual capital guidelines and allocations to voluntary-aided and self-governing schools will be announced later.

Further Education

Total recurrent spending is planned to rise from £2,549 million in 1993-94 to £2,679 million, £2,872 million and £2,920 million in 1994-95, 1995-96 and 1996-97.

Last year I announced that the Government were giving a high priority to the launch of the new sector of further education. We set ourselves to increase the number of students in FE by 25 per cent. between 1992-93 and 1995-96, taking the United Kingdom to the top of the international league for participation in education among 16 to 18-year-olds, and representing a substantial step towards the achievement of the national targets for education and training. We are on target to meet that projection.

In a demanding public spending round the Government must look to the further education sector for some increase in efficiency in this period of dramatic growth. The plans announced today allow for the forecast increase in student numbers up to 1995-96 to be met in full, with an additional increase of 3 per cent. between 1995-96 and 1996-97 to maintain the 16 to 18-year-old participation rate.

Capital expenditure is planned to be £157 million, £159 million and £159 million in 1994-95, 1995-96 and 1996-97. This will enable the Further Education Funding Council to continue to improve the state of accomodation and the stock of equipment.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer's statement of 14 September 1993 set out the Government's approach to public sector pay in the year now beginning. I shall set as a condition of my grant to the FEFC that it requires the institutions it funds to take account of the principles set out in the Chancellor's statement, and in particular of the need to cover higher pay costs from within efficiency improvements, in 1994-95. I shall in addition hold back £50 million of grant from the FEFC, to be released when there has been satisfactory progress within colleges towards more flexible contracts of employment.

Higher Education

Student Numbers

The number of students in higher education has grown even faster than expected in the Government's spending plans last year. The proportion of young people entering higher education is now around 30 per cent.—close to the projection of one in three for the year 2000 set out in the Government's Higher Education White Paper in May 1991.

This represents a remarkable achievement. But there is a limit to the burden of funding for higher education which the taxpayer can bear. The student numbers underlying the Government's spending plans announced today accordingly assume that the proportion of young people entering higher education will remain at the current record level for the next three years before rising to one in three by the end of the decade.

Because of demographic trends, this means reductions of nearly 3·5 per cent. in the number of new entrants to higher education next year, with a smaller reduction the year after, followed by increases from 1996-97 onwards. If trends in A-levels and equivalent qualifications are maintained, there is likely to be a further small tightening in standards of entry to higher education.

In order to allow for the rising number of entrants enrolled in recent years, the expenditure plans provide for total full-time equivalent student numbers in higher education in England to rise by 90,000 or 10 per cent. between 1993-94 and 1996-97.

The rapid growth in student numbers has imposed a large extra burden on the taxpayer. The Government believe that a fairer distribution of this burden is needed between the taxpayer and those who benefit from higher education. They have therefore carried out a review of the funding of higher education, as have the university vice-chancellors. The expenditure plans announced today reflect the outcome of that review. There will be changes in funding to remove the incentive to expand and in student support, as described below.

Tuition Fees

The Government will continue to reimburse the tuition fees charged to students up to the maxima specified through the mandatory awards system. In order to stay within the expenditure plans, it is essential that student numbers are now maintained at the planned level. To that end, the maximum tuition fees reimbursed through the mandatory awards system in 1994-95 will be reduced by 45 per cent. for each fee band. The new maxima for each band are as follows:

Classroom-based courses	750
Laboratory and workshop-based courses	1,600
Clinical courses	2,800

In addition, I have stressed to the Higher Education Funding Council for England the importance of delivering through its funding methodology for universities and colleges the planned numbers of students.

The reduction in tuition fees will have no effect on the planned level of funding per student in higher education. Some £474 million will be transferred in 1994-95 from mandatory awards to Funding Council grant to compensate for the lower yield from tuition fees. If universities and colleges recruit the numbers of students assumed in the Government's plans, they will suffer no loss of income as a result of the reduction in fees.

Funding Council Grant

Recurrent grant for the HEFCE—including compensation for the reduction in tuition fees—is planned at £3,096 million, £3,350 million and £3,342 million in 1994-95, 1995-96 and 1996-97 respectively. The increase next year in the recurrent funds available to universities and colleges, including both grant and tuition fees, will be 6·7 per cent.

Capital grant will be £322 million, £381 million and £424 million in 1994-95, 1995-96 and 1996-97 respectively. This is a rise in real terms of 20 per cent. between 1993-94 and 1996-97. This substantial increase reflects the need for capital investment to help with the growth of student numbers in recent years and later in the decade, together with the reorganisation of medical education and research in London following the Tomlinson report.

As with the FEFC, I shall set as a condition of my grant to the HEFCE that it requires the institutions it funds to take account of the principles set out in the Chancellor's statement of 14 September, and in particular of the need to cover higher pay costs from within efficiency improvements.

Student Support

For 1994-95, the Government will continue to maintain the real value of the funds offered to students through the main rates of grant and loan and supplementary grants, which together will increase by 4 per cent. in cash. Reductions in the main rates of grant of 10 per cent. against their 1993-94 levels will be offset by increases in loan entitlements. Similar adjustments will be made over the next two years; on present estimates they will bring the grant and loan into broad balance in 1996-97. This shift from grant to loan represents an acceleration of the Government's existing plans.

The contribution of parents whose income rises at the same rate as average income will continue to fall in real terms. Loan rates for final year students will increase in proportion to the full year rates of loan. As now, students will not have to begin to repay their loans until they leave their courses and their incomes are higher than 85 per cent of national average earnings: that is nearly £14,000 in 1993 prices. The Government will keep the level of loan repayments under review.

Following a review of the access funds which help students who might otherwise have difficulty in completing their courses, we have increased the funds to £27 million in each year.

British Council

Mr. Hargreaves: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what progress has been made towards the merger between the Central Bureau for Educational Visits and Exchanges and the British Council; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Boswell: The merger between the central bureau and the British Council will take place on 1 December. This is a most welcome development. In approving it the Government have taken steps to ensure that the central bureau will maintain its own distinct identity within the British Council. Besides the organisational benefits inherent in the merger, the central bureau's wealth of experience and its internationally respected position in the field of education will complement the British Council's work in promoting Britain and in supporting education and training projects around the world. In its turn the central bureau will be able to draw on the British Council's worldwide network in promoting the international dimension in schools and colleges all over the United Kingdom.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Hills and Uplands

Mrs. Angela Knight: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether the autumn review of economic conditions in the hills and uplands is complete; and if she will make a statement.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The incomes of hill farmers have risen for two years and are forecast to rise for a third. Figures produced for the autumn review and agreed with the farming unions show that the average net farm incomes of cattle and sheep farms in less-favoured areas rose in real terms by 33 per cent. last year and are forecast to rise by a further 28 per cent. this year. This is good news for the hill farming community. It results from a combination of factors, but in particular total direct livestock subsidy payments to hill farmers are forecast to have increased substantially over the two years to 1993-94. This demonstrates the Government's firm commitment to farming in the hills and uplands. I have today placed in the Library of the House a copy of the statistical tables which formed the basis of the autumn review this year.

Hill sheep farmers have benefited through increases in the rates of sheep annual premium arising from the currency movements following the United Kingdom's departure from the exchange rate mechanism in September last year. Suckler cow producers will benefit from the agreed substantial increases in suckler cow premium which, taking into account the extensification premium, will total over £93 per head for 1993 compared with £59 per head under the 1992 scheme. These are very real benefits for the hill farming community.

The economic situation is such that I am able to reduce the rates of allowances for the 1994 HLCA scheme without adversely affecting the long-term viability or well-being of the industry. The rates of allowance for the severely disadvantaged areas will be reduced by £15·80 to £47·50 for cattle, by £0·75 to £5·75 for hardy breed ewes and by £0·60 to £3·00 for other ewes. Rates in the disadvantaged areas will be reduced by £7·90 to £23·75 for cattle and by £0·42 to £2·44 for ewes. I have today laid regulations before Parliament to give effect to these new rates.

The substantial increase in net farm incomes to which I referred earlier represents almost an extra £100 million a year overall to hill farmers in 1993-94. Even after the reductions in rates which I have announced, hill farmers will continue to be better off and will have achieved a net gain. This is partly accounted for by the fact that direct subsidies to cattle and sheep farmers in the less-favoured areas are estimated to total at least £550 million in 1994.

While I acknowledge that HLCAs continue to play a vital role in the viability of hill farms it is indisputable that the continued rise in the level of other subsidies available to hill farmers has reduced the relative importance of HLCAs. The Government remain committed to the future of hill farming in the United Kingdom and will act as necessary to ensure the viability of this vital sector of the United Kingdom agricultural industry.

Priorities Board

Mr. Paice: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if she has received a report from the priorities board for research and development in agriculture and food; and if she will make a statement.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The priorities board for research and development in agriculture and food has submitted its report to Agriculture Ministers and the chairman of the Agricultural and Food Research Council and it is published today.

In producing its report the board has taken into account the recommendations of its six advisory sectoral groups. It has developed its recommendations on the basis of level funding and has therefore balanced recommendations for increased funding in support of high priority work with others suggesting areas where work could be reduced.

The board has recommended that funding of the horticulture and food sectors should be increased, that a new programme of research into non-food crops should be initiated, and that to provide funding for these recommendations, research in the animals sectors, particularly on ruminants, and in the arable crops area should be reduced. The board has also recommended that research in the environmental sector should be maintained at its present level. The board has recommended considerable re-direction of funding within all the sectors to provide for new high priority research.

The board has also recommended that the agriculture departments and the Agricultural and Food Research Council should continue to provide a forum in which scientists, policy makers and industrialists can meet to ensure that publicly and privately funded research and development align effectively. However, having fulfilled its present remit it has said that it considers another full-scale review of priorities unnecessary for a while. As a non-departmental public body the board is due for periodic review in 1994. With this in view, the Government have therefore decided to dissolve the board, with effect from the end of this year.

We are grateful to Sir Anthony Tennant and all the members of the board for the work they have put into this report. The recommendations contained in it will, subject to a full consideration of the resource implications, help to guide the allocation of resources in the future research and development programme. Discussion will be held between the agriculture departments and the Agricultural and Food Research Council to plan the implementation of the recommendations.

Copies of the report are available in the Library of the House.

Potatoes

Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether she has reached a decision concerning the future of the potato marketing scheme, and whether she will make a statement.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Pursuant to my answer of 29 November 1993, my right hon. Friends the Secretaries of State for Scotland and for Wales and I have carefully considered the representations made to us since we were given powers in the Agriculture Act 1993 to revoke the scheme.

Having considered all the arguments with great care, we have concluded that the scheme must come to an end, on trading and deregulatory grounds. We are persuaded of the benefits of the free market for the whole of our industry —growers, processors and also for consumers.

Timing, however, is very important. We accept the arguments of the board and the union that our growers, having been tightly regulated for 60 years, are not ready to be thrust immediately into a totally free market. We consider that three years is a reasonable period to allow for transition, and are therefore prepared for the scheme to continue in modified form for the marketing years 1994-95, 1995-96 and 1996-97 and then end. We will, however, take a further look at the potato market before the consultation on the order to revoke the scheme which is required by the Act.

In the meantime, we need transitional arrangements in order that the industry can adapt towards the free market in the most constructive way.

The proposals made by the PMB and NFU form a very good basis for such a transition. On this basis we propose the following modified arrangements:

Quota flexibility should be introduced, allowing a registered producer's plantings to vary by up to 5 per cent. above or below quota without penalty.

Planting threshold for registration in the scheme should be raised from 0·4 to 1 hectare, exempting more growers from the need to register.

The special schemes for encouraging growing on contract should continue at their present level of uptake.

Intervention buying should cease, except for intervention on seed potatoes, funded by seed producers themselves.

The levy on growers should be reduced to the level appropriate for funding the board's other activities such as research, promotion and provision of market information.

The board membership should be reduced, and means be found of broadening representation on it.

Licensing and registration of potato merchants should cease.

Some of these changes would require amendments to the scheme, but the most significant changes could be introduced for the 1994-95 season, if not sooner.

This package of measures will allow our industry to move in an organised way towards a free market, which will be of benefit to growers and purchasers of potatoes and to our competitiveness in markets abroad.

Water (Pesticides)

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what communications she has had with the European Community Environment Commissioner this year on the European Community limits on pesticides in drinking water.

Mr. Soames: My Department works closely with the Department of the Environment which has lead responsibility for drinking water. I have had no direct contact with the Environment Commissioner this year on the EC limits for pesticides.

Flood Warnings

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what action her Department is taking in providing and maintaining flood warning sirens; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Jack: Following the decision last year by my right hon. Friend the then Home Secretary that the obsolete national air raid warning siren system should be closed as soon as possible, local authorities which used the system for flood warning purposes were invited to take over the equipment and be responsible for its upkeep. I understand that discussions subsequently took place between the Home Office, local authorities and British Telecom about the maintenance of these systems. My right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food wrote to the chairman of British Telecom on 9 November seeking his support in ensuring that the siren systems used for flood warning purposes are maintained by them in an operational state at least until the end of the present winter storm tide season in March-April 1994. It is anticipated that the authorities concerned will have alternative arrangements in place before winter 1994-95.

Food Trade Fair

Mr. Cox: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if she will list the British Food Organisations that exhibited at the recent food trade fair held in Cologne.

Mr. Jack: The bodies principally concerned with organising the substantial British presence at Anuga 1993 were:

Food From Britain
Meat and Livestock Commission
Milk Marketing Board
Potato Marketing Board
Rural Development Commission
Trade Promotions Scotland
Seafood from Shetland
Welsh Food Promotions
Welsh Lamb Enterprise
Industrial Development Board for Northern Ireland.

Nuclear Waste (Dumping at Sea)

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether Her Majesty's Government intend to file a declaration of non-acceptance in relation to the London convention decision in favour of a permanent worldwide ban on nuclear waste dumping at sea; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Jack: We are currently considering our position in relation to the recent London convention decision to introduce a permanent ban on the disposal of radioactive waste at sea.

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what considerations underlay the United Kingdom's abstention at the London convention on nuclear waste dumping at sea and the proposal for a permanent worldwide ban on such dumping.

Mr. Jack: We believe that the option of sea disposal for large bulky wastes arising from the decommissioning of nuclear power stations and submarines should not be foreclosed as it may represent the best practicable environmental option for these wastes. The United Kingdom has no immediate plans to dump such wastes at sea and is actively pursuing a land-based option.

Bovine Embryos

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what plans she has to bring forward detailed regulations on bovine embryo collection and transfer.

Mr. Soames: Regulations to govern bovine embryo collection and transfer have been laid before Parliament today—30 November—to come into operation on 21 December 1993.

Orange Juice

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what amount of sugar is permissible in one litre of (a) orange juice and (b) pure orange juice before it has to be listed as an ingredient; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Soames: Any orange juice to which sugar has been added must declare "sugar" in the ingredient listing. The word "pure" must not be used if it is likely to mislead the consumer.

Countryside Survey

Dr. Strang: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether she has discussed with the Secretary of State for the Environment the results of the countryside survey 1990 and the implications of these results for his Department.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: I have regular contact with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. The results of the survey will be taken fully into account in the continuing development of our policies for the countryside.

Forestry Commission (Nottinghamshire)

Mr. Tipping: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if she will list for each separate piece of land currently owned or leased by the Forestry Commission in Nottinghamshire (a) its name and (b) its area in hectares; and if she will place a map in the Library which names and identifies each of these pieces of land.

Mr. Jack: The Forestry Commission manages 5,644 hectares of land in Nottinghamshire. A map showing the location of the individual areas has been placed in the Library.

The more detailed information requested on the individual areas is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Fur Farms

Mr. Morley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many (a) mink and (b) arctic foxes have been kept on fur farms in the United Kingdom in each year since 1984; and how many there are at present.

Mr. Soames: The Mink (Keeping) Order 1992, which requires that mink farms be licensed by Agriculture Departments, does not require regular returns of the number of mink kept. However, best estimates suggest that the number of mink being kept in the United Kingdom has fallen from approximately 100,000 in 1987 to some 47,000 in 1992. Information is not collected on the keeping of arctic foxes.

Sheep Quota

Mr. Maclennan: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when she will be laying an order to enable the opening of the sheep quota national reserve; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Jack: The relevant legislation will be made very shortly. Our aim is to begin allocations in the early part of next year.

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when she expects to be able to confirm the size of the sheep quota national reserve, to announce arrangements for its allocation and to settle outstanding claims; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Jack [holding answer 23 November 1993]: The relevant legislation will be made shortly. Applications to the reserve will then be invited. I hope to be able at that stage to give details of the amounts of quota currently available in the reserve, but as I have made clear on previous occasions, the size of the reserve will be limited. Our aim is to begin allocations in the early part of next year.

ENVIRONMENT

City Pride

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what consultations he has had regarding city pride.

Mr. Baldry: My Department has had constructive discussions with the three city pride cities, London, Birmingham and Manchester, about taking forward this new initiative.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will tabulate the capital financing element, the equivalent budgeted net revenue expenditure on capital financing, the differences between them, the relevant population, and the difference per head of that population for each local authority in England for each of the financial years 1992-93 and 1993-94, in a manner similar to those tables published in the Official Report, 19 February 1992, columns 193-200.

Mr. Baldry: The information requested has been placed in the Library.

Sir Anthony Grant: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what are his proposals for the appropriate level of aggregate local authority spending in 1994-95, and the level of central support for that spending.

Mr. Gummer: I propose that total standard spending —TSS—for 1994-95 should be £42·664 billion for England, £1·496 billion above this year's figure. This total includes the new transitional community care special grant of £736 million announced by my hon. Friend the Minister for Health on 29 October. After adjusting for changes in local authority functions and excluding community care, TSS in 1994-95 represents an increase of 2·3 per cent. over this year.

I propose that the level of aggregate external finance —AEF—distributed to local authorities in England in 1994-95 should be £34·3129 billion, £1·0385 billion higher than this year. This figure also includes the £736 million transitional community care special grant.

I also propose that the non-domestic rate poundage for 1994-95 in England should rise by 1·7 per cent. to 42·3p, reflecting the annual increase in the retail prices index to September. This will ensure that the benefit of the Government's success in tackling inflation will once again be passed on in full to businesses.

I propose to set the distributable amount of non-domestic rates at £10·685 billion. I propose that the total of revenue support grant should be £18,496,837,001. Specific and special grants within AEF will amount to £5,131,062,999.

I shall announce shortly my proposals for the distribution of Government grants, including the outcome of my review of standard spending assessments. At the same time, I shall announce my current capping intentions. I shall also set out my proposals for the second year of transitional assistance to those households which faced significant increases in their local tax bills following the introduction of the council tax, and for meeting the transitional costs of local government reorganisation.

It is essential that local and central Government continue to play their part in restraining expenditure. Our overriding priority is to reduce the public sector deficit. My proposals for total standard spending, aggregate external finance and the non-domestic rate poundage represent a balanced approach to the funding of local authority services in 1994-95. I look to local authorities to take the same responsible attitude in determining their spending priorities and setting their budgets in 1994-95.

Housing Association Grant

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what he expects to be the average percentage housing association grant payable in England in (a) 1993-94 and (b) 1994-95.

Sir George Young: The average housing association grant rate set for:

(a) 1993-94 was 67 per cent.; and

(b) 1994-95 is 62 per cent.

The average actually paid to associations will not be known until after the end of the financial year in question. However, I would expect that, as in 1992-93, the average will be lower than that set, as a result of efficiency gains and associations' willingness to contribute to developments from their own resources.

Waste Water

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what discussions he has recently had with the Chancellor of the Exchequer in regard to the new estimated increase in costs needed to meet the EC waste water directive.

Mr. Yeo: These matters have in the usual way been the subject of collective discussion.

Environmental Protection

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what recent representations he has received from the European Environmental Bureau in regard to the United Kingdom's environmental protection policies.

Mr. Yeo: I have seen the proposals from the European Environmental Bureau for a declaration on sustainable development by the European Council. I expect to meet United Kingdom members of the EEB on 6 December.

Docklands Light Railway

Mr. Spellar: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects the extension of the docklands light railway to Beckton to commence services.

Mr. Baldry: The opening of the extension of the docklands light railway to Beckton is being delayed by the late delivery of operating software for the new Seltrac signalling system being supplied by Alcatel. All other elements are in place and fully functional. It is anticipated that the opening should take place early next year, once Docklands Light Railway Ltd. is confident that the contractor has delivered a system that will provide a fully reliable service to the public.

Mr. Carrington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the progress of the docklands light railway.

Mr. Gummer: I welcome the Chancellor's announcement in his Budget statement today that a new extension of the docklands light railway to Lewisham will be built and financed by the private sector.

Private sector companies will be invited to bid during 1994 for a concession to construct the extension. Construction on the £100 million project is expected to start soon after and the extension should open in 1997-98.

This is another major step toward improving London's infrastructure and I am pleased to give it my approval. This scheme, together with the £1·9 billion Jubilee line extension, highlights the Government's commitment to public transport in London. The Government have already confirmed that a new east-west link, the crossrail scheme, will go forward as a joint venture with the private sector.

The extension of the docklands light railway under the Thames to Greenwich, Deptford and Lewisham will help reduce the barrier effect of the Thames, providing an important new public transport link. It will also provide tourists with a new connection between the City and Greenwich and will benefit Kent commuters by providing a new interchange for travel into the City and east London. It will boost the regeneration of both the docklands and of the areas the new extension will serve. I am asking DLR Ltd. and its owners—the London Docklands development corporation—to give this project top priority.

The extension, which received parliamentary approval in May this year, will go through a new tunnel under the Thames south of the Isle of Dogs and terminate at Lewisham where it will connect with British Rail. The journey time from Lewisham to the City will be less than 25 minutes; from Lewisham to Canary Wharf about 15 minutes. The costs of the project have been closely examined and initial indications are that for the project to proceed, it may be necessary to omit two planned stations at Island Gardens and Cutty Sark. Consultation will take place before a final decision is taken.

The project is a joint venture under the Government's private finance initiative which encourages private sector investment in capital projects which have traditionally been carried out by the Government. Lewisham council will contribute £5 million towards the joint venture.

The Lewisham line will enhance the docklands light railway's commercial standing and help it prepare for privatisation, which will bring yet further improvements in the service to passengers. I am considering the options for privatisation in the light of expert advice and will announce my decision soon.

Housing Grants

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the number and value of home improvement and renovation grants paid to private owners and for tenanted properties in England since 1989.

Sir George Young: Information about home improvement and renovation grants paid in England for each year from 1989 to 1992 is shown in the publication "Housing and Construction Statistics 1982-1992".

Total numbers and values of grants paid to private owners and tenants under the Housing Act 1985, the previous grants system, is shown in table 7.2. Similar information about activity under the Local Government and Housing Act 1989, the present grants system, is shown in tables 7.3, 7.4 and 7.5. Information about the sector receiving renovation and disabled facilities grants is shown in table 7.8. Most common parts grants and all houses in multiple occupation grants will be for tenanted properties.

A copy of this publication is in the Library.

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment which local authorities have applied for Exchequer subsidies to help with costs associated with the option of reduction, clearance and closure of properties whose house prices are so low as to make renovation uneconomic; and how much these subsidies have been.

Sir George Young: When a property is found to be unfit, a local authority must determine the action necessary to deal with it. Its options include renovation, clearance and closure. The cost of renovation is one of the issues the authority should consider. Exchequer subsidy is available at 60 per cent. of the cost to the authority of the action determined on. In 1992-93 £18,466,309 was paid to 122 authorities in respect of clearance activity.

Council House Sales

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many dwellings have been sold by each local authority in England over the last five years (a) under the right to buy and (b) on any other basis.

Sir George Young: Tables showing the available information on right-to-buy sales and total council house sales for each English local authority in the period April 1979 to June 1993 were placed in the Library recently.

Housing

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many housing association properties have been built in each local authority area in England over the last three years for (a) general need and (b) sheltered housing; and how many properties have been acquired by housing associations and renovated for renting over the same period.

Sir George Young: Estimates of the total numbers of housing association housebuilding completions within each local authority area in England for the latest three years are published in "Local Housing Statistics". Figures for 1990, 1991 and 1992 are in issues 103, 105 and 106 respectively.

The Department collects information about special types of housing for the elderly, including sheltered dwellings. Figures for housing association completions of sheltered dwellings for each local authority area in England are also published in "Local Housing Statistics". Figures for 1990, 1991 and 1992 are in issues 99, 102 and 106 respectively.

Figures showing renovation work completed by housing associations on dwellings for rent are available only for standard statistical regions. They are also shown in "Local Housing Statistics". Figures for 1990, 1991 and 1992 are in issues 101, 105 and 106 respectively.

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what estimate his Department has made of (a) the time or (b) the financial resources needed to resolve the housing problems in each local authority area of England.

Sir George Young: No such estimate is possible. However, local authorities are responsible for drawing up comprehensive housing strategies for their areas, taking account of priority needs and available resources.

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how many families for whom the London borough of Wandsworth has a housing responsibility were living in bed-and-breakfast accommodation on 1 November;

(2) how many people were on the Wandsworth council housing list on 1 November.

Sir George Young: The latest data available within my Department relate to the beginning of the current financial year when Wandsworth reported 407 households in bed-and-breakfast accommodation and 6,913 households on its waiting list.

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many new dwellings have been (a) built and (b) bought by each local authority in England over the past five years for (i) general need and (ii) sheltered housing.

Sir George Young: Estimates of the total numbers of local authority house-building completions within each local authority area in England in each calendar year 1988 to 1992 are in the publication "Local Housing Statistics". Figures for 1988, 1989 and 1990 are in issue No. 103, for 1991 in issue No. 105 and for 1992 in issue No. 106.

The Department collects information about special types of housing for the elderly, including sheltered dwellings. Figures for local authority completions of sheltered dwellings for each local authority area in England are in certain issues of "Local Housing Statistics". Annual data for 1988 to 1992 are in issues Nos. 90, 94, 99, 102 and 106 respectively.

Copies of these publications are available in the Library.

The Department does not collect data on how many new dwellings are bought by local authorities for either general need or sheltered housing.

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what provisions have been made to assist authorities with clearance procedures for new house building; and if he will list what help has been given to each local authority in England over the last five years.

Sir George Young: It is for local housing authorities, in preparing comprehensive housing strategies for their areas and in performing their enabling role, to identify the problems and the solutions, working together with housing associations and the private sector. My Department helps where it can. Subsidy is available to help meet the costs of clearance activity.

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many clearance projects in England have been delayed due to the problems of rehousing those that will be displaced in the process.

Sir George Young: The Department of the Environment does not collect statistics on delayed clearance projects.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the present strategic guidance for the provision of new dwellings in Doncaster, South Yorkshire; what meetings he has held with Doncaster metropolitan district council on this matter; and what allowance has been made for the need for more (a) student and (b) single-person accommodation in Doncaster.

Sir George Young: Regional planning guidance note 5 for South Yorkshire, issued in December 1989, indicates that Doncaster metropolitan borough council should, in the period between 1986 and 2001, plan for 14,000 dwellings to be provided in its area, either through new construction or by conversion of existing buildings. No further strategic guidance has been issued since 1989; but local planning authorities in Yorkshire and Humberside, including Doncaster MBC, are in the process of preparing regional planning advice which they hope to submit jointly to the Secretary of State around the end of the year. The Secretary of State will then prepare and issue for consultation draft regional planning guidance and, in doing so, will take into account the advice provided by the authorities.

Officials have regularly attended meetings of the regional planning conference as observers and the Department helped to fund a study of population trends in the region in order to assist in the formulation of advice on housing provision.

Allowance for single person and student accommodation is usually included within the overall estimate of dwellings to be provided, although it is noteworthy that in its 1993 housing strategy statement Doncaster MBC has identified no significant need for more single-person or student dwellings.

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what changes he proposes to his estimates of local authority capital provision for housing set out in figure 80 of his Department's annual report 1993.

Sir George Young: Information on the Government's public expenditure plans for housing is contained in the "Financial Statement and Budget Report", to be published by my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer this afternoon. Separately, the Department will issue a press notice this afternoon, giving information on the programmes for which it is responsible. I will write to the hon. Member shortly when more detailed information becomes available.

Boundary Commission

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what discussions he has recently had with the Local Government Boundary Commission for England and Wales with respect to English counties.

Mr. Baldry: The Local Government Boundary Commission for England was abolished by section 24 of the Local Government Act 1992 which, by virtue of the Local Government Act 1992 (Commencement No. 1) Order 1992, was brought into force on 31 October 1992. Local government in Wales is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Drainage Boards

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list by valuation tribunal the number of council tax appeals that have been received to date in respect of internal drainage boards; how many have been heard; what was the decision of the tribunal; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Baldry: Appeals to valuation tribunals in respect of internal drainage boards concern the valuation of agricultural land and buildings for purposes of drainage rates rather than of council tax. The information relates to valuation tribunal offices, which can cover one or more tribunals. The decisions of the tribunals are not available centrally.

Information is provided below in respect of those offices reporting these appeals:

Land Drainage Appeals to Valuations Tribunals in England by Tribunal Office: April—September 1993

Special Needs Allowance

Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of the impact of reductions in the transitional special needs management allowance on projects providing homes for people with drink, drug and mental health problems.

Mr. Baldry: The Housing Corporation is currently reviewing the funding arrangements for special needs schemes run by housing associations, including schemes for people with drug, alcohol and mental health problems, in the context of the new arrangements for community care. To assist with the introduction of community care, levels of transitional special needs management allowance funding are continuing unchanged during 1993-94. No decisions have been taken yet on funding for future years.

Regent's Park Barracks

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the organisations and individuals who have so far written to his Department opposing the erecting of a multi-storey car park at the Regent's Park barracks; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Baldry: My Department has received five letters about this proposal, including one from the London borough of Camden.

Urban Areas

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to assist shopping provision and infrastructure within urban areas which are currently poorly provided for.

Mr. Baldry: The recently revised planning policy guidance note 6—PPG6—"Town Centres and Retail Developments" sets out our planning policies for retail development. A major aim of the guidance is to sustain or enhance the viability and vitality of town centres.

The urban block of grants, particularly city challenge, will continue to provide assistance for local shopping schemes.

The single regeneration budget, which will be introduced on 1 April 1994, will provide flexible support for regeneration and development in England in a way that meets local needs and priorities.

World Conservation Monitoring Centre

Mr. Llew Smith To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what meetings he has recently held, or plans to hold, with the World Conservation Monitoring Centre in Cambridge.

Mr. Yeo: None. We value highly the centre's work on biodiversity and the wildlife trade and wish it well in its new headquarters, opened by HRH the Duke of Edinburgh on 25 November.

Seal Products

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will itemise the legislation of the last 10 years at national and EC levels which has implemented the EC agreement to ban the importation of seal products.

Mr. Yeo: Relevant legislation is as follows:

EC directive 83/129, which required member states to ban the importation of the skins of whitecoat pups of harp seals and pups of hooded seals—blue-backs—or articles made from them, for a period of two years from 1 October 1983;

the Endangered Species (Import and Export) Act 1976 (Modification) Order 1983 (No. 1609), which implemented the directive by adding skins of harp and hooded seals to schedule 3 to the Act;

EC directive 85/444, which extended the ban on importation to 1 October 1989;

the Endangered Species (Import and Export) Act 1976 (Variation) Order 1985 (No. 1502), which restricted indefinitely the import and export of skins and skin articles;

EC directive 89/370, which extended the ban on importation indefinitely.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information he has received on moves to allow the importation of seal products into the United Kingdom and other parts of the EC.

Mr. Yeo: I understand that the European Commission may propose the amalgamation of a number of measures, including the EC directive which bans the importation of certain seal products. We shall consider the implications of any such proposals very carefully.

Home Energy Efficiency Scheme

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he intends to lay before Parliament regulations to abolish the client contribution payable towards the cost of work which is grant aided under the home energy efficiency scheme.

Mr. Yeo: Regulations to abolish the client contribution payable by those receiving grant under the home energy efficiency scheme were laid before the House of Commons on 18 November. Subject to parliamentary approval, they are expected to come into force on 9 December.

Housing Corporation

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what amendments he proposes to make to the estimates of output for the Housing Corporation's approved development programme set out in figure 78 of his Department's annual report 1993.

Sir George Young: I shall be considering what revisions are needed to the figures in table 78 of the 1993 annual report in producing the Department's 1994 report early next year.

Housing Revenue Account

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish a table showing the total amount of housing revenue account subsidy payable to local housing authorities in England in 1992-93, and his estimates for 1993-94 and 1994-95 indicating separately the housing and the housing benefit components, and showing the difference between the actual subsidy payable and the amount which would have been payable if expenditure on rent rebates had qualified in full for subsidy.

Sir George Young: The latest estimates for total housing revenue account subsidy payable are contained in the "Financial Statement and Budget Report", to be published by my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer this afternoon. I will write to the hon. Member shortly when the more detailed information requested becomes available.

Air Monitoring (London)

Ms Glenda Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many air monitoring units there are in (a) the Greater London area and (b) north and north-west London.

Mr. Yeo: The number of the Department of the Environment's air quality monitoring sites in both Greater London and north and north-west London are given in the table.

[1]Monitoring undertaken in collaboration with local authorities.

Private Finance Initiative

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the effect on the private finance initiative of the present rules governing the treatment by local authorities on (a) capital expenditure, (b) capital receipts, (c) leasing, (d) transactions involving local authority companies, (e) guarantees, (f) equity investment by local authorities and (g) competition for public sector contracts; and what proposals he has to amend these rules in order to increase local authorities' ability to participate in the private finance initiative.

Mr. Gummer: The rules to which the hon. Member refers provide a framework within which local authorities can collaborate with the private sector. Within them, authorities have developed excellent plans under, for example, city challenge and urban regeneration programmes. I am always willing to consider suggestions which would help authorities to collaborate with the private sector without undermining the necessary constraints on public expenditure.

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many projects involving local authorities and the private sector have been materially assisted by the private finance initiative since November 1992; and if he will list those projects showing for each (a) the estimated value of the project, (b) the expenditure to date, (c) the nature of the material assistance from the private finance initiative and (d) all the sources of funding for the project and the amount from each source.

Mr. Gummer: The Department and its sponsored bodies attracted over £2 billion of private investment in support of departmental programmes in 1992-93, and similarly expects to lever in up to £3 billion of private funding in 1993-94. This will assist the implementation of a wide variety of projects, most notably in housing, inner cities and urban regeneration, with many directly or indirectly involving local authorities. Separately, many authorities are pursuing local initiatives and partnerships with the private sector. It is not practicable for the Department to collect information on each project.

Nirex Repository

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what proportion of the waste to be stored in the proposed Nirex repository, including decommissioning materials, would come from (a) the thermal oxide reprocessing plant and (b) Magnox reprocessing on the assumptions made in drawing up the United Kingdom radioactive waste inventory;

(2) if low-level organic radioactive waste will be dumped in the proposed Nirex repository.

Mr. Yeo: The types of waste disposed of in Nirex's repository will depend on the authorisations granted by the regulators.

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what specifications he has issued as to the minimum depth of the proposed Nirex radioactive waste repository at Sellafield.

Mr. Yeo: None. It will be for Nirex to demonstrate the safety of its design.

Fair Rents

Mr. Fishburn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what action has been taken to encourage greater exchange of information and views between rent officers and rent assessment panels to encourage general consistency of approach, following the recent announcement on the outcome of the consultation exercise on increases in fair rents.

Sir George Young: The educational trust of the Institute of Rent Officers has established a working party comprising rent officers and rent assessment panel members, to consider and clarify issues affecting the registration of fair rents in the light of changes in the market for rented housing. The working party aims to produce a report by next spring, which it hopes will assist rent officers and members of rent assessment panels in exercising their functions under the Rent Act 1977.

Wind Energy

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what percentage of the Government subsidy paid to developers of wind turbine farms is for decommissioning; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: I have been asked to reply.

The extent to which the price paid by the regional electricity companies, for electricity supplied under a contract entered into by them under the non-fossil fuel obligation, contributes to the particular generator's capital, operating or decommissioning costs, is a commercial matter for the generator.

Countryside Survey

Dr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether he has discussed with the Secretary of State for the Environment the results of the countryside survey 1990 and the implications of these results for his Department.

Mr. MacGregor: I have been asked to reply.

I refer to the answer given to the hon. Gentleman today by my hon. Friend the Minister of the Environment and Countryside.

Dr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales whether he has discussed with the Secretary of State for the Environment the results of the countryside survey 1990 and the implications of these results for his Department.

Sir Wyn Roberts: I have been asked to reply.

Regular contact is and will continue to be maintained with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment on matters such as this.

Departments are committed to integrating environmental concerns into all policy areas. By 1997 the Countryside Council for Wales expects also to have completed the inventory of habitats in Wales at a phase 1 level of detail.

Dr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what discussions he has had on the implications of the countryside survey 1990 for Government policy with (a) the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, (b) the Secretary of State for Transport, (c) the Treasury, (d) the Secretary of State for Scotland and (e) the Secretary of State for Wales.

Mr. Yeo: My right hon. Friend maintains regular contact with his right hon. Friends on these matters and will continue to do so. They are as committed as he is to integrating environmental concerns into all policy areas.

Doncaster Drainage Act 1929

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the amendments that have been made to date to the Doncaster Area Drainage Act 1929; what consideration is given to a new Act; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jack: I have been asked to reply.

I am advised that most of the Doncaster Area Drainage Act 1929 was repealed by the Doncaster Area Drainage Act 1933. The other amendments known to have been made before 1974 are set out in the "Chronological Table of Local Acts", published in 1985 by the Law Commission and the Scottish Law Commission. The "Chronological Table of Acts of Parliament"—1992 edition—shows no specific amendments since 1974, but there will, of course, have been changes made by public general legislation. I am not aware of any new private Bill being prepared.

Drainage Boards

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list by each internal drainage board the representation of district council members who are (a) councillors and (b) non-councillors; and what their percentage of representation is of the whole membership per internal drainage board.

Mr. Jack: I have been asked to reply.

In accordance with legislation which took effect on 1 April 1993, local authorities are entitled to appoint members to internal drainage boards in proportion to their financial contributions to the board's income, subject to their number not exceeding the number of members elected by agricultural drainage ratepayers by more than one. There are nearly 250 internal drainage boards in England and Wales and information about local authority representatives is not held centrally.

EMPLOYMENT

Training and Enterprise Councils

13. Mr. Hendry: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment which TECs have met all the targets set down by his Department for two consecutive years.

Miss Widdecombe: Two training and enterprise councils met all their targets for performance-related funding in both 1991-92 and 1992-93, Stockport and High Peak TEC and Northumberland TEC.

24. Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will take steps to make the training and enterprise councils more accountable to their local communities.

Miss Widdecombe: TECs are already accountable to their local communities in a number of ways. They consult all local interests in preparing their strategies and plans. They publish summaries of these plans and hold public meetings at least annually. They also publish an annual report.

26. Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how much public funding has been provided for the South West TEC based in Plymouth; and how many people are currently having help and training there to find work.

Miss Widdecombe: The Employment Department has agreed a budget of £64·2 million for 1993-94 with Devon and Cornwall TEC.

The TEC helps many people in many different ways. Numbers currently include 6,305 young people on youth training, 3,871 adults undertaking training for work and 127 participating in learning for work.

Ms Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what level of accumulated reserves was held in total and by each TEC in England at 1 April 1992 and at 1 April 1993; and if he will make a statement.

Miss Widdecombe: The level of reserves held by each training and enterprise council—TEC—is contained within the TECs' published accounts. A full set of accounts for all 75 English TECs, for the year ending 31 March 1992, has already been placed in the House of Commons Library. Each TEC's accounts for the year ended 31 March 1993 is being placed in the Library as they become available to the Employment Department.

TECs are allowed to generate a surplus and create a reserve by subcontracting at a lower unit price than negotiated with the Department. A surplus may also be generated where a TEC's administrative costs are kept below the management fee paid by the Department. The surplus is available to the TEC, with the agreement of the Secretary of State for Employment, for further expenditure on programmes—and TEC administrative costs—for initiatives outside the programmes but within the TEC's articles and memorandum of association, or as a contribution to the TEC's general reserves.

Ms Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what powers training and enterprise councils have to switch their allocation of funds between various parts of their budgets; how much each TEC in England has transferred from the budgets it was allocated for youth training and employment training; to what purposes the funds were subsequently allocated; and if he will make a statement.

Miss Widdecombe: Training and enterprise councils —TECs—may switch their allocation of funds between youth training, training for work—which replaced employment training—compacts, education business partnerships, and business and enterprise support, so long as no budget is increased or decreased by more than 5 per cent. TECs may also increase their learning from work budget by up to a maximum of 5 per cent.

During the current financial year, five TECs have used this facility to transfer funds out of either their youth training or training for work budgets. Details are shown in the table.

TEC	Amount £	Additional provision purchased
Switches from youth training
Avon	258,000	Training for work
Birmingham	928,000	Training for work compacts
		Education business partnerships
		Business and enterprise support
Central England	216,000	Training for work compacts
		Education business partnerships
		Business and enterprise support
Wolverhampton	149,000	Training for work
		Business and enterprise support
Switches from training for work
Wearside	251,000	Youth training

Ms Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment which TECs are using adult training credits within their training for work provision; and if he will make a statement.

Miss Widdecombe: The following training and enterprise councils in England are currently using adult training credits within their training for work provision with assistance from the Department:

Barnsley and Doncaster;
Bedfordshire;
Bradford;
Cambsetc;
Hertfordshire;
Milton Keynes and North Bucks;
North London;
Rotherham;
South Thames;
Stockport and High Peak.

In addition, a number of other TECs are issuing adult training credits within their training for work provision using other resources.

Older Workers

14. Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what steps the Government are taking to improve the employment prospects for people aged 50 years and above.

Miss Widdecombe: With inflation and interest rates lower than for many years, our economic policies are improving employment prospects for everyone. For older people, building on the work of my advisory group, I recently launched "Getting On"—a drive to combat ageism in the workplace and encourage employers to recognise the skills, experience and commitment older people offer.

Youth Training

15. Mr. Heppell: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many 16 and 17-year-olds are on waiting lists for youth training places in the east midlands.

Miss Widdecombe: On 11 November there were 197 young people covered by the youth training guarantee who had been waiting for the offer of a YT place for eight weeks or longer in the Employment Department's east midlands region.

Disability

16. Mr. Bates: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what measures his Department is taking to improve access to work for disabled people.

19. Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what proposals he has to improve the job opportunities for disabled people; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: A new scheme, called access to work, will improve the range and type of help currently available under the Department's special schemes and proposals have been published for improving the help available through the sheltered employment programme.

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) what consultations he has had with employers' organisations about the likely impact of changes in funding for access to work schemes; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what representations he has had from charities concerned with disability and employment on the proposals that employers should pay half the cost of employing people with disabilities who have been working for them for over six months; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and my noble Friend Lord Henley have been in correspondence with, and have met, a number of leading employer and disablement organisations about access to work, about which my right hon. Friend made a statement to the House on 22 June 1993, Official Report, column 102. When my right hon. Friend has reached decisions on details of access to work, including the employer contribution, a statement will be made to the House.

Youth Unemployment

17. Mr. Tipping: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what further measures he intends to take to reduce youth unemployment in Nottinghamshire.

Miss Widdecombe: The local employment service and training and enterprise councils deliver a wide range of employment, enterprise and training programmes to help young unemployed people in Nottinghamshire find the best and quickest route to employment. The Government's plans are kept continually under review. Any plans will be announced in the normal way.

Wages Councils

18. Mr. Robert Ainsworth: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what assessment he has made of the effects on wage levels of the abolition of wages councils.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Abolition of the wages councils will enable the introduction of much greater flexibility in pay rates and more variation in pay structures. It is therefore not possible to make firm forecasts of the overall effect of abolition.

Civilian Employment

20. Mr. Clappison: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how the total of civilian employment in the south-eastern region has changed in the last 10 years.

Miss Widdecombe: Between June 1983 and June 1993, the civilian work force in employment in the south-east rose by 169,000 or 2 per cent.

Training

21. Mr. Connarty: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many people leaving employment training got a job in the last quarter for which figures are available.

Miss Widdecombe: The latest quarter for which figures are available is October 1992 to December 1992. Thirty-one per cent. of all employment training leavers in that quarter went into a job—slightly more than in the same period in 1991. In April 1993, employment training was replaced by training for work.

Ms Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) how many people were participating in (a) training for work—employment training/employment action, (b) community action, (c) learning for work, (d) workstart pilots, (e) North Norfolk Action, (f) the business start-up allowance, and (g) youth training for each region and for Great Britain as a whole in each month since March; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what number and percentage of those leaving employment training—training for work—were immediately on leaving, three months after leaving, and then six months after leaving, either (a) in a full-time job with their work experience employer, (b) in a full-time job with another employer, (c) employed in their own business, (d) in a part-time job, (e) in voluntary work, (f) on another Government training programme, (g) on a full-time education or training course, (h) unemployed and claiming benefit, (i) unemployed and not claiming benefit, (j) in a job club and (k) doing something else, in each region and for Great Britain as a whole.

Miss Widdecombe: As the information is contained in a large number of tables, I will write to the hon. Member and place a copy of the letter in the Library.

Mr. Corbyn: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will provide a table showing for each standard region, with Greater London shown as a separate region, the total expenditure in 1992-93, and the budgeted expenditure in 1993-94, 1994-95 and 1995-96, in respect of (a) programme development fund, (b) education business partnerships, (c) teacher placement service, (d) compacts/inner-city compacts, (e) business start-up scheme, (f) local initiative fund and (g) TEC challenge.

Miss Widdecombe: Total expenditure for 1992-93 and budgeted expenditure for 1993-94 are shown in the following tables, table 1 for programmes delivered through training and enterprise councils—TECs.

Training, enterprise and education directorate—TEED—regional offices are currently finalising contracts with TECs for TEC challenge and the information requested is not yet available.

Programme development funds are administered through the Employment Service whose regional boundaries are different from those of TEED. The information for these funds is shown in table 2.

Budgets for 1994-95 and 1995-96 will be the responsibility of the Department of the Environment following the announcement on 4 November of integrated regional offices.

Employment Creation

22. Mr. Riddick: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on the differences between British employment creation measures and those of our EC partners.

Mr. David Hunt: Other EC Governments are increasingly coming to share the United Kingdom's Government view that only competitive industries and flexible labour markets generate new jobs.

Full Employment

23. Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what is his definition of full employment.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I do not believe it is possible or sensible to define a particular unemployment rate as "full employment". The aim of the Government's policy is to achieve high levels of employment, consistent with low inflation.

Adult Unemployment

25. Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the percentage and number of adult male and female registered unemployed in the area including the Ilford, South constituency in October 1978 and October 1993; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: On the basis of the available information, unadjusted male and female claimant unemployment for over 18-year-olds in Ilford, South stood at 2,432 and 1,099 respectively in October 1983, and 3,926 and 1,228 respectively in October 1993.

Rural Areas

27. Mr. John Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what initiatives his Department is taking to create job opportunities in rural areas.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The promotion of enterprise, economic diversity and employment in rural areas is primarily the role of the Rural Development Commission and Scottish Enterprise. But acting through the Employment Service and training and enterprise councils, the Department has a range of facilities and programmes available to people in rural areas, to help equip them for work and enable them to take advantage of employment opportunities as they arise.

Workstart Schemes

28. Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what progress has been made in the workstart pilot schemes being run by his Department.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The programme is being piloted in four areas. Just over 100 long-term unemployed people are now involved in workstart.

Benefit Payments

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) how many offices responsible for the payment of unemployment benefit have changed the day of the week on which payments are made (a) in the past 12 months and (b) in the past five years;

(2) what is the total amount of money which has so far been withheld from claimants of unemployment benefit as a result of changes to the day on which benefit payments are made;

(3) what is his latest estimate of the total amount of money withheld from claimants of unemployment benefit as a result of changes to the day on which benefit payments are made in each year since 1989-90 and in the current financial year to date.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Responsibility for the subject of the questions has been delegated to the Employment Service agency under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from M. E. G. Fogden to Mr. David Blunkett, dated 30 November 1993:

As the Employment Service is an Executive Agency, the Secretary of State has asked me to write direct to respond to your Parliamentary Questions to him about the number of offices that have changed the day of the week on which payments are made in the last 12 months and the last five years; and, as a result of this, how much money has been withheld from claimants of unemployment benefit together with an estimate of the total amount of money withheld in each year since 1989-90 and in the current financial year to date. This is something which falls within the responsibilities delegated to me as Chief Executive of the Agency.

I am sorry that information is not available in the form you requested.

The allocation of signing days is arranged individually by each ES local office. I am unable to say how many offices have changed clients' signing days in the last 12 months and in the last five years because this information is not collated or published.

I can state however that no unemployment benefit (UB) has been withheld from clients due to a change in the day on which UB payments are made.

I hope this is helpful.

As decided by the Administration Committee of the House of Commons, Chief Executive replies to written Parliamentary Questions will now be published in the Official Report. I will also place a copy of this letter in the Library of the House.

Work Permits (St. Helena)

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what he proposes to do to reduce the impact of phasing out the special work permit arrangements for St. Helenians coming to work in the United Kingdom.

Miss Widdecombe: The dependent territories quota scheme will be phased out by 1995. Discussions are continuing between Employment Department officials and other Government Departments about how St. Helenians might be helped to benefit from the training and work expereience provisions of the work permit scheme.

Applications for work permits for St. Helenians outside the quota arrangements will continue to be considered against the normal work permit scheme criteria.

Job Clubs

Ms Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many people have joined job clubs; how many have left; how many leavers got jobs; how many entered another positive outcome, in the year to April 1993, and since April 1993 for each region and for Great Britain as a whole; what is the average duration of time that people spend participating in job clubs and how many people are currently in job clubs; what information he has on the wage rates and conditions that apply to the jobs obtained by job club leavers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service agency under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from M. E. G. Fogden to Ms Clare Short, dated 30 November 1993:

As the Employment Service is an Executive Agency, the Secretary of State has asked me to write to you direct to respond to your Parliamentary Question to him about Jobclub performance and the wage rates and conditions for Jobclub leavers. This is something which falls within the responsibilities delegated to me as Chief Executive of the Agency.

The attached table shows for each region and nationally the number of Jobclub entrants, leavers, job entries and other positive outcomes for the whole of 1992/93 and from 1 April 1993 to 31 October 1993. Those who are shown as going into other positive outcomes will have moved on to either training, full-time education or self-employment.

The average length of time people spend in Jobclub is not routinely recorded. A sample study in March 1993 showed that 60 per cent. leave within 12 weeks, 81 per cent. leave within 21 weeks and 8 per cent. leave after a stay of more than 26 weeks.

Records of the number of people in Jobclub at any one time are not kept. However, the attached table shows that 142,370 people joined the programme in the first seven months of the 1993/94 operational year, an average of 4,592 a week.

The wage rates that apply to jobs found by Jobclub members were last examined in January 1991, based on a postal survey of individuals who joined in Autumn 1989. At that time, 26 per cent. of respondents went into jobs with a wage of up to £80 per week and a further 60 per cent. went into jobs which paid £81 to £160 per week and 15 per cent. received over £160 per week.

The Employment Service is planning a wide ranging evaluation of its programmes and services which lead to jobs. This should begin in spring 1994 and will examine, amongst other things, the wage rates of leavers going into employment.

No information has been collected about the conditions of employment for those leaving Jobclub.

Jobclubs continue to be both popular with the people who join and an effective way of helping them back to work. We are now able to help more members than at any time before and 47 per cent. of leavers are successful in finding jobs.

I hope this is helpful.

As decided by the Administration Committee of the House of Commons, Chief Executive replies to written Parliamentary Questions will now be published in the Official Report. I will also place a copy of this letter in the Library of the House.

Investors in People Award

Ms Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many employers in each training and enterprise council area in England have been given the investors in people award; how many have made a commitment to meeting the standard; and if he will make a statement.

At 26 November 1993, over 470 organisations in the United Kingdom had achieved the investors standard while over 4,330 had formally committed to achieving the standard.

This is encouraging progress and demonstrates that employers are serious about their most valuable resource —their people. Over 10 per cent. of employees in employment are now covered by organisations recognised as or committed to investors in people.

Training (Accidents)

Ms Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many (a) fatal, (b) major and (c) minor accidents have occurred on youth training and on training for work for each available quarter since April in each region and in Great Britain as a whole; and if he will make a statement.

Miss Widdecombe: The table gives the accident figures for the quarter April to June 1993, which are the latest available, for youth training and training for work.

Notes:

1. Employment Department figures for trainees have been compiled on a similar basis to those prepared by the Health and Safety Executive for employed persons. However, the Employment Department's figures include a number of accidents to trainees in educational establishments, and road traffic accidents, which would not have been reportable to the Health and Safety Executive had the individuals been employed.
2. Major injuries are classified according to the severity criteria laid down in the Reporting of Injuries Diseases and Dangerous Occurences Regulations 1985.

Agriculture Gangmasters

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whether agricultural labour gangmasters are required to register as employment agencies; and how many gangmasters are registered in Lincolnshire, Cambridgeshire and Norfolk.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Whether individual agricultural gangmasters are required to be licensed under the Employment Agencies Act 1973 depends upon their method of operation. If the hirer of workers exercises the control and supervision of workers hired out by a gangmaster, the gangmaster should be licensed. If the gangmaster retains control and supervision of the workers, his or her activities are those of a subcontractor and are outside the scope of the Act. There are currently two licensed gangmasters in Lincolnshire, five in Cambridgeshire and 17 in Norfolk.

Learning for Work

Ms Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many learning for work places and what budget has been allocated to each training and enterprise council in England; how many people are currently on learning for work in each area; what monitoring information is collected about learning for work participants and the subsequent destinations they will be entering; how he plans to evaluate the programme; and if he will make a statement about its extension beyond 1994.

Miss Widdecombe: The number of learning for work places agreed with training and enterprise councils in England for 1993-94 and approximate numbers of participants reported by them as at 27 September are given in the table. Places will be allocated for 1994-95 in December. The budget the Department of Employment allocates to TECs to meet fees and expenses is commercial in confidence. However, £54 million is available in England for fees, allowances and other costs during the year ending August 1994.

Monitoring and evaluation arrangements will provide information about starts, participants and qualifications. We are also monitoring take-up by gender and disability. The destinations of individuals leaving courses is being followed up. Information will also be analysed on costs and benefits.

Learning for work is scheduled to continue until August 1994 when TECs will be free to use their experience of the arrangements to offer similar provision within training for work.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what has been the change in unemployment so far in 1993; what are the comparable figures for the rest of the European Community; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Internationally comparable unemployment figures based on the International Labour Organisation definition of unemployment are published by EUROSTAT in its monthly "Unemployment Bulletin", copies of which are available in the Library. These show that the United Kingdom is one of only two European Community countries where the rate of unemployment is now below what it was at the beginning of the year.

Coal Miners (Retraining)

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what measures he proposes to take to meet the costs of retraining for former coal miners; and if he will make a statement.

Miss Widdecombe: The Department has made available £75 million to training and enterprise councils and the Employment Service to provide additional training and retraining provision for unemployed people in pit closure areas, including former miners.

British Coal Enterprise also has substantial resources to retrain and provide other opportunities to help ex-mineworkers.

The £75 million forms part of the larger £200 million Government package to help the regeneration of pit closure areas.

Careers Services

Mr. Hanson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make it his policy that inspectors' reports following careers service inspections be made public.

Miss Widdecombe: This is already current policy throughout Great Britain.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Bomb-proofing

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what has been the cost, by location, of bomb-proofing the Department's premises.

Mr. David Davis: On security grounds, I do not propose to give this information.

Departmental Expenditure

Sir Paul Beresford: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what expenditure will be incurred by the Office of Public Service and Science in the period 1994-95 to 1996-97.

Mr. Waldegrave: Spending on the areas covered by the Office of Public Service and Science—OPSS—HMSO and Central Office of Information will be £1,318 million in 1994-95, £1,354 million in 1995-96 and £1,359 million in 1996-97.

Planned expenditure on public service tasks—OPSS, COI, HMSO—is £76 million in 1994-95, £70·9 million in 1995-96 and £70·2 million in 1996-97.

Provision for science is £1,242 million in 1994-95, £1,283·1 million in 1995-96 and £1,288·8 million in 1996-97. These figures include £154 million, £157 million and £157 million respectively to cover the additional responsibilities of the research councils for projects which they support in higher education institutions, which under previous arrangements would have been the responsibility of the higher education funding councils. After adjusting for this transfer, the science provision will be 4·2 per cent., 7·9 per cent. and 8·4 per cent. higher in cash terms than the estimated outturn in 1993-94.

I shall be announcing the allocation of the 1994-95 science budget in due course.

Market Testing

Mr. McAllion: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what was the worth of civil service work market-tested by September; what proportion has been competed for by in-house teams; and what proportion was awarded to the private sector without in-house competition.

Mr. Waldegrave: Provisional estimates show that by 30 September 1993 around £700 million of civil service work has subjected to a process of examination and review to improve value for money under the competing for quality initiative. Of this, about £624 million was market tested or strategically contracted out. Excluding the contractorisation of the Atomic Weapons Research Establishment—value £275 million—about 66 per cent., or £232 million was competed for by in-house teams. The remaining 34 per cent., or £117 million, together with the AWRE contractorisation, was awarded to the private sector without in-house competition.

DEFENCE

Senior Officers

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many (a) field marshals, (b) admirals of the fleet, (c) air chief marshals are currently on (i) the active list and (ii) the retired list; at what cost in each case; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: All admirals of the fleet, field marshals, and marshals of the Royal Air Force—five-star officers—remain on the active list. Normally, only the Chief of the Defence Staff, currently a marshal of the Royal Air Force, is actually a serving officer. Unusually, we have two serving officers at this level at present. The other is chairman of the NATO military committee, an international appointment. They are on a salary of £112,084·20.

The remainder are in effective retirement. Those promoted in the early 1980s to date are in receipt of a pension of 48·5 per cent. of active service pay—£54,361. Those promoted before then receive pension or half pay—£56,042.

Current numbers of five-star officers are:

	Full pay	Half pay	48·5 per cent.	Total
Royal Navy	—	5	3	8
Army	1	—	7	8
RAF	1	—	5	6
Total	2	5	15	22

These figures do not include His Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh, who holds five-star rank in all the armed forces, and His Royal Highness the Duke of Kent, who holds the rank of field marshal.

Horizon 2000

Mr. Wilkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether it is his intention that foreign-built hulls will be permitted in tenders for the future anti-aircraft frigate—Horizon 2000 project; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Aitken: The intention for the future air defence frigate is that each nation will build its own ships in its own country.

Landing Platform Helicopter

Mr. Wilkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence on what grounds the bidding of foreign hulls was excluded from the tendering arrangements for the landing platform helicopters.

Mr. Aitken: In the absence of progress towards the opening of the market for warship building within the EC on a fair and equitable basis, we decided the most appropriate course was to restrict invitations to tender to United Kingdom shipyards.

Minehunters

Mr. Wilkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence on what grounds foreign-built hulls were permitted as part of the last invitation for Sandown class single role minehunters; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Aitken: The last competition for Sandown class single role minehunters in 1990 permitted prime contractors to include foreign-built hulls in their bids to ensure as wide a competition as possible in order to maximise value for money for the defence budget and the taxpayer.

Mr. Wilkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether it is his intention to permit foreign-built hulls in the forthcoming tender for a further batch of Sandown class minehunters; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Aitken: We expect to make an announcement on future orders for the Sandown class shortly.

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the United Kingdom's minehunting capability.

Mr. Hanley: The Government are committed to retaining a capable and effective mine countermeasure fleet. We therefore intend to continue over the next decade with our modernisation programme, which will entail the procurement of further Sandown class single-role minehunters and a mid-life update for the Hunt class. The 1993 Statement on the Defence Estimates makes clear our intention to build up to a fleet of 25 of these highly capable vessels. We expect to make an announcement on future orders for the Sandown class shortly.

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects to issue an invitation to tender for a further batch of minehunters.

Mr. Aitken: We expect to make an announcement on future orders for the Sandown class shortly.

Glass-reinforced Plastic

Mr. Wilkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what in current prices has been his Department's total investment in glass-reinforced plastic in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Aitken: My Department has invested a total of £6 million in capital facilities for the production of GRP mine countermeasure vessels. This has been offset by receipts due under various agreements which total £4·7 million to date. Both figures are at current prices.

Submarine Movements

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food which VHF station will broadcast details of the movements of submarines to the fishing fleet in Irish seas area VIIA; and if he will make a statement about arrangements for this service in this submariner exercise area.

Mr. Hanley: I have been asked to reply.

Irish sea area VIIA north of 54 deg. north forms part of the Clyde exercise areas and is covered by the Subfacts scheme, under which advance notification of dived submarine movements is broadcast in certain coastal areas. Changes in the existing broadcasting arrangements for Subfacts are being planned and consultations about these changes have taken place with representatives of the fishing industry, including the Northern Ireland Fishermen's Federation. I hope to make an announcement soon.

Trident

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if it is his Department's policy to restrict the explosive firepower of Trident to that deployed on the Polaris force prior to Polaris having been updated with Chevaline;

(2) if it is his Department's policy to restrict the explosive firepower of Trident to that of the Polaris/Chevaline force currently deployed.

Mr. Hanley: The Government's policy is to deploy the minimum nuclear capability necessary to provide an effective deterrent in the circumstances of the time. On current plans, the total explosive power to be carried on each Trident submarine when they enter service will not be much changed from the total explosive power currently deployed, following the Chevaline development, in each Polaris submarine.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how his Department has reached its calculation that when Trident is fully in service the explosive power of the United Kingdom's operational nuclear inventory will be more than 25 per cent. down on the 1990 figure.

Mr. Hanley: The calculation compared the explosive power of the United Kingdom's operational stockpile of Chevaline and WE177 warheads in 1990 with the explosive power of the planned future operational stockpile of Trident and WE177 warheads when Trident is fully in service.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how his Department will demonstrate that it has not deployed more than 96 warheads on each of the Trident submarines when they enter service.

Mr. Hanley: In keeping with the practice of successive Governments, we do not make public the number of warheads actually deployed on our submarines. The question of verification does not arise.

Mr. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what negotiations or studies his Department is carrying out into possible future use of cruise missiles on board Trident submarines.

Mr. Hanley: None.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what change took place in the explosive firepower of the deployed Polaris force in connection with the deployment of Chevaline.

Mr. Hanley: The introduction into service of Chevaline brought with it a reduction in the total explosive power deployed on each Polaris submarine.

Anti-ballistic Missiles

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what account is taken of the ability to overcome existing anti-ballistic missile defences in determining the size of the United Kingdom's minimum deterrent.

Mr. Hanley: All relevant factors are taken into account in assessing the minimum level of capability necessary to provide effective deterrence.

Nuclear Weapons

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if the accuracy of a nuclear weapon is a significant factor in determining its destructive effectiveness.

Mr. Hanley: Accuracy of delivery is a significant factor in determining the likely effectiveness of a nuclear warhead against its intended target and therefore has a bearing on our assessment of the minimum capability necessary to provide effective deterrence.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will publish an open government document on Her Majesty's Government's policy on nuclear weapons and non-proliferation following the speech he made to the Centre for Defence Studies on 16 November.

Mr. Hanley: No. A copy of my right hon. and learned Friend's speech has been placed in the Library of the House.

Military Vehicles

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the financial and administrative consequences of the non-established status of the 39 all-terrain mobile platforms held and maintained by 5 Airborne Brigade; what dedicated Royal Electrical and Mechanical Engineers and associated support is available; when consideration of the future requirement for such vehicles for 24 Airmobile Brigade is due to be completed; what vehicles capable of deployment by support helicopter are currently held by 24 Airmobile Brigade; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: There are no financial or administrative consequences resulting from the non-established status of the 39 all-terrain mobile platforms held and maintained by 5 Airborne Brigade.

The brigade has a dedicated Combat Service Support Battalion comprising a general support squadron—which includes REME personnel—a close support squadron and a REME workshop. There are also REME personnel with the infantry battalions.

We expect consideration of 24 Airmobile Brigade's all-terrain mobile platform requirement to be completed in the course of next year.

24 Airmobile Brigade currently holds the following vehicles capable of deployment by support helicopter:

Trucks Utility Light/Medium
Trucks Utility Heavy
JCB Rough Terrain Fork-Lift Trucks
Motorcycles
Four-Tonne Trucks
Trailers

Piers

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the locations of piers previously owned by his Department which have been sold in the United Kingdom in the last 10 years; and if he will list the the purchaser and the selling price in each case.

Mr. Hanley: Details of the piers previously owned by the Ministry of Defence which have been sold in the United Kingdom in the last 10 years and the purchaser in each case are set out in the table. The sale prices are commercial in confidence.

In addition, offers for the purchase of two further piers at Holy Loch—Sandbank—and Gourock are at an advanced stage of consideration.

Royal Navy Ships

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many ships are currently in full-time service in the Royal Navy.

Mr. Hanley: On 30 November, there were 130 commissioned surface vessels and submarines in service with the Royal Navy. There are also 21 vessels in service with the Royal Fleet Auxiliary, whose supporting role is essential to the provision of the Royal Navy's overall capability.

Manpower Service Personnel

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) how many air marshals are currently on full-time service in the Royal Air Force;

(2) how many other ranks are currently on full-time service with the Royal Air Force;

(3) how many generals are currently on full-time service in the Army;

(4) how many other ranks are currently on full-time service with the Army;

(5) how many admirals are currently on full-time service in the Royal Navy.

Mr. Hanley: I refer the hon. Member to the 1 October 1993 issue of the tri-service personnel statistics publication No. 9—TSP9—"Rank Structure of UK Regular Forces", which is available from the House of Commons Library.

Nuclear Shelters

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the locations of (a) nuclear shelters, (b) nuclear bunkers, (c) command shelters and (d) command bunkers previously owned by his Ministry which have been sold in the United Kingdom in the last 10 years; and if he will list the purchaser and the selling price in each case.

Mr. Hanley: The information requested less the sale prices, which are commercial in confidence, is set out in the table:

RAF Greenham Common

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether the Russian Government still have inspection rights under the disarmament treaty at RAF station Greenham Common; what was the date of their last visit; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: The Russian Government will retain inspection rights at Greenham Common and RAF Molesworth under the intermediate range nuclear forces —INF—treaty until the year 2001. The last visit to RAF Greenham Common by a Russian inspection team took place on 16 April 1992.

Western European Union

Mr. Cash: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make it his policy, when strengthening the operational role of the Western European Union to ensure that there is no weakening of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation or the transatlantic link; what effect he expects his proposals to have on the course of the NATO summit on the future of NATO; and what plans he has to publicise progress on his proposals for the Western European Union.

Mr. Hanley: It has always been United Kingdom policy that development of the operational role of the Western European Union should strengthen NATO, including the transatlantic link. Discussions are continuing with allies on the preparations for the NATO summit, which will provide an important opportunity for the alliance to continue and enhance its adaptation to the new security environment. Progress in developing the Western European Union is made public in a variety of ways, including communiqués issued following meetings of the WEU Council of Ministers. The most recent of these took place in Luxembourg on 22 November.

Yugoslavia

Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what additional resources will be made available this winter to British service men serving in the former Yugoslavia.

Mr. Hanley: Additional resources for British forces in Bosnia include specialist arctic winter clothing for all troops, heaters for Warrior armoured vehicles and cold weather food supplements.

Nuclear Submarines

Mr. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list all nuclear-powered submarines that have visited (a) Liverpool, (b) Southampton, (c) Cardiff, (d) Portsmouth, (e) Torbay and (f) Portland during the last 12 months; and if he will list the dates concerned.

Mr. Hanley: The following nuclear submarine visits have been made over the last 12 months at the locations in question:

Location	Names	Dates
Liverpool	HMS Spartan	28 April to 4 May
Southampton	—	—
Cardiff	—	—
Portsmouth	USS Flying Fish	10 to 15 March
	FS Amethyste	10 to 14 May
	USS San Juan	20 to 26 May
	HMS Spartan	13 to 18 October
	USS Pargo	22 to 27 October
Torbay	—	—
Portland	—	—

Search and Rescue

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what RAF operations the search and rescue service would be supporting from RAF Brawdy in the event of the search and rescue Sea Kings being based there from April 1994.

Mr. Hanley: I will write to the hon. Member.

Army Sales Team

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the function of the Army sales team; when it was established; and what was its budget in each year since then.

Mr. Aitken: The Army sales teams organise and conduct demonstrations, training and trials of British defence equipment in the United Kingdom and overseas; and assist companies with sales promotion material and provide specialist advice. An Army sales team was first formed in the late 1960s. Budgetary details going back to that time could not be provided without disproportionate cost and effort. Their budget was £1·3 million in 1991-92, £1·4 million in 1992-93, and is forecast at £1·6 million in 1993-94.

US Submarine (Incident)

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what monitoring of foreign submarines he will introduce following the Department of Transport's marine accident investigation branch report of the snagging of the fishing vessel Lupina C by a United States navy nuclear submarine to ensure that submarines adhere to the submarine code of conduct when steaming through United Kingdom territorial waters; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: The code of practice governing the conduct of submarines when operating in the vicinity of fishing vessels applies to all foreign submarines operating dived within United Kingdom territorial waters. Since the incident involving the USS Sturgeon, efforts have been made to improve foreign submarines' awareness of the code's requirements, and it is clear that they take these very seriously and observe the rules to the letter.

Lesbians and Gay Men

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what inquiries he has made as to the effect of lifting the ban on lesbians and gay men serving in the armed forces of those countries in which the ban has been lifted; and if he will name the countries concerned.

Mr. Hanley: We are aware that some countries allow homosexuals to serve in their armed forces and that the Australian and Canadian armed forces have recently lifted their ban on homosexuals.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the position of lesbians and gay men in the armed services; when he will bring forward legislation to decriminalise homosexuality in the armed forces; and if in the interim he will refrain from pursuing criminal proceedings in respect of homosexuality.

Mr. Hanley: Homosexuals are precluded from service in the armed forces. The Ministry of Defence has accepted that homosexual activity of a kind that is legal in civil life should no longer constitute an offence under service law. The amendment to the law will be made as soon as the legislative programme allows. In the meantime, it is not intended to prosecute service personnel who engage in homosexual activity that is legal in civilian law unless there are other grounds for prosecution under service law. Personnel who engage in homosexual activity that is lawful under civilian law will, however, continue to be administratively discharged from the services.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

GATT

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will place in the Library a copy of the current proposals on the Multilateral Trade Organisation being negotiated at the GATT talks.

Mr. Goodlad: Yes.

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will place in the Library a copy of the Government's position on the current proposals for the Multilateral Trade Organisation being discussed at the general agreement on tariffs and trade talks.

Mr. Goodlad: The Government support the establishment of the proposed Multilateral Trade Organisation (MTO). This is intended to provide a vehicle for the effective implementation of the results of the Uruguay round, and an institutional framework for the conduct of future trade negotiations. The Government have consistently endorsed the idea that the round should be a single package, with participants required to accept the results of the negotiations in their entirety. The proposed MTO agreement will be the means to implement the total package.

Belize

Mr. Davidson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what guarantee has been provided to the Government of Belize that Britain will safeguard Belize's territorial integrity in the event of external aggression.

Mr. Goodlad: We have made it clear to the Belize Government that we are fully prepared to play our part in any consultations leading to an appropriate response should the security of Belize be threatened in the future.

Arms Embargo

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the countries which are subject to a United Kingdom arms embargo (a) as part of or (b) independently of (i) United Nations or (ii) EC policy.

Mr. Goodlad: We observe arms embargoes imposed by the United Nations on the following countries: Iraq, Libya, Somalia, Liberia, Haiti, South Africa and the former Republic of Yugoslavia. We also observe arms embargoes imposed by the European Union on China, Syria, Burma and Zaire and by the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe on Armenia and Azerbaijan. In addition, as a matter of declared national policy we refuse to supply arms to Argentina, Iran and Israel.

We consider applications for the export of arms to other countries on a case-by-case basis. We refuse applications for exports which in our view would not be consistent with our established criteria, including the common criteria for arms transfers agreed with EU partners at Luxembourg in 1991 and at Lisbon in 1992 and the guidelines agreed by the permanent five in London in 1991.

Security (Visits)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) if he will list by year and by date for the last 10 years and for the current year to date the occasions when a Minister from his Department has visited (a) the headquarters of MI6 and (b) GCHQ, Cheltenham; and what were the subjects discussed on each occasion;

(2) when he next expects to make a visit to (a) the headquarters of MI6 and (b) GCHQ, Cheltenham.

Mr. Hurd: Contacts with the agencies are close and frequent and Ministers visit periodically. I do not propose to provide full details of dates or subjects discussed or to give advance notice of such visits. I last visited the headquarters of GCHQ on 25 January 1991 and of SIS on 1 July 1993. The most recent FCO ministerial visit to GCHQ was by my right hon. and noble Friend the Baroness Chalker of Wallasey on 28 September 1993 and to SIS by my right hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, on 21 October 1993.

Bomb-proofing

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what has been the cost, by location, of bomb-proofing the Department's premises.

Mr. Goodlad: On security grounds, I do not propose to give this information.

Israel

Mr. Janner: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the arms embargo against Israel was defined; what items it included; and if he will set out the precise terms and date of each change in his policy on applying the embargo since 1982.

Mr. Goodlad: We announced in June 1982, following the Israeli invasion of Lebanon, that we would withhold approval of licences for the export to Israel of all British military equipment until further notice. In 1983 it was decided to allow the export of electronic and other small non-lethal components, provided that they did not form part of equipment due to be put into immediate service with the Israeli forces in Lebanon.

Entry Clearance Applications

Mr. Ottaway: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what changes have been made to the list of posts abroad designated to accept entry clearance applications.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: There are three significant changes to the list. Since 17 November the consulate-general in St. Petersburg has provided an entry clearance service, for the present to residents of its consular district only. In early December, the embassy in Tallinn will accept applications from residents in Estonia. In Cameroon we have centralised our visa operation in Yaounde; Douala no longer accepts applications.

I am placing copies of the revised list in the Library of the House.

Coastal Pollution

Mr. David Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much the United Kingdom is to contribute to the cost of sewage treatment and other anti-beach pollution measures in other European Union-member states; what contribution it is to receive from the EU towards the cost of similar measures in the United Kingdom; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Yeo: I have been asked to reply.

The cohesion fund assists the poorest member states to improve their transport and environment infrastructure including sewerage systems. We contribute only 5 per cent. of the cohesion fund, substantially less than France, Germany or Spain. We benefit from the EC structural funds and expect to receive about £10 billion from 1994-99. Investments in sewerage improvements can be supported by these funds.

Civil and Political Rights

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list policy and legislative changes which have been introduced by successive British Governments to comply with the international covenant on civil and political rights since it came into force on 23 March 1976; whether the Government intend to allow citizens of the United Kingdom to petition the United Nations Human Rights Committee by ratifying the optional protocol to the international covenant on civil and political rights; and what are the reasons for his decision.

Mr. Charles Wardle: I have been asked to reply.

Comprehensive accounts of the action taken by successive Governments to comply with the international covenant on civil and political rights (ICCPR) are provided in the periodic reports which are submitted to the United Nations Human Rights Committee every five years, copies of which are in the Library.

The United Kingdom has accepted the right of individual petition under the European convention on human rights since 1966. The Government do not believe that becoming a party to the optional protocol to the ICCPR would enhance the protection of human rights in the United Kingdom.

Nigeria

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what changes Her Majesty's Government have made in its policy regarding arms and military sales to Nigeria following the recent military coup.

Mr. Goodlad: All aspects of our policy towards Nigeria are currently under review. We shall announce the outcome shortly.

Mr. Bates: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on relations with Chad.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Our relations with Chad are cordial, but not substantial. United Kingdom exports to Chad in 1992 were £1·36 million. There is no bilateral aid programme, but we contribute to European Community aid programmes, which amount to over 10 million ECU this year. Diplomatic relations are covered by Her Majesty's Ambassador in Yaoundé, Cameroon, on a non-resident basis.

South Africa

Mr. George: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is Britain's role in the monitoring of elections in South Africa in 1994; and in what ways the Government are contributing to a fair and democratic transition in that country.

Mr. Goodlad: We intend to play a full part in helping to ensure that the South African elections are free and fair. We are discussing with the European Community, Commonwealth and United Nations the best ways in which to assist. The precise details of South Africa's election monitoring needs are unlikely to become clear until the Independent Election Commission has been established. This is expected shortly.

Our entire aid programme which is currently over £11·5 million a year plus a similar sum as a share of EC aid, is designed to support the transition to a democratic and non-racial society in South Africa.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Stonemasonry and Woodcarving

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what plans he has to encourage the use of British stonemasons and woodcarvers in the restoration of Windsor castle.

Mr. Brooke: Management of the restoration of Windsor castle is the responsibility of the Royal household and so, therefore, is the selection of craftsmen. However, there is no reason to suppose that the craftsmen used will not be British.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if he will seek to provide funds to the National Trust, the English, Welsh, Scottish and Irish Heritages and the Churches to recruit and train apprentices in stonemasonary and woodcarving and to employ them subsequently.

Mr. Brooke: I have no plans to provide specific funding on the lines proposed. English Heritage has recently established its own training centre for conservation skills at Fort Brockhurst, Hampshire. My Department also part-funds the conference on training in architectural conservation (COTAC), which aims to ensure that formal training and practical experience in conservation skills is available to all sectors of the construction industry, and works through a national network of training institutions to achieve this. Funding for such activities in Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland is a matter for my right hon. Friends.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Chief Justices' Clerks

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what representations the Lord Chancellor has received concerning the appointment of chief justices' clerks.

Mr. John M. Taylor: One hundred and twenty responses were received to a consultation paper on the role of chief justices' clerks, issued in February 1993. In addition, 10 magistrates and other interested persons have made written representations directly to the Lord Chancellor or his Department on the subject of chief justices' clerks, and 62 hon. Members have received representations which have been conveyed to me on behalf of the Lord Chancellor.

The Lord Chancellor attended the annual general meeting of the Magistrates' Association on 9 October where he discussed various aspects of the White Paper. He also received written representations from the association following this meeting.

Crown Courts

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department if he will list, for the last 12 months and by individual Crown court, (a) the occasions of scheduled individual sittings of separate courts within a Crown court complex that have been unable to sit due to the absence of a judge or recorder, (b) the specific reason for each cancellation (c) the date of the maximum number of cancellations occurring on any single day and (d) the estimated cost to public funds on that day.

Mr. John M. Taylor: The information requested is unavailable and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Sittings of the House

Mr. Allen: To ask the Lord President of the Council when he expects to put proposals before the House to implement the report of the Select Committees on Sittings of the House.

Mr. Newton: As I indicated in the debate on the Address on 25 November, I am continuing to seek agreement on a balanced package of measures that can be brought before the House.

TRANSPORT

West Coast Main Line

Mr. Day: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement about the modernisation of the west coast main line infrastructure.

Mr. MacGregor: My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced in his Budget statement that the Government have decided that the modernisation of the west main line will be taken forward as a privately managed and financed investment as part of the private finance initiative. The investment made by the private sector will be additional to the investment which Railtrack will be able to fund under the public expenditure plans announced in the Budget.

Principles for using private sector management and finance have been agreed between the Department of Transport and Railtrack following a study carried out by Hambros Bank Ltd. Under these:

Railtrack will be responsible for project definition and will draw up performance standards for the line in association with the private sector. Railtrack will be inviting expressions of interest in the next few days.

Once the new performance standards have been set, a competition will be held in late 1994 to select a private sector consortium to modernise the line and to maintain it for a defined period. The responsibility for project management and design will also rest with the successful consortium.

The successful consortium will be remunerated by service payments from Railtrack during the contract period. These payments will be subject to penalties and bonuses linked to the performance of the consortium in meeting the new performance standards and the consequential impact this will have on revenue losses and gains on the line.

The new standards will stipulate minimum performance criteria. Where commercially justified, the InterCity west coast franchisee (and, possibly, other train operators) will be able to contract for linespeed and other improvements in exchange for increased access payments.

To facilitate this the InterCity west coast franchise will be let at the earliest practicable date.

The principles have been devised to transfer risks out of the public sector to those who can control them best. The risk that the infrastructure fails to perform to specification will be transferred to the private sector consortium. That consortium will also bear revenue risk insofar as it is affected by the performance of the infrastructure. The bulk of the remainder of the revenue risk will be transferred to the train operating companies and the providers of private sector funds.

This approach will bring together private and public sector expertise to modernise the line in a way which will ensure that its full potential is realised without the capital cost coming out of public funds.

M11 Link

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what was the cost to his Department in respect of the demonstration on 6 November opposing the M11 link at George Green, Wanstead; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norris: Cost will arise directly from the destruction of a fence and damage to other works and from the need to reinstate them and prevent recurrence of the damage. Indirectly costs will arise from delay to the contractor's programme. The works have yet to be reinstated. No claims have been received from the contractor, and so the amount of cost which may be borne by the Department is unknown. We intend to make further progress with the work as soon as possible.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the advantages he expects to arise from the M11 link at George Green, Wanstead; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norris: The link road will relieve existing unsuitable roads of through traffic between the M11/North Circular road at Redbridge and the A102(M) Eastway approach to Blackwall tunnel at Hackney Marsh. The amenities of George Green, Wanstead, will be improved by the removal of this traffic from adjacent local roads and maintained by the provision of a tunnel for the link road. Some disruption is, however, unavoidable while the tunnel is constructed by the cut-and-cover method. The works have begun on site and are programmed to take four years to complete.

Railway Stations (Violence)

Mr. Austin-Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many incidents of violent crime and sexual assault were recorded at British Rail stations in each year since 1990; what were the figures for Network SouthEast; and how many of these incidents occurred when a station was unstaffed.

Mr. Freeman: The tables show the recorded incidents of violent crime and sexual assault at British Rail stations since 1990. Figures for incidents occurring at unstaffed stations are not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

All British Rail stations

	1990	1991	1992	[1]1993

Rail Privatisation

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the estimated net cost to public funds of railway privatisation.

Mr. Freeman: It is impossible to estimate the net effect of privatisation at this stage because the process will take some years to complete. Nevertheless, for any given level of public funding key factors such as investment and quality of service are expected to improve as a result of greater efficiency from increasing private sector management and competition.

Concessionary Travel Schemes

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the local authority areas by political control which operate concessionary travel schemes for pensioners.

Mr. Freeman: According to a survey of local authorities done by the Department of Transport in 1992, there were concessionary fare schemes for pensioners in 96 per cent. of districts in Great Britain, some operated by district councils and some by county councils or passenger transport executives. In London the scheme is funded by the boroughs.

It is therefore less cumbersome to list the small number of local authorities that had no schemes for pensioners. These were: Caradon, Carrick, Eden, Hambleton, Kennet, Kerrier, North Cornwall, Orkney Islands, Penwith, Rhuddlan, Salisbury, Scarborough, South Holland, Stratford-on-Avon, West Somerset, Woodspring.

Of the 16 authorities listed, most of those in England and Wales not covered by a scheme were rural areas served by little public transport. Some of those authorities do support voluntary organisations which provide community transport or social car schemes. In Scotland, Orkney Island Council does not provide a formal concessionary fare scheme, but a subsidy is provided for inter-island air and sea travel.

Vehicle Excise Duty

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many applications were received annually for exemption from vehicle excise duty on the ground of disability, from 1988 to 1992 inclusive; and how many of these were (a) successful and (b) unsuccessful.

Mr. Key: The Benefits Agency deals with applications for certificates of entitlement for exemption from vehicle excise duty (VED), because exemption is linked to certain Benefits Agency allowances, chiefly the higher rate of the mobility component of disability living allowance. In 1988, 320,000 people received exemption from VED on the grounds of disability, in 1989 350,000, in 1990 375,000, in 1991 420,000,and in 1992 465,000. No figures for unsuccessful applications for exemption certificates are available.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what was the total cost of exemptions from vehicle excise duty in 1992.

Mr. Key: In 1992, 465,000 people were issued with exempt vehicle excise duty (VED) discs on the grounds of disability. The value of those discs was £57 million. 425,000 other vehicles (such as emergency vehicles) were also exempt from VED in 1992. Had they been required to pay VED, the revenue raised would have been at least £47 million.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what action he will take to compensate disabled persons, following the abolition of exemption from vehicle excise duty for persons with mobility problems.

Mr. Key: There are no plans to introduce compensation. The Government introduced provisions to ensure that those disabled people benefiting from the exemption at the time of its repeal on 13 October 1993 (approximately 20,000) will continue to benefit from the exemption for as long as their disability remains. The repeal does not affect entitlement to exemption from vehicle excise duty granted under the war pensioners mobility supplement or the higher rate mobility component of DLA. Some 400,000 people currently benefit from exemption through this route.

M20 Widening

Mr. Rowe: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) what penalties have been incurred by Balfour Beatty, the contractors, for the widening of the M20 at Maidstone, for late completion of the contract; and if he will make a statement;

(2) what assessment he has made of whether the reasons so far published for delays in completion of the M20 widening contract around Maidstone are complete; and if he will carry out an investigation into them.

Mr. Key: The contract contains provisions for payment of liquidated damages if the contractor overruns the final contract completion date, This will be determined by the engineer to the contract when all the relevant facts of this complex issue are known to him and have been fully assessed. It is too early to say what penalties will be imposed.

Goods Vehicles (Mirrors)

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what improvements to large goods vehicles' mirrors he plans to reduce the risk of accident to cyclists and others caused by left turning lorries' blind spot.

Mr. Key: None. The Government have already amended national regulations to require close proximity mirrors on goods vehicles weighing over 12 tonnes and first used from 1 October 1988. These mirrors are specifically designed to provide the drivers of such lorries with improved vision to the side of their vehicles and make them more aware of cyclists and other road users.

Tachographs

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the types of vehicle required to have tachographs; what information such equipment records; and what is the penalty for operating such vehicles with the equipment disconnected or non operational.

Mr. Key: EC regulations require the fitment of tachographs to most heavy goods vehicles over 3½ tonnes, to domestic passenger carrying vehicles with more than 17 seats unless on regular scheduled services and to vehicles with 10 or more seats on international journeys within the European Community.

The tachograph records the driver's activities (driving, rest and periods of other work) as well as vehicle speed and time. The resultant records allow retrospective checking by enforcement authorities. The maximum penalties for producing a false tachograph chart by tampering with the device are, on summary indictment, a fine of £5,000 and, on conviction on indictment, two years imprisonment. Convictions may be taken into account by Licensing Authorities in deciding whether to grant or renew an operator's licence or an HGV/PCV driver's licence.

Heavy Goods Vehicles

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will require all heavy goods vehicles to display the name, address and telephone number of the user of the vehicle for each journey; and if he will apply the same requirements to hired vehicles.

Mr. Key: I do not propose to extend the requirements already laid down in the goods vehicle operator licensing provisions. These apply to users of heavy goods vehicles, including hired vehicles, over 3·5 tonnes and require that a vehicle specified on an operator licence display a disc showing the name of the licensed operator, a trading name if applicable, the registration number of the vehicle and the type of licence held by the operator.

A361

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport (1) if he will review his Department's policy regarding 60 mph repeater speed limit signs on the A361 north Devon link road;

(2) if he will review the overtaking arrangements on the A361 north Devon link road;

(3) if he will make a statement about the upgrading of parts or all of the A361 north Devon link road to dual carriageway;

(4) if he will review the lighting arrangements at, and layout of, junctions on the A361 north Devon link road;

(5) if he will arrange for an official from his Department to visit north Devon and meet representatives of the local county, district and parish councils, and other concerned parties, to discuss safety of the A361 north Devon link road.

Mr. Key: A number of accident reduction measures have already been implemented. Officials of the Department's South West regional office have arranged urgent discussions with our agent authority, Devon county council, and the police on possible further measures. This will include consideration of some of the suggestions put forward by the hon. Member.

I will write to the hon. Member as soon as I have the outcome of the discussions.

Great Western Network

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations have been made to him about the successors to 125 diesel locomotives for operating the InterCity service of the Great Western network; and if he will make a statement on the implications of the Railways Act 1993 for this particular service.

Mr. Freeman: I have received a number of representations about replacing the fleet of 125 diesel locomotives currently in use on the Great Western main line with electric traction. There are no plans to electrify the line at present, but this does not rule it out as an option when the existing diesel fleet reaches the end of its economic life.

Under the franchising proposals in the Railways Act, services on the Great Western main line will be among the first to be transferred to private sector operators. To this end, British Rail will begin shadow running from next April.

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many speed restrictions apply to the Great Western railway network west of Reading; what stretches of line they apply to; whether they are caused by deficiencies in track maintenance; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: This information is not held by the Department. These are operational matters for British Rail.

London Underground

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how much funding London Underground has received over the past 10 years; what assessment he has made of the amount of money which will need to be invested in the underground to bring its services to a reasonable standard; and what assessment he has made of whether safety work on the Underground is being delayed because of lack of investment.

Mr. Norris: The Government do not fund London Underground Ltd. (LUL) directly, but makes an annual grant to LUL's parent body, London Transport (LT). London Transport's grant settlement for the three years from 1994-95 was announced on 30 November, and it is currently in the process of allocating this settlement between its subsidiaries. Decisions on the need for and the timing of investment projects are for LUL to make, but safety remains a key priority, and there is no question of it being jeopardised. The amounts LUL has spent on investment over the last 10 years are shown in the table.

LUL investment 1984-85—1993-94

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when the Northern line on the London Underground is due to be modernised.

Mr. Norris: Decisions on the implementation of capital investment projects, such as the modernisation of the Northern line, are for London Transport and London Underground Ltd. to make. However, I understand that the Northern line is the next line due to be modernised after the Central line, which is on schedule for completion in 1995.

Departmental Costs

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will give the current year's contribution to site costs and overheads at each operating unit of (a) the construction programme, (b) the network management and maintenance units, (c) the London regional office and (d) the headquarters directorates of his Department.

Mr. Norris: The figures below relate to the highways safety and traffic command of the Department of Transport, excluding the traffic area offices. The current pay, non-pay, accommodation and administrative capital budgets are:

	Pay £ million	Non-pay £ million	Accommodation £ million	Administrative capital £ million
Construction programme division OUs	18·255	2·567	3·712	0·392
Network management and maintenance OUs	16·588	3·822	4·290	0·380
London regional office	6·756	0·333	1·648	0·052
HQ directorates	23·492	3·971	6·064	[1]1·800

[1] The administrative capital figure for HQ directorates includes the IT budget of £1·5 million which is held centrally for use throughout highways safety and traffic command.

Budgets for individual operating units (OUs) are not now monitored centrally as the directors in charge of the construction programme divisions, network management divisions, London regional office and HQ directorates have discretion to switch funds between OUs in the interests of efficient administration. The figures shown vary during the course of the year as directors switch funding into or out of other budgets.

Railtrack

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will place in the Library the reports produced by Coopers and Lybrand and other consultants on access charging prices for Railtrack.

Mr. Freeman: No. The reports contain commercially confidential information.

Trains (WC Facilities)

Mr. Tipping: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what recent discussions he has had with the chairman of British Rail about its finance and the running of trains without WC facilities; and what provisions of the passengers charter apply to these facilities.

Mr. Freeman [holding answer 30 November 1993]: The provision and cleaning of toilet facilities on trains is an operational matter for the board. Although the passengers charter does not refer specifically to this aspect of service, the provision of clean toilets on longer distance services is an important aspect of BR's commitment to provide a high quality of service. For this reason, BR regularly monitors customer satisfaction with this aspect of its service.

ENVIRONMENT

Local Government Reorganisation

13. Mr. Hutton: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to issue new guidance to the Local Government Commission for its work on reorganising the structure of local government in England.

Mr. Curry: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State issued revised policy guidance to the Local Government Commission on 2 November. We published revised procedure guidance on 22 November and directed the commission to begin on 13 December all its remaining shire reviews, including that of Cumbria.

Copies of both sets of guidance have been placed in the House Library.

21. Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his latest estimate of the cost to local authorities in England of preparing for local government reforms.

Mr. Gummer: I have made no such estimate.

Eco-Labelling

14. Mr. Morley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the United Kingdom Ecolabelling Board.

Mr. Yeo: The United Kingdom Ecolabelling Board awarded the first European Community ecolabels to a British manufacturer, Hoover Ltd, for three washing machines in its New Wave Range on 25 November.

The board, which has recently been strengthened by the appointment of two environmental experts, continues to play a leading role within Europe in the development of ecolabelling.

Contaminated Land

15. Dame Jill Knight: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what steps he intends taking to help the construction industry counter the problems posed by the present regulations on contaminated land.

Mr. Baldry: There are no regulations. The Government are reviewing policy and contributing about £1·5 million a year towards research into decontamination and building on contaminated land.

Energy Efficiency

16. Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to improve energy efficiency standards in buildings.

Mr. Yeo: In recent years the budget for my Department's Energy Efficiency Office (EEO) has substantially increased, and for 1994-95 will be over £100 million, over 17 times the real level of expenditure in 1979-80. Much of this will relate to buildings.

THORP

17. Mr. Alan W. Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether he will convene a full and independent public inquiry into the commissioning of the thermal oxide reprocessing plant; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: Responses to the consultation are still being assessed. When they have all been carefully considered, my right hon. Friend the Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and I will decide whether to afford a hearing or inquiry and, if we decide not to do so, will take final decisions on the authorisations.

Solent

18. Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to announce the criteria that will be used for the classification of the Solent in respect of estuarine status for use under the urban waste water treatment directive.

Mr. Yeo: The two different bases used for defining the outer limits of estuaries in the United Kingdom were set out in draft guidance to accompany draft implementing regulations for the directive. Both drafts were issued for public consultation in April of this year.

29. Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he expects a change in the classification of the Solent for the purposes of water quality.

Mr. Yeo: I shall be announcing my decision on the classification of the Solent for the purposes of the UWWTD in due course.

Right to Buy

19. Mr. Mark Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what further steps he is taking to help council tenants to buy their houses.

Sir George Young: We introduced our new rent to mortgage scheme on 11 October. This will extend new opportunity of home ownership to council tenants who are financially secure, but cannot quite afford to buy their homes outright. My right hon. Friend also announced yesterday a £30 million boost to the cash incentive scheme, which helps council tenants to buy their own home in the private sector. Similar grants are also available to housing association tenants.

22. Sir Donald Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many homes have been sold under right-to-buy legislation.

Sir George Young: In England, a total of 1·17 million homes have been sold under the right to buy. The figure for Great Britain as a whole is almost 1·5 million.

Council Tax

20. Mr. Jacques Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the 10 local councils which charged the highest rate of council tax this year.

Mr. Baldry: The 10 local councils in England with the highest headline band C council taxes are:

Authority	£
Newcastle upon Tyne	704
Greenwich	696
Manchester	656
Haringey	646
Liverpool	645
Harlow	644
Camden	638
North Tynside	628
Salford	628
Derwentside	626

Mrs. Beckett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many appeals against council tax valuation there have been since the original council tax valuations took place, (a) in total (b) by local authority and (c) by standard region; and what was the average cost of processing those appeals in the financial year in which they occurred.

Mr. Curry: I refer the hon. Member to the answers I gave her on 25 November, at columns 190-205.

Standard Spending Assessments

23. Mr. Illsley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to announce changes to, and the level of, standard spending assessments.

Mr. Curry: My right hon. Friend will make a statement to the House shortly on the provisional revenue support grant settlement for 1994-95, including details of proposals for standard spending assessments.

Local Government (Suffolk)

24. Mr. Spring: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment to what extent he is taking into account local opinion in determining the future of local government in Suffolk.

Mr. Curry: The Local Government Commission will begin its review of local government in Suffolk on 13 December. The commission must take into consideration all relevant representations made to it. We shall take local views fully into account when considering the commission's recommendations.

Hazardous Waste

25. Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will seek powers to strengthen the regulations for the importation of hazardous waste.

Mr. Yeo: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is considering the need for additional provisions to implement the EC Waste Shipments Regulation.

Council House Sales

26. Mr. Robert Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment which local authorities have sold off all of their council housing stock.

Sir George Young: The following 23 councils have transferred all or most of their housing stock to housing associations:

Breckland DC
Broadland DC
London Borough of Bromley
Chiltern DC
Christchurch BC
East Cambridgeshire DC
East Dorset DC
Hambleton DC
Medina BC
Mid Sussex DC
Newbury DC
North Bedfordshire DC
Rochester upon Medway City C
Ryedale DC
Sevenoaks DC
South Buckinghamshire DC
South Wight BC
Suffolk Coastal DC
Surrey Heath BC
Swale BC
Tonbridge and Malling BC
Tunbridge Wells BC
West Dorset DC

A further eight councils on the 1993-94 disposals programme have won tenant support for transfer and are expected to submit applications for permission to transfer by March next year.

I am also pleased that the public expenditure provision for housing announced yesterday will enable the programme to be expanded in future. Fourteen authorities have applied for inclusion in next year's programme and I hope to announce the successful applicants in the next couple of weeks.

Homelessness

27. Mr. Burden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his estimate of the number of homeless families in the west midlands.

Sir George Young: In the 12 months ending June 1993 the number of households for which local authorities in the west midlands accepted responsibility for securing permanent accommodation under the provisions of part III of the Housing Act 1985 was 17,570. This is some 300 (1·7 per cent.) less than the number accepted in the previous year ending June 1992.

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish a table showing the total number of households (a) applying and (b) accepted by each of the London boroughs as homeless under the provisions of part III of the Housing Act 1985 in each year from 1979; and how many homeless households were accommodated in (i) bed and breakfast hotels and (ii) other temporary accommodation at the end of each of those years.

Sir George Young: I have today placed in the Library a table giving the numbers of households which each local authority in England reported as having accepted responsibility to secure permanent accommodation under the homelessness provisions of the Housing Act 1985 in the years 1979 to 1992.

Information on applications, for 1991 and 1992 only (this was not collected prior to 1991), and the numbers of households in the various types of temporary accommodation at the end of the year reported by London boroughs can be found in the following editions of "Local Housing Statistics: England and Wales".

Year	Table number	Edition number
1979	14	54
1980	13	62
1981	7	63
1982	9	66
1983	12	70
1984	12	74
1985	9*(b)*	78
1986	9*(b)*	82
1987	9*(b)*	86
1988	9*(b)*	90
1989	9*(b)*	94
1990	9*(b)*	98
1991	9*(b)*	102
1992	8*(b)*	106

Copies of all these publications are in the Library.

Social Security Spending

28. Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what contribution he is making to the Government's review of social security spending.

Mr. Gummer: Ministers and officials in the Departments of the Environment and of Social Security are in regular contact about issues of mutual interest. A formal working group has been established to discuss matters relating to housing and benefits policy.

Local Government (North Yorkshire)

30. Mr. John Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what advice he has given to the Local Government Commission about the review of local government in North Yorkshire.

Mr. Baldry: The review of local government in Humberside, Lincolnshire and North Yorkshire is being conducted in accordance with the original policy and procedure guidance which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State issued to the commission in July 1992. Copies are in the Library of the House.

Construction Industry

31. Mr. Ward: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what action he has taken within his Department to support his sponsorship of the construction industry.

Mr. Baldry: A new construction sponsorship directorate has been set up within the Department of the Environment with the aim of helping all sectors of the United Kingdom construction industry to succeed in their domestic, European and world markets. It is the advocate within Government and the European Union for the industry.

Derelict Land Grants

32. Mr. Purchase: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he next intends to meet the Association of Metropolitan Authorities to discuss derelict land grants.

Sir George Young: I have no immediate plans to meet the AMA but if it has specific concerns about derelict land grants, I am happy to take note of them.

Responsibility for the derelict land grant programme will pass next spring to English Partnerships, about which the AMA has been fully consulted.

Conservation Areas (Protection of Premises)

33. Mr. John Townend: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the use of powers of local authorities to restrict traders' rights to protect their premises in conservation areas.

Mr. Curry: Installation of shutters or other security devices which would materially affect the external appearance of a commercial building in a conservation area requires planning permission. In considering applications for planning permission, local planning authorities—or on appeal the Secretary of State—must take into account appropriate local plan policies and other material considerations. In the case of applications relating to a building in a conservation area, security considerations have to be balanced against the statutory requirement to have special regard to the desirability of preserving or enhancing the character or appearance of the area.

My Department's draft circular "Planning and Crime Prevention", currently subject to public consultation, encourages planning authorities to adopt a sympathetic approach where the security of listed buildings and buildings in conservation areas is concerned and to explore with applicants the scope for a mutually acceptable solution to their requirements. A copy of the draft circular is available in the Library.

Local Government Commission

34. Mr. Robert B. Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he next plans to meet Sir John Banham to discuss the progress of the Local Government Commission.

Mr. Gummer: I am next scheduled to meet Sir John Banham on Tuesday 18 January.

Concessionary Fares (London)

35. Mr. Austin-Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will review the provision made in calculating standard spending assessments and grant distribution to London authorities to reflect expenditure on concessionary fare schemes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Curry: As part of the review of standard spending assessments for 1994-95 we have considered carefully the case for including specific provision for spending on concessionary fares in London. My right hon. Friend will announce his proposals for SSAs shortly.

Bury Metro

36. Mr. Sumberg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received in relation to the calculation of the standard spending assessment for Bury Metro; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Baldry: We have received representations from the metropolitan borough of Bury on a number of standard spending assessment issues and on the assessment for education in particular. My right hon. Friend will announce his proposals for SSAs for 1994-95 shortly.

Private Rented Sector

37. Mr. Hendry: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to boost the private rented sector.

Sir George Young: We have already taken action to boost the private rented sector by introducing deregulation measures in the Housing Act 1988 to encourage landlords to bring their property on to the market. Landlords are now able to let property under assured and assured shorthold tenancies and charge market rents.

Specific initiatives launched last year include the rent-a-room scheme, under which householders no longer have to pay tax on rent from a lodger in their home if the gross amount of the rent is no more than £3,250, the flats-over-shops scheme, under which £25 million is being made available through local authorities over three years to bring flats over shops back into residential use, and, the housing associations as managing agents scheme, which allows housing associations to act as an intermediary between potential private landlords and tenants in order to encourage more empty property to be let.

Rents

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish a table showing the average rent for (a) council tenancies, (b) housing association assured tenancies, (c) housing association fair rent tenancies and (d) other regulated tenancies in each of the London boroughs in each appropriate year since 1979; and if he will express the increases as an index, taking 1979 as 100, to compare with the increase in (i) average earnings and (ii) the retail prices index over the same period.

Sir George Young: I have placed today in the Library tables showing for each London borough (a) the average local authority weekly unrebated rent, (b) the mean housing association annual registered fair rent, and (c) the mean annual registered fair rent for private tenancies, for each financial year from 1988-89 to 1992-93. The rents are also expressed as an index with 1988-89 equal to 100. The tables include a comparison between average rent indices for Greater London, male earnings, and retail prices. The information for London boroughs could be provided for the years before 1988-89 only at disproportionate cost.

Reliable information on average rents for housing association assured tenancies is not held centrally.

Information on local authority rents for Greater London from 1979 to 1989 is available in the publication "Housing and Construction Statistics 1979-89". Information on rents for housing association fair rent and other regulated tenancies for the same period can be found in the publication "Statistical Note for Rent Officers: Statistics of Rent Registrations by Rent Registration Area and Rent Assessment Committee Determinations by Panel Area".

From 1990, information on registered fair rents can be found in the publication "Rent Officer Statistics". Information on new lettings by registered housing associations can be found in the National Federation of Housing Associations quarterly bulletin; and information on rents for the whole housing association stock can be found in the report "Housing Associations in 1992" published by the Housing Corporation.

Copies of all these publications are available in the Library.

Planning Applications

Sir David Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will undertake a review of the fees structure relating to planning applications for agricultural buildings to bring the fees charged more closely into line with the overall cost of each project.

Mr. Curry: No. The purpose of planning application fees is to cover local authorities' costs in determining planning applications. They are not related to project costs. There is no evidence that the fees payable in respect of agricultural buildings are too high.

Trans-European Route Network (Wing Bypass)

Mr. Walden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) whether the public inquiry into the Wing bypass will now be reopened;

(2) what information was given to the public inquiry into the Wing bypass regarding the full implications of the TERN decision for the route;

(3) what assessment he has made regarding the adequacy of the information about the adoption of the A418 as a trans-European route by TERN that was made available to the public in the course of consultations about this route.

Mr. Baldry: We are currently considering the inspector's report on the planning applications by Buckinghamshire county council for the Wing bypass. Those applications were called in by the Secretary of State for his own determination and a public local inquiry held. A post-inquiry statement on behalf of Sir Evelyn de Rothschild has been received, which raises, inter alia, the proposed inclusion of the Wing bypass as a route within the Trans-European Route Network (TERN). We have referred that statement to the parties involved with the inquiry into the Wing bypass to give them an opportunity to comment.

We have no proposals to reopen the inquiry into the Wing bypass at the present time. We will consider, in the light of the comments received on the statement made on behalf of Sir Evelyn de Rothschild, both whether the status of the Wing bypass within TERN is material, and, if so, whether we have sufficient information on it to reach a conclusion.

Valuation Tribunals

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will list by valuation tribunal the targets set for (a) 1990-91, (b) 1991-92 and (c) 1992-93; and whether they were short of or exceeded their targets;

(2) if he will list by valuation tribunal the targets set for 1994-95;

(3) if he will list by valuation tribunal the targets set for 1993-94; and whether they are currently (a) on target, (b) below target or (c) above their target.

Mr. Baldry: Valuation tribunals are independent judicial bodies. The president of each tribunal has the statutory responsibility for making the necessary arrangements for the hearing of appeals or their disposal by written representations. There is no requirement on tribunals to seek to decide specified numbers of cases within given periods, and the numbers actually decided depend on a range of factors, many of which are outside presidents' control. My Department now discusses each year with national representatives of the tribunal service and with the Valuation Office Agency the number of cases in each major category which could realistically be expected to be settled nationally over the coming year, and the resources that would be required to bring this about. Indicative figures are issued to each tribunal office to show the rate of progress locally that would be consistent with these national expectations, and staff complements for each office are determined in the light of these. The figures do not, however, have the status of formal targets. This process has not yet been completed for 1994-95.

For 1992-93, the first year of this procedure, the number of non-domestic rating appeals resolved nationally by the Valuation Office Agency and the tribunal service in England was 336,900, compared with an expected 290,000. Progress in 1993-94 has been encouraging to date.

Housing

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what percentage of the housing investment programme bids his Department has authorised in respect of each local authority in England over the last three years in relation to their bid; and what is the cash figure in each case.

Sir George Young: A table setting out information on housing investment programme (HIP) bids, allocations, and allocations expressed as a percentage of bids, for each authority in England over the last three years, has been placed in the Library of the House.

The levels of local authorities' bids for housing investment programme resources reflect, in part, the competition for these resources and therefore often exceed the amount of resources likely to be available.

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what information his Department has on (a) the homeless figure, (b) the general waiting list figures and (c) the sheltered housing waiting list figures for each local authority in England over the last three years; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: I would refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Greenwich (Mr. Raynsford) earlier today for the numbers of households reported by individual local authorities in England as accepted for permanent rehousing under the homeless provisions of the Housing Act 1985.

Information on the numbers of households on council housing waiting lists on 1 April are collected on the annual housing investment programme (HIP1) return. Figures for each authority in England for the years 1991 to 1993 can be found in the "HIP1 All Items Print" for these years, copies of which are in the Library—column B5 gives the overall size of the waiting list and column B6B gives the numbers of households requiring specialised dwellings.

Capital Receipts

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the value of the capital receipts accumulated by each local authority in England (a) for the last three years and (b) the total of such resources available in each local authority for use if such use were to be permitted.

Mr. Baldry: I have arranged for information on the value of usable capital receipts held by each local authority at 31 March in each of the last three years to be placed in the Library of the House. Local authorities may use all of these receipts.

Local authorities are not required separately to identify the reserved part of capital receipts from other amounts set aside as provision for credit liabilities (PCL). No separate figures are available for the unapplied balance of PCL which has originated from set aside capital receipts.

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the capital receipts income for each of the London borough councils from the sale of council housing in each of the last five years.

Sir George Young: The information requested, as reported by each of the London borough councils, is as follows. The figures exclude the element of lending by the local authorities for council house purchase.

Capital receipts from the sale of council dwellings in London (excluding lending for council house purchase)

Home Insulation

Mr. Hanson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to increase home insulation schemes.

Mr. Yeo: I am delighted to announce that my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor was able to announce on 30 November an extra £35 million per year for the home energy efficiency scheme. This will be targeted on pensioners and disabled people and will provide grants for more than 200,000 extra households per year throughout the United Kingdom, bringing the total number of households receiving grants to almost half a million a year.

Local Authorities (Debt)

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list those local authorities in England and Wales which are debt-free for the purposes of the capital control system.

Mr. Baldry: Information received from local authorities indicates that the English authorities listed below were debt-free for capital control purposes at 30 September 1993. Information from Welsh authorities is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales.

Local Government Review

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish the findings of MORI polls carried out during the Local Government Commission's public consultation exercise on proposals for the reorganisation of local government in Avon, Gloucestershire and Somerset; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Baldry: This is a matter for the Local Government Commission. However, I understand that it will be publishing the results of the MORI polls in Avon, Gloucestershire and Somerset shortly.

Mr. Nigel Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he will publish the Local Government Commission's final recommendations for Avon, Gloucestershire and Somerset, following the public consultation exercise carried out earlier this year; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Baldry: The Local Government Commission is currently drawing up its final recommendations to my right hon. Friend on local government structure in Avon, Gloucestershire and Somerset. It is due to complete this final report by 23 January 1994.

Smokeless Coal

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment on what date the United Kingdom will conform to the EC conditions on the use of domestic smokeless coal; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Yeo: There are no EC conditions on the use of domestic smokeless coal.

Sewage Works, Braunston

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement on the proposals to erect a multi-screen cinema on the old sewage works at Braunston, Leicestershire; and if he will call in the proposals.

Mr. Baldry: These proposals form an application for planning consent for reserved matters made to Blaby district council. The council resolved to grant outline planning permission in 1991, subject to the completion of a planning agreement covering highway works. An acceptable use of the land has therefore been established and the circumstances do not justify the unusual step of calling in this application.

Local Government Finance

Sir David Knox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the average unrebated rate-community charge-council tax in (a) local authority and (b) housing association tenancies in each year since 1978 at current prices, at constant April 1993 prices, and using an index with 1978=100.

Mr. Curry: This answer can be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Construction Products Directive

Mr. Spellar: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what action he is calling to enforce the construction products directive.

Mr. Baldry: The directive was implemented by the Construction Products Regulations in December 1991. In Great Britain enforcement of the legislation is the responsibility of trading standards officers and in Northern Ireland of environmental health officers. Provision for the additional costs falling on local authorities has been made in the appropriate local authority spending assessments since 1991-92. The Department is working with the European Commission and other member states to complete the technical development of the directive as soon as possible.

Notting Hill Housing Trust

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will take steps to improve the administration of the Notting Hill housing trust; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: The statutory responsibility for the regulation of registered housing associations rests with the Housing Corporation, which monitors associations' performance to ensure they are effectively managed. If my hon. Friend has specific concerns about the management of an individual association, it would be appropriate for these to be referred to the Housing Corporation to consider.

County Hall, London

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to pass the proceeds from the sale of county hall and other ex-GLC property and assets to the London boroughs; how much money is expected to be involved; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Baldry: The distribution of such proceeds is a matter not for my right hon. Friend but for the London residuary body. The riverside building has been sold to the Shirayama Corporation, but the residuary body is still seeking to dispose of the remaining buildings on the county hall site. Certain moneys are to be distributed by 31 December 1993 to the City of London and the London boroughs under the terms of an order which my right hon. Friend has laid before Parliament. The total sum involved will become clear when the distribution is made.

Carbon Dioxide

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to strengthen the Department's building regulations advisory committee with a technical and commercial expert in thermal insulation to keep under close specialist review carbon dioxide emissions.

Mr. Baldry: None. Expertise on thermal insulation matters was increased earlier this year with the appointment to the committee of Professor Pat O'Sullivan of University College, London.

Drainage Boards

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what consideration his Department is giving in respect of the council tax valuation category for internal drainage boards in respect of intensive livestock units; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jack: I have been asked to reply.

Following representations from the National Farmers Union and the British Poultry Federation, the Ministry issued a consultation paper on 15 October seeking views from a range of interested parties on proposals to abate the drainage rates payable by certain intensive livestock and glasshouse enterprises. Responses were requested by 22 November and a decision as to whether to proceed with the proposals will be made shortly in the light of those responses.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what consideration his Department is giving in respect of the council tax valuation category for internal drainage boards to changing intensive livestock units from paying the internal drainage boards' valuation rate to a business rate; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Jack: I have been asked to reply.

The Government has no plans to do this.

City Pride

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many additional resources will be made available for city pride.

Mr. Baldry: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Vaz) on Thursday 25 November at column 187.

Bathing Water Quality

Mr. Lidington: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will announce the results of this year's bathing water quality monitoring; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Yeo: The monitoring carried out during the 1993 season shows that 80 per cent. of the 457 identified bathing waters in the United Kingdom met the mandatory coliform bacteria standards of the EC bathing water directive. This compares with 79 per cent. in 1992 and 76 per cent. in 1991.

Rain influences results, but in spite of poor weather in many places during the bathing season this year overall compliance has improved.

This slow but steady increase is a satisfying indication that the works being undertaken to improve bathing water quality are having the desired effect. Some waters which invariably failed in previous seasons are now up to standard.

The main results for the United Kingdom are summarised with details for English and Welsh bathing waters. This information will be placed in the Libraries of both Houses today and will be supplemented by a report with more detailed results in due course.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Heavy Electrical Products

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what further action he intends to take to improve exports of heavy electrical products.

Mr. Sainsbury: Substantial new measures to help exporters have already been introduced this year. ECGD support has been extended and premia reduced. The Overseas Projects Board has set up a number of sectoral working groups, including one on power, to help improve the United Kingdom's share of major products overseas. The Department is already supporting exporters of heavy electrical products through its export services. Sixty additional staff have been assigned to export promotion and 100 export promoters are being seconded from the private sector. There are no plans to introduce further help, but, as always, we would be happy to consider any requests from the industry for such help.

Insolvency

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many complaints the Insolvency Service agency received about its work in 1991, 1992 and so far in 1993.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: The Insolvency Service's chief executive has received four complaints following introduction by the agency in February 1993 of a formal procedure under this Government's citizens charter initiative. The agency does not keep any other record specifically relating to complaints, but receives a range of correspondence relating to official receivers and insolvency practitioners. This correspondence should be considered in the context of the 8,368 companies wound up compulsorily and 22,632 individuals entering bankruptcy in 1991, 9,734 liquidations and 32,106 bankruptcies in 1992, and 7,004 liquidations and 26,627 bankruptcies to 31 October 1993.

Mr. Peter Joyce, the agency's chief executive, answered letters about the administration of insolvencies which did not arise out of the published standard but sometimes contained criticism of the service, totalling 26 in 1991, 85 in 1992 and 49 to 31 October 1993.

In addition, I and my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade have responded to letters from hon. Members concerning specific insolvencies totalling 399 in 1991, 355 in 1992 and 314 to 31 October 1993. Officials have answered on our behalf 207 letters in 1992 and 147 to 31 October 1993. Information on how many of these letters contained criticism of the service could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

No central record is kept of complaints made direct to official receivers.

Colliery Equipment

Ms Walley: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) if he will give details of all machinery and equipment currently earmarked for removal from Silverdale colliery, North Staffordshire, to the Nottinghamshire coalfield; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will list the machinery and equipment at Silverdale colliery on 20 November.

Mr. Eggar: The deployment of machinery and equipment is a matter for British Coal.

Postage Stamps

Mr. Redmond: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what consideration he has given to the future use of royal emblems on postage stamps; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin: I understand that the Post Office has no plans to change the present arrangements.

Bomb-proofing

Mr. Redmond: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what has been the cost, by location, of bomb-proofing the Department's premises.

Mr. Eggar: On security grounds, I do not propose to give this information.

Ships

Mr. Cousins: To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether launch aid support is available in respect of the construction of novel ship designs or ship engines.

Mr. Sainsbury: No. Launch aid is available, under the Civil Aviation Act 1982, to assist specifically the design, development and production of civil aircraft.

Post Boxes

Mr. Redmond: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what reasons underline the absence of the royal cipher from the new Post Office postal boxes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin: I understand from the Post Office that all cast iron post boxes installed by Royal Mail continue to bear the royal cipher or Scottish crown. Royal Mail has, however, introduced a range of polypropylene boxes without these emblems. These boxes are installed in street locations to assist postal delivery staff and are not normally intended to have any public posting function. On occasions, however, these boxes have been installed on a temporary trial basis to assess particular posting needs. Where it is subsequently decided to introduce a permanent facility a cast iron box is installed.

Government Car Service

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the annual cost to the Department of the car service for Ministers; and how many vehicles are involved.

Mr. Eggar: The annual cost of the car service for Ministers is about £380,000, including VAT, for seven cars.

British Gas

Miss Lestor: To ask the President of the Board of Trade when he expects to respond to the Monopolies and Mergers Commission inquiry into British Gas; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: My right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade is currently considering the representations which he has received as part of the consultation process on the MMC's report on gas. He recognises the need to avoid delay; but it is also important not to take precipitate decisions on the important matters raised by the report.

Electricity

Mr. Spellar: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what representations he has received regarding proposals to harmonise electrical plugs and sockets throughout the European Community; and what response he has made to the Commission regarding such proposals.

Mr. Sainsbury: Several trade associations and other bodies have expressed their respective points of view on the harmonisation work currently being carried out by CENELEC. My Department has commissioned an independent analysis of the costs and benefits for the United Kingdom, and the results of this study will be published in the new year; written evidence has also been submitted by the Department to the Trade and Industry Committee. We have assured the European Commission that the United Kingdom will continue to participate actively in the work of the various technical committees and working groups that have been established by CENELEC.

Concessionary Coal

Mr. Tipping: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list those individuals and organisations who replied to his consultative document on concessionary coal; and if he will place copies of their submissions in the Library.

Mr. Eggar: The following have submitted views on the Government's consultation paper on the concessionary fuel entitlements of past and present British Coal employees and their dependants following privatisation of the corporation:

British Association of Colliery Managers
British Coal Retired Staff Association (Cannock and District)
British Coal Retired Staff Association (North Staffordshire District)
Bruce Lindsay Coal Ltd
R J Budge (Mining) Limited
The Chamber of Coal Traders Limited
Currell, Lewis & Martin Limited
Federation of Small Mines of Great Britain
D J Freeman—Solicitors
Legal and Venture Joint Ventures Limited
The Miller Group Limited
National Association of Colliery Overmen Deputies and Shotfirers
The National Association of Licensed Opencast Operators
National Union of Mineworkers
National Union of Mineworkers (COSA)—The Ex-COSA Section—Region 3
Pascoe Fuels Limited
Ryan Mining Limited
Small Mines Association of Wales
Southampton Institute of Higher Education—Law Research Centre
Union of Democratic Mineworkers
Union of Democratic Mineworkers (Nottinghamshire Section)

I have also received a number of responses from individuals.

It is a matter for the organisations and individuals concerned whether they wish their correspondence to be made public.

British Coal (Pension Funds)

Mr. Tipping: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list those individuals and organisations who replied to his consultive document on the future of British Coal's pension funds; and if he will place copies of their submissions in the Library.

Mr. Eggar: The following have submitted views on the Government's consultation paper on British Coal pensions following privatisation of the corporation:

British Coal Staff Superannuation Scheme Committee of Management
Mineworkers' Pension Scheme Committee of Management
British Coal Corporation
British Association of Colliery Management
GMB/APEX Partnership
National Association of Colliery Overmen, Deputies and Shotfirers (NACODS)
National Union of Mineworkers
National Union of Mineworkers (COSA)
National Union of Mineworkers (COSA)—The Ex-COSA Section—Region 3
Federation of Small Mines of Great Britain
Small Mines Association (South Wales)
British Coal Retired Staff Association (North Staffordshire District)
British Coal Retired Staff Association (Cannock and District)

I have also received some 1,400 responses from individuals.

It is a matter for the organisations and individuals concerned whether they wish their correspondence to be made public.

Offshore Installations

Dr. Godman: To ask the President of the Board of Trade (1) what proposals he has to modify the Petroleum Act 1987; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if he will list the offshore installations and pipeline networks which have been dismantled and removed in the past six years and those scheduled to be demolished and withdrawn from the United Kingdom continental shelf; and if he will make a statement;

(3) how many programmes involving the abandonment of (a) offshore installations and (b) submarine pipeline networks he has approved over the past five years; if he will outline the maintenance and inspection regulations concerning such abandoned structures and pipelines; what advice is given to commercial fishermen associations and other users of the maritime environment; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade and his predecessor the Secretary of State for Energy have approved the following abandonment programmes for offshore installations and pipelines:

Year	Facilities
1988	Piper Alpha
1991	Crawford
1992	Argyll, Duncan & Innes Blair
1993	Angus
	Forbes
	Part of Staffa—Ninian pipeline

In each case, except Piper Alpha and the Blair pipeline, the abandonment programme provided for complete removal of the facilities.

Maintenance and inspection requirements are decided on a case by case basis in the light of the circumstances of each abandonment proposal and after consultation with other Government Departments. In each case, the President of the Board of Trade has required consultations to be carried out with interested parties, including representatives of fishermen's organisations, and that the results of the consultations be reported in the abandonment programme. My officials meet representatives of fishermen's organisations at regular intervals for discussions on a range of subjects, including abandonment.

I have no proposals at present to modify the Petroleum Act 1987.

Nuclear Industry

Sir John Hannam: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what is the current status of the terms of reference for the pending review of the nuclear industry; and what consultations are taking place.

Mr. Eggar: Options for the scope and format of the nuclear review are under consideration within Government. I cannot prejudge the terms of reference. It remains the Government's intention to make a further announcement as soon as possible.

Energy Demand

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will publish a table showing the disaggregated breakdown of energy demand by sector and region; and if he will indicate the current energy supply availability in Wales by fuel type.

Mr. Eggar: Figures for energy demand are not available in the detail requested. Energy consumption by final user for the United Kingdom in 1992 was:

	Billion therms
Industry	15·0
Transport	19·5
Domestic	17·4
Other final users	8·2
Total final users	60·2

Source: Digest of United Kingdom Energy Statistics.

The latest available figures for energy supply in Wales are as follows:

	Million tonnes
Coal (available for home consumption, 1992)	8·3
Petroleum (inland deliveries, 1991)	4·0
	Terrawatt hours
Gas (total available 1991)	31·8
Electricity (net supplied, 1992)	18·3

Sources: Digest of Welsh Statistics, 1993 and Welsh Economic Trends, 1993.

Value Added Tax

Mr. Ainger: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make it his policy to require fuel and power companies to use the interest accrued on VAT payments collected from customers for energy conservation within customers' properties.

Mr. Eggar [holding answer 30 November 1993]: Both the Director General of Gas Supply and the Director General of Electricity Supply have a duty to promote energy efficiency. This is primarily a matter for the Energy Efficiency Office.

Fireworks

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make it his policy to keep a record of the countries which export fireworks to Britain; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I have been asked to reply.

I am replying as the Minister with responsibility for controls on importation of fireworks. The Health and Safety Executive already keeps records of countries which export fireworks to Britain and will continue to do so.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Budget Council

Mr. Barnes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Chelmsford (Mr. Burns) of 19 November, Official Report, columns 4-6, what were the voting figures on (a) the revised expenditure ceilings for 1994 and (b) the letter of amendment to the draft supplementary and amending budget for 1993 recorded in the meeting of the European Community's Budget Council held on 15 November; and if he will make a statement.

Sir John Cope: The Council agreed unanimously to the adjustment of the expenditure ceilings for 1994 which had been determined in the context of the new inter-institutional agreement.

The presidency concluded that the necessary majority existed to establish the letter of amendment to the draft supplementary and amending budget for 1993; and no formal vote was therefore taken.

Financial Services Act 1986

Mr. French: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what have been the practical benefits to the private investor of the Financial Services Act 1986 and the regulatory regime which it created.

Mr. Nelson: The implementation of the Act in 1988 has brought significant benefits for the private investor. For example, firms carrying on investment business must be properly authorised. The regulators have taken action against firms not complying with their rules of conduct. A sizeable number have been found unfit to deal with private investors and prevented from doing so. A further example is the establishment of the investors compensation scheme, from which some 5,000 private investors have benefited to date.

State Pension

Mr. French: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what percentage of national average earnings the basic state pension will be in (a) 2000, (b) 2010, (c) 2020, (d) 2030, (e) 2040 and (f) 2050 if earnings rise faster than prices by (i) 1·5 per cent. and (ii) 2·5 per cent.

Mr. Portillo: The information is in the table.

Year	1·5 per cent. real earnings growth	2·5 per cent. real earnings growth
1993	17·7	17·7
2000	16·0	14·9
2010	13·7	11·6
2020	11·8	9·1
2030	10·2	7·1
2040	8·8	5·6
2050	7·6	4·3

Notes: The baseline for the calculation is April 1993. The basic retirement pension was uprated to £56·10 per week on 1 April 1993. National average earnings in April 1993 were £316·90 (Source: the Department of Employment's new earnings survey).

National Debt

Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will list the national debt of each EC country, Japan and the United States of America in local currency; what proportion such debt is of gross national product; and whether such debt for each country includes public sector pension liabilities where those pension liabilities are not provided by private sector funds.

Mr. Nelson: Data on Government debt in local currencies are available in the IMF's Government finance statistics yearbook and on gross national product in the OECD's national accounts, copies of which are available in the House Library. Contingent liabilities arising from public sector pensions are not included in the Government debt figures in the IMF's Government finance statistics yearbook.

Privatisation

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what are (a) the total receipts from the privatisation of Government assets for each year since 1979, (b) the percentage shares of total Government income this represents for each year and (c) the total sums raised by each separate sale.

Mr. Dorrell: The table shows the privatisation proceeds received by the Government for each year since 1979-80 and their scale relative to general Government receipts. Privatisations and secondary sales of shares with net proceeds of less than £50 million in any year have not been shown individually.

Tax Avoidance

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what estimate he has as to the annual extent of tax avoidance; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: No reliable estimate can be made, but it remains the Government's policy to ensure that oppórtunities for tax avoidance are minimised. My right hon. and learned Friend's Budget contains a number of anti-avoidance measures which will increase revenue by £1·8 billion over three years.

VAT

Mr. Madden: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if VAT on fuel bills will be inclusive, or exclusive, of any standing charge levied; what arrangements are available to Her Majesty's Government to vary positive rates of VAT downwards; and if he will make a statement.

Sir John Cope: Standing charges are regarded as part of the payment for the supply of fuel and power and will therefore be subject to the VAT changes introduced by section 42 of the Finance Act 1993.

Only those goods and services specified in a list annexed to EC directive 92/77/EEC can be moved from the standard rate of VAT to a reduced VAT rate. The reduced rate cannot be lower than 5 per cent. and there are no provisions for the introduction of zero rates of VAT.

Bomb-proofing

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what has been the cost, by location, of bomb-proofing the Department's premises.

Sir John Cope: On security grounds, I do not propose to give this information.

First-time Home Buyers

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to give increased support to first-time buyers.

Mr. Nelson: Housing is now more affordable than for a number of years, due to lower interest rates and house prices. The Government's taxation and expenditure plans are set out fully in the "Financial Statement and Budget Report".

Income Tax

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what tax a married man on an income of (a) £900,000 per annum and (b) £15,000 per annum would have been required to pay in each of the last 10 years assuming no additional tax allowances.

Mr. Dorrell: The information is in the table.

	Tax liability for a married man with total income[1] of
Year	£900,000 £	£15,000 £
1983-84	531,668	3,662

1993-94	354,254	2,334

[1] Assuming all income is earned and that the only allowances and reliefs available are the married man's allowance for years up to 1989-90 and the personal allowance and married couple's allowance for subsequent years.

PRIME MINISTER

Kashmir

Mr. Cox: To ask the Prime Minister what discussions he has had with the Prime Minister of Pakistan on the policy the Pakistan Government intend to follow regarding Kashmir.

The Prime Minister [holding answer 30 November 1993]: I discussed Kashmir with Prime Minister Benazir Bhutto at the Commonwealth Heads of Government meeting in Cyprus in October. I reaffirmed the United Kingdom Government's view that the issue of Kashmir can be resolved only by bilateral negotiation between Pakistan and India. I therefore welcome the joint announcement by the Indian and Pakistani Governments that they will be conducting bilateral talks at senior official level in January.

EDUCATION

School Curriculum and Assessment Authority

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Education (1) if he will give the names of those who currently advise his Department about the national curriculum and associated matters, and in each case the body they represent;

(2) how many people drawn from the primary school sector of education are on his Department's advisory team; and what percentage they represent.

Mr. Robin Squire: The School Curriculum and Assessment Authority has the main responsibility for advising my right hon. Friend on the national curriculum and associated matters. The authority was established on 1 October under the chairmanship of Sir Ron Dearing. Its 14 members, announced on 14 September, are:

Mr. Roy Blatchford—Headmaster, Bicester Community College, Oxfordshire (an LEA maintained secondary school).

Mr. John Burn—Principal, Emmanuel College, Gateshead (Tyneside City Technology College).

Mrs. Judith Conway—Teacher, Christ Church School, Chorleywood, Hertfordshire (a self-governing GM primary school).

Mr. Paul Dick—Headmaster, Kennet School, Thatcham, Berkshire (an LEA maintained secondary school).

Mrs. Heather Du Quesnay—Director of Education, Hertfordshire County Council.

Dr. Philip Evans—Headmaster, Bedford School (an independent 7-18 school).

Mrs. Yvonne Hargreaves-Pizer—Headteacher, Hague Primary School, Tower Hamlets, London (an LEA maintained school).

Mr. Graham Mackenzie—Group Chief Executive, UES Holdings Limited

Dr. John Marks—Open University Tutor in Physics and History and Philosophy of Science, and Director of the Educational Research Trust

Professor Leonard Marsh—Principal, Bishop Grosseteste College, Lincoln

Professor Anthony O'Hear—Professor of Philosophy, University of Bradford

Mr. David Quarmby—Joint Managing Director, J. Sainsbury plc.

Mrs. Shahwar Sadeque—Director of Art of Intelligence (a computer software company), Governor of the BBC, and former researcher and school teacher

Mr. Martyn Worrall—Headmaster, Hawksworth Hall School, Leeds (an independent special school owned by the Spastics Society).

The members were selected on the basis of their individual expertise and experience and not as representatives of any particular body.

Three of the authority's seven teachers are involved in primary education and much of Professor Marsh's professional work has been concerned with the primary sector.

Bomb-proofing

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what has been the cost, by location, of bomb-proofing the Department's premises.

Mr. Boswell: On security grounds, I do not propose to give this information.

Standard Numbers

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will list for the last 12 months, and by local education authority, the number of occasions where he has (a) declined and (b) approved an application in respect of standard numbers.

Mr. Robin Squire: Over the last 12 months my right hon. Friend approved 636 requests from local education authorities for changes in school standard numbers. In 171 of these cases the order implementing the change modified the original proposals. Over the same period my right hon. Friend declined to approve a change on 76 occasions. The figures by local education authority are as follows:

Car Crime

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what response his Department has made to the proposals by the National Crime Prevention Organisation for an educational initiative to cut car crime.

Mr. Forth: The National Crime Prevention Organisation has not made any specific proposals to my right hon. Friend for an educational initiative to cut car crime.

Musical Instruments (VAT)

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will ensure that sixth form college students receive an entitlement to a refund on value added tax on musical instruments comparable to that applicable to sixth formers in schools; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Boswell: Sixth formers in schools have no such entitlement. Under a special scheme, local authorities are eligible for VAT refunds. Such refunds may be claimed where local education authorities buy musical instruments from retailers. Sixth form colleges and FE colleges are not similarly eligible, but the Government take account of VAT costs in determining funding for this sector; the supply of goods and services incidental to the supply of education by such colleges is, however, exempt from VAT.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT ADMINISTRATION

India (Dam)

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what steps he took before deciding to fund the upgrading of the Hirakud hydro-electric dam at Orissa in India formally to appraise and meet the needs of the families displaced by the original dam.

Mr. Goodlad: The appraisal mission took account of the arrangements made for resettlement of people displaced by the original dam in the late 1940s and early 1950s, which are well documented. The upgrading project will not have any significant social impact for these resettled groups or any other groups, and no appropriate action was identifed in respect of the people affected by the original scheme. ODA considers that the needs of this group are best addressed through projects targeting poor and tribal people in Orissa more generally, such as the Orissa health and family welfare project which we are financing.

Brazil

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs with which organisations in Brazil the Government have worked to help Brazilian street children.

Mr. Goodlad: The Overseas Development Administration, through its joint funding scheme, currently supports projects for Brazilian street children with the National Movement of Street Boys and Girls, and the Brazilian Centre for Poor Girls and Adolescents. This assistance has been channelled through the British NGOs childhope, Womankind, CAFOD, Oxfam and Christian Aid. In addition, funds have been made available from the British ambassador's small projects fund to support the Sao Martinho shelter for street children in Rio de Janeiro.

Cambodia

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what funds the Government have currently committed to (a) Cambodia mines action centre and (b) any other grouping for de-mining in Cambodia; and what further funds will be made available.

Mr. Goodlad: The Government have committed $200,000 to the Cambodia Mines Action Centre. Since October 1991 the Government have also provided nearly £500,000 to other de-mining operations in Cambodia, including the Halo Trust, a British non-governmental organisation. We hope that agreement on longer-term international support will be reached by early 1994.

Eastern Europe

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will name the companies with whom the Government are working in eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union to aid these countries in their development.

Mr. Goodlad: The know-how fund, Britain's programme of bilateral technical assistance to central and eastern Europe and the former Soviet Union, is working with numerous partners.

A list has been placed in the Library. It will be updated regularly.

Indonesia

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much aid has been given to Indonesia to date in 1993-94; and what form the aid has taken.

Mr. Goodlad: We expect to spend about £24 million in the full year 1993-94. This will be mainly technical co-operation and financial aid as part of aid and trade provision allocations. Our funds are spent mainly on projects that promote educational development, forestry conservation, energy efficiency and improved public administration and help with provision of infrastructure in the transport and other sectors.

St. Helena

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he expects a decision to be made upon which recommendations of the report, "Heritage in St. Helena", will be implemented; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Goodlad: This report was commissioned by the St. Helena Heritage Society and the Government of St. Helena, not by Her Majesty's Government, and decisions on the report are for them. We understand that some recommendations have already been implemented, whilst the others are under active consideration.

Evaluation Reports

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) if he will place in the Library a copy of the evaluation report on the pilot phase of the global environment facility commissioned by the World bank, United Nations environment programme and the United Nations development programme;

(2) if he will make a statement on the findings of the independent evaluation of the pilot phase of the global environment facility commissioned by the World bank, United Nations environment programme and the United Nations development programme;

(3) who were the members of the independent panel of experts that was formed by the World bank, United Nations environment programme and the United Nations development programme to evaluate the pilot phase of the global environment facility.

Mr. Goodlad: The independent evaluation of the global environment facility (GEF) was carried out by three teams and a co-ordinator, Mr. Haven North, under the direction of the evaluation managers of the World bank, the United Nations development programme, and the United Nations environment programme, and with the guidance of an independent panel of experts, whose members were Ms Monique Barbut, Mr. Rudolf Hoegger, the Hon. Mathias B. Keah, Dr. Ashok Khosla, Mr. Jean Quesnel and Ms Erna Witoelar.

The report focuses on institutional issues, and is intended to inform the meeting of GEF participants in Cartagena from 6-10 December to discuss the restructuring of the GEF. It is a well-written report which contains many important recommendations. I have placed a copy of the report in the Libraries of both Houses.

Aid and Trade Provision

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the outside evaluators used to study the effectiveness of particular aspects of the United Kingdom's aid programme in the last three years.

Mr. Goodlad: The ODA's evaluation department's reports are available and are listed in our "Catalogue of Evaluation Studies", an updated copy of which will shortly be placed in the Libraries of both Houses. Each report lists the outside evaluators used.

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what criticism he has received over the past three years from outside evaluators used to study the overall effectiveness of the United Kingdom aid programme; and what was the action taken.

Mr. Goodlad: The ODA's evaluation department undertakes its regular evaluation programme on a project-by-project basis, by sector or theme, rather than attempting to study overall effectiveness. Specific action taken in response to recent reports includes the preparation of a guidance paper on forestry projects in response to the findings of six forestry evaluations; and the convening of a seminar by the Aga Khan Foundation on Promoting Quality Education in the Third World as a result of a joint evaluation of the schools improvement programme which had been co-funded by ODA.

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much was paid in each of the last two years to outside evaluators of the United Kingdom's aid programme.

Mr. Goodlad: In 1991-92 and 1992-93, the ODA's evaluation department paid £333,944 and £511,404 respectively to external evaluators.

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs which 20 companies have been the leading indirect beneficiaries of spending within the aid and trade provision since its inception in 1978; and what percentage of total ATP spending each has attracted.

Mr. Goodlad: The 20 leading main contractors gaining business under the aid and trade provision since its inception in 1978 are as follows:

	Company	Percentage of total ATP commitments since 1978
1	Balfour Beatty	[1]20·95
2	GEC	7·64
3	Davy	5·89
4	Biwater	4·02
5	Amec International	4·02
6	Foster Wheeler	3·69
7	Snamprogetti	3·23
8	Northern Engineering Industries	3·16
9	John Brown Engineering	2·56
10	Siemens-Plessey	2·36
11	Phillips Radio	2·33
12	Marconi	1·84
13	Babcock	1·76
14	TecQuipment International	1·59
15	Coppee UK	1·50
16	John Laing	1·50
17	STC	1·25
18	Boving	1·17
19	AWD	1·16
20	Communication Supplies Ltd.	1·05

[1] 76 per cent. of Balfour Beatty's share (i.e. 16·01 per cent. to total ATP commitments since 1978) are accounted for by a joint venture with Cementation Ltd.

Much work under these contractors is carried out by numerous subcontractors. Information on the allocation of total ATP spending by subcontractor would be disproportionately time consuming to collect centrally.

Global Environment Facility

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much funding is given to the global environment facility per annum by the United Kingdom.

Mr. Goodlad: The United Kingdom has committed £40·3 million to the global environment facility (GEF). Of this, we contributed £4·4 million in financial year 1991-92 and £5·4 million in financial year 1992-93 as requested by the GEF. Our contributions in 1993-94 onwards will continue to depend on the requirements of the GEF for the year in question.

Know-how funds

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list in full the current disbursements under the know-how funds.

Mr. Goodlad: Disbursements for 1992-93 were as follows:

Albania	40,000
Bulgaria	1,921,000
Estonia	359,000
Former Czechoslovakia	7,093,000
GDR	2,000
Hungary	5,741,000
Kazakhstan	136,000
Latvia	350,000
Lithuania	471,000
Poland	10,553,000
Romania	3,041,000
Eastern Europe and Pan Baltic regional	2,803,000
Azerbaijan	81,000
Belarus	26,000
Georgia	26,000
Russian Federation	11,201,000
Ukraine	3,093,000
Uzbekistan	267,000
Former Yugoslavia	45,000

The public expenditure provision for know-how fund countries for 1993-4 is approximately £53 million, of which approximately £23 million has been spent to date.

World Bank Information

Mr. Denham: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what guidance was given to the United Kingdom executive director of the World bank in respect of the vote on expanding access to World bank information; and how he voted.

Mr. Goodlad [holding answer 29 November 1993]: We welcome the measures approved by the World bank's board of executive directors in August to increase substantially the information which the bank makes publicly available. We consider that this will help to promote a more participatory approach and thus strengthen the developmental effectiveness of bank-funded operations, as well as enhancing public awareness and understanding of the bank's role.

It is not our practice to reveal instructions to our executive director nor to disclose what position he takes in board discussions, the proceedings of which remain confidential.

HEALTH

Local Authority Services

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if she will list, for each local authority for each year since 1988, in homes for elderly, elderly mentally infirm and younger physically handicapped people the number of (a) wardens and deputies, (b) other care staff and care assistants and (c) other staff;

(2) if she will list for each local authority, for each year since 1988, (a) the number of organisers and assistant organisers in the home help service and (b) the number of home helps;

(3) if she will list by local authority the number of social work assistants for each year since 1988;

(4) if she will list by local authority for each year since 1989, for day centres for mentally ill, elderly and physically handicapped people the number of (a) officers in charge, deputies, leaders and assistants, (b) instructors and (c) other staff;

(5) if she will list by local authority the number of trainee social workers for each year since 1988.

Mr. Bowis: For the numbers of whole time equivalent staff directly employed by local authority social services departments in the categories requested, I refer the hon. Member to "Local Authority Social Services Statistics: Staff of Local Authority Social Services Departments", copies of which are available in the Library.

Hospital Psychiatric Services

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list for hospital psychiatric services the number of beds available and patient activity per 1,000 population for 1992-93.

Mr. Bowis: In the year ending 31 March 1993, there was an average of 47,294 beds available for use in wards caring for mentally ill patients, providing 1·0 beds per thousand population. The number of patients treated as ordinary admissions and day cases in these wards during 1992-93 was 234,000 representing 4·8 patients per thousand population. These figures are exclusive of beds available in other residential facilities.

Community Nurses

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list for 1992-93 for home community nursing services the number of first contacts by all community nurses by (a) the age group and (b) the number of whole-time equivalent community nurses.

Mr. Sackville: We expect the information requested for the number of first contacts by all community nurses by age group for 1992-93 to be available in April 1994. The data on the number of whole time equivalent community nurses will be available in the summer of 1994.

Zemaphyte

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether zemaphyte may be privately prescribed to NHS patients.

Dr. Mawhinney: "Zemaphyte" Chinese herbal eczema remedy was added to the list of drugs and other substances which cannot be prescribed on national health service prescription from 1 November 1993. Zemaphyte may be prescribed on a private prescription by a general practitioner. The costs of dispensing a private prescription would have to be met by the patient.

Children's Homes

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list for each local authority for each year since 1987 for community homes for children and young persons in care the number of (a) child care staff, (b) teachers and instructors and (c) other staff.

Mr. Bowis: I have arranged for information on community homes for children and young persons in care for 1988 to be placed in the Library.

Occupational Health Service

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) which regional health authorities and district health authorities, and which district general hospitals and NHS trusts, have their own occupational health service for their own staff.

(2) how many NHS staff, and what percentage of NHS staff, in each region, have access to an occupational health service.

Dr. Mawhinney: This information is not available centrally.

Cryptosporidium

Mr. Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when she expects to receive the conclusions of the research to establish the infective dose of cryptosporidium.

Mr. Sackville: Studies in animals referred to in my reply to my hon. Friend on 2 July at columns 647-48, have now been completed. They have failed to establish the infective dose of cryptosporidium. Further studies are being carried out in the United States of America but will take at least two years to produce any results.

Mr. Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what advice and guidance her Department gives to medical officers and environmental health officers regarding the issue of notices to water suppliers requiring them to advise customers to boil drinking water which contains low levels of cryptosporidium oocyst contamination.

Mr. Sackville: Advice to boil water is given to protect public health. This is the responsibility of district health authorities and is issued by their consultants in communicable disease control.

Accident and Emergency Departments

Mr. Alexander: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many accident and emergency departments are contained within NHS hospitals in England.

Mr. Sackville: The information is not available in the form requested. Data are collected for national health service trusts and directly managed hospitals with accident and emergency departments. An NHS trust comprising two or more hospitals, each with its own accident and emergency service, is recorded as having one accident and emergency department.

On this basis, in 1991-92, there were a total of 238 NHS trusts and directly managed hospitals with accident and emergency departments.

Mr. Alexander: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many accident and emergency departments in NHS hospitals in England have been closed in the last five years.

Mr. Sackville: The information is not available centrally.

Workplace Health

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the membership, and what are the terms of reference, of the task force established to examine activity on health promotion in the workplace.

Mr. Sackville: The task force's membership was as follows:

Mr. T. M. Hogg (Chairman)—Director of Production Control for Nissan Motor Manufacturing (UK) Ltd.
Mr. T. Astill—Group Director, National Pharmaceutical Association.
Dr. M. Baxendine—Director of Medical Services, United Biscuits.
Dr. P. Davies—Health and Safety Executive.
Mr. J. Cridland—Director, Environmental Affairs, CBI.
Miss S. Dymott—Head of Occupational Health Nursing Services, Esso.
Ms S. Gooch—Chair of National Standing Committee on Health and Social Policy, Royal College of Nursing.

Ms J. Greenoak—Director, Health Education Authority.
Dr. D. Miller—Consultant Occupational Physician.
Dr. M. O'Brien—President of Faculty of Public Health Medicine.
Mrs. R. Pengelly—Federation of Small Businesses.
Ms I. Sharp—Director, National Forum for Coronary Heart Disease Prevention.
Ms S. Veale—Assistant Secretary, Equality and Social Policy TUC
Dr. D. Wright—Chief Medical Officer, British Petroleum plc and Dean of the Faculty of Occupational Health Medicine.

The Departments of Health and Employment were represented. Dr. R. Smith, chairman of the Wellness Forum, participated as an observer.

The task force's terms of reference were:

"To review and assess past and current workplace activity and to advise on the development of health promotion in the workplace covering the five key areas of 'The Health of the Nation' White Paper, including health promotion campaigns and materials which can be used in the workplace, to provide regular reports to the Wider Health Working Group, including good practice, gaps in provision, and matters requiring attention."

The task force reported to the wider health working group in September, and copies of its report are available in the library. As recommended, a small steering group is being convened to take forward further work in this area.

District Health Authorities

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list in rank order the district health authorities which are currently running at (a) a deficit and (b) a surplus.

Mr. Sackville: The information requested is collected only by regional health authorities. The hon. Member may wish to contact the chairmen of the regional health authorities for details.

Hospital Parking

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidance she intends to issue to hospitals on charging (a) visitors and patients and (b) staff, for parking within hospital grounds.

Mr. Sackville: The question of charging for parking within hospitals grounds is for local determination in the light of local circumstances. We have no plans to issue guidance.

Royal Sussex County Hospital

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will publish details of the review which enabled the Brighton health commissioners to determine a zero growth rate in health care demands for the Royal Sussex county hospital when redevelopment is completed.

Mr. Sackville: The allocation of funds to East Sussex health authority is a matter for South East Thames regional health authority. The hon. Member may wish to contact Mr. Peter Barker, chairman of the regional health authority for details.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will provide current staffing figures for the Brighton Health Care NHS trust and projected staffing figures at the Royal Sussex County hospital when reconstruction is complete.

Dr. Mawhinney: Brighton health care national health service trust currently employs approximately 4,500 staff. Future employment plans at the trust is a matter for the board, the chairman of which is Mr. John Spiers.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what part the planned expansion of the Nuffield Sussex trust hospital has played in the revision of bed space demands at the Royal Sussex county hospital.

Mr. Sackville: The planned provision of health services from the Royal Sussex county hospital is a matter for Brighton health care national health service trust and East Sussex health authority. The hon. Member may wish to contact Mr. John Spiers, chairman of the trust for details.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will provide details of the present pattern of bed usage within the Brighton health care NHS trust and the proposed pattern of use when the reconstruction of the Royal Sussex county hospital is complete.

Mr. Sackville: This information is not available centrally.

Dental Charges

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the total amount raised from all charges on NHS dental services.

Dr. Mawhinney: In 1992-93 patient charge income from the general dental services was £394·8 million, net of refunds to patients. Information is not available centrally on the small amount of income raised by the limited range of patient charges applicable in the community and hospital dental services.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much would be raised if the amount paid for a course of NHS dental treatment by a patient not exempt from charges was raised from 80 per cent. of the cost of treatment to (a) 85 per cent., (b) 90 per cent., (c) 95 per cent. and (d) 100 per cent.

Dr. Mawhinney: Each additional 5 per cent. increase in the rate of the proportional charge would raise between £20 million and £25 million. This estimate is made on the assumption that there is no change in the demand for or supply of dental treatment under the general dental services.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what would be the total annual saving to the Exchequer of removing the exemption for pregnant women and nursing mothers from dental examination and treatment charges.

Dr. Mawhinney: Some £23 million in 1992-93.

Abortions

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many women having terminations of pregnancies in non-NHS hospitals were charged for the procedure in the last year for which figures are available; and what was the average charge levied.

Mr. Sackville: Of the total 179,522 abortions in 1991, 84,442—47 per cent—were carried out under the national health service, either directly in NHS hospitals or under arrangements between certain NHS authorities and the private sector. A total of 95,080 were performed on a private fee paying basis.

Information on fees charged by private clinics is supplied to the Department on an in confidence basis. The hon. Member may wish to approach individual approved places direct about the level of their fees.

Prescriptions

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will give for each year since 1988 the change in numbers of items prescribed resulting from changes to the limited list.

Dr. Mawhinney: The total number of prescriptions dispensed in each of the years from 1988 is shown in the table. It is not possible to isolate the effect of the selected list scheme from the other factors which have an influence on the number of national health service prescriptions dispensed each year.

Number of prescriptions—England

Year	Number (million)
1988	375·5
1989	383·5
1990	394·8
[1]1991	413·9
[2]1991	406·5
1992	425·1

[1] 1988 to 1991 (a) are based on fees. They cover prescriptions dispensed by community pharmacists and appliance contractors, dispensing doctors and personal administration.
[2] 1991 (b) to 1992 data are from the new prescription cost analysis system based on items and have the same coverage as above.

Health Service Reform

Mr. Sims: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what role was played by the Royal College of Nursing and other royal colleges in establishing the clinical standards advisory group; and what assessment he has made of the contribution of this group to the debate on health service reform.

Mr. Sackville: The medical and nursing royal colleges were consulted on and fully supported the establishment of the clinical standards advisory group—CSAG—in 1991. All of the group's appointed members are nominated by the medical and nursing royal colleges in the manner prescribed by the CSAG Regulations (1991 No. 578). The group's first reports, on access to and availability of specialist services published in July, copies of which are available in the Library, made a positive and constructive contribution to discussions on how best to maintain and raise standards of clinical care for national health service patients. The group has just submitted its second report, on services for people with diabetes, which the United Kingdom Health Ministers will consider carefully and publish with their response early next year.

Child Prostitution

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what are the latest estimated figures of her Department for the numbers of children involved in child prostitution;

(2) what measures are being taken by her Department to deal with the problems of child prostitution.

Mr. Bowis: My Department does not have central figures to estimate the numbers of children involved in child prostitution. I understand that my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department collects figures on the number of children cautioned or proceeded against for soliciting offences. Local authorities social services have a duty under section 47 of the Children Act 1989 to investigate where they have reasonable cause to suspect that a child in their area is suffering from or is likely to suffer significant harm and this would include information received suggesting a child may need protection from child prostitution. The Government's guidance, "Working Together", emphasises that the investigative process should involve gathering information from other key professionals and liaising with other investigating agencies such as the police. Any action taken to protect the child should be taken in collaboration with all the other agencies involved.

Royal Free Hospital

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when she expects to make a decision about the future of the renal transplant unit at the Royal Free hospital.

Dr. Mawhinney: The Government are taking the important advice of the specialty reviews into account in their review of hospital services in London.

The issues are complex but it is our intention to make some initial announcements shortly.

Surgery Costs

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the average cost of NHS procedures for (a) total hip replacement, (b) total knee replacement, (c) coronary artery bypass grafting, (d) mitral-aortic valve replacement, (e) hernia repair, (f) stripping of varicose veins, (g) hysterectomy, (h) tonsillectomy, (i) cataract extraction and lens implant, (j) knee replacement, (k) heart transplant, (l) heart/lung transplant and (m) surgery for an enlarged prostate.

Mr. Sackville: The information available is shown in the table. All estimates of average cost are at 1991-92 prices and inclusive of an allowance for capital charges. Estimates are not available for total knee replacement, stripping of varicose veins, knee replacement, heart/lung transplant and surgery for an enlarged prostate.

NHS procedure	Estimated average cost in £s (1991-92 prices)
Total hip replacement	3,810
Coronary artery bypass grafting	5,870
Heart valve replacement	8,800
Inguinal hernia	1,140
Hysterectomy	2,050
Tonsillectomy	590
Cataract extraction	1,230
Heart transplant	26,400

General Practitioners

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many general practitioners in England received gross payments in excess of £200,000 in each year since 1991-92.

Dr. Mawhinney: This information is not available centrally.

NHS Trusts

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether travel expenses for employees of national health service trusts, incurred through attending training sessions, should be paid by the employing trust.

Dr. Mawhinney: This is a matter for the employing trust.

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the total accumulated receipts of the NHS trusts that have achieved a 6 per cent. return on assets.

Dr. Mawhinney: National health service trusts do not have accumulated receipts. They do, however, have accumulated reserves which represent the surpluses retained in the trusts after interest and dividends. The total net accumulated income and expenditure reserves of all NHS trusts at 31 March 1993 was £134,510,000.

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what connections the outgoing chairman of the Royal Cornwall hospital trust had with any political party;

(2) what are the party political affiliations of chairs of trusts and regional health authorities and district health authorities at present.

Dr. Mawhinney: We do not seek details on political affiliation. People are appointed for their personal qualities, and for the skills they bring to the leadership and strategic direction of the national health service.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans she has to dismiss the chairman and chief executives of (a) health authorities and (b) NHS trusts whose authorities fail regularly to meet the standards of the patients charter.

Dr. Mawhinney: None.

We expect the corporate governance task force to set out new definitions of the functions of chairmen and non-executive directors and it will be against these definitions that their performance will be judged. The performance of chief executives of national health service authorities and trusts is a matter for the chairman and non-executive directors working together.

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the salary of the chairman of the Royal Cornwall hospital trust.

Dr. Mawhinney: The remuneration of the chairman of the Royal Cornwall hospital trust is £19,285 per year.

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what were the grounds for not renewing the contract from 30 November of the chairman of the Royal Cornwall hospital trust; when he was informed that his contract would not be renewed; and on what basis he was appointed as chairman of the trust two years ago.

Dr. Mawhinney: The chairman of the Royal Cornwall hospital trust was appointed for a two year term of office which expired on 30 November 1993.

In considering whether to offer a further term, we sought advice from the national health service management executive outpost director and the regional health authority chairman. We decided, after very careful consideration of a variety of factors which govern these matters, that a change in the leadership of the trust was necessary.

I wrote to the chairman of the Royal Cornwall hospital trust on 5 November informing him of my decision.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list the current official listed business addresses of each (a) NHS hospital trust and (b) general practitioner fund holding practice within (i) the Trent regional health authority and (ii) Yorkshire regional health authority.

Dr. Mawhinney: A list of addresses of national health service trusts in Trent and Yorkshire regions will be placed in the Library. The information on general practitioner fundholding practices is not available centrally. The hon. Member may wish to contact Sir Michael Carlisle and Sir Bryan Askew, the chairmen of the Trent and Yorkshire regional health authorities for details.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will ask all existing chairmen and non-executive directors of health authorities and NHS trusts if they would be willing to continue in office without payment other than loss of earnings and expenses.

Dr. Mawhinney: No.

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what reasons were given for the chief executive of the Royal Cornwall hospital trust leaving in February 1992.

Dr. Mawhinney: This is a matter for the board chairman and non-executive directors of the Royal Cornwall hospital trust. The hon. Member may wish to contact Mr. John Williams, vice chairman of the trust and acting chairman, for details.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans she has to issue advice to NHS trusts to prevent trusts seeking contracts by offering faster treatment for patients covered by these contracts.

Dr. Mawhinney: Guidance has already been issued jointly by the Department and the Joint Consultants Committee which clearly states that provider units should not offer contracts to one purchaser which would disadvantage the patients of another purchaser.

West Midlands Regional Health Authority

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if Sir James Ackers (a) resigned, (b) was asked to resign or (c) was dismissed from the chairmanship of West Midlands regional health authority;

(2) what were her reasons for paying Sir James Ackers £10,000 under paragraph 9(3) of schedule 5 to the National Health Service Act 1977.

Dr. Mawhinney: Sir James Ackers resigned from the position of chairman of West Midlands regional health authority on 8 January 1993.

The decision to offer a compensation payment took account of the fact that Sir James Ackers resigned from the position of chairman of the West Midlands regional health authority 18 months before his term of office was due to expire; and that in his 10 years of service considerable progress was made, particularly in carrying out many major hospital developments; waiting lists had fallen dramatically and a record number of patients had been treated.

Ambulances

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) how many patients were recorded as dead on arrival by each ambulance trust in each of the last five years;

(2) how many patients were recorded as dead on arrival by ambulance by region in each of the last five years.

Mr. Sackville: This information is not available centrally.

Bomb-proofing

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what has been the cost, by location, of bomb-proofing the Department's premises.

Mr. Sackville: On security grounds, I do not propose to give this information.

Referrals

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make it her policy to hold centrally records in respect of (a) regional health authorities and (b) district health authorities on the number of extra-contractual referrals that they have refused; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Sackville: There are no plans to collect this information centrally.

Cancer

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what percentage of male and female adult cancer patients have been included in clinical treatment trials in the NHS in the last available year;

(2) if she will give the percentage of male and female child cancer patients who have been included in clinical treatment trials in the NHS in the last available year.

Mr. Sackville: This information is not available centrally.

Coronary Care

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many patients were turned away from coronary care units, in the last recorded year, through lack of space.

Mr. Sackville: This information is not available centrally. Any hospital that takes acute admissions will have coronary care facilities, and if a patient needing those facilities cannot be accommodated in a coronary care unit for any reason they will normally be accommodated in an acute medical ward where they will receive the same treatment and care as they would in a coronary care unit.

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many coronary care unit beds there were in each of the last five years.

Mr. Sackville: This information is not routinely collected centrally. Figures based on the latest information available indicated that in 1991 there were at least 879 coronary care beds and 356 high dependency beds in England.

GPs (Night Visits)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the current fee payable to a general practitioner when making a night visit between the hours of 10 pm and 8 am.

Dr. Mawhinney: The higher night visit fee, payable where a visit is made by the patient's own general practitioner, a GP from the patient's practice, or by a GP from a small rota of not more than 10 GPs, is £46·65; the lower night visit fee, payable for all other visits, is £15·55.

Smoking

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate she has made of the effect on the level of cigarette consumption of the price of cigarettes.

Mr. Sackville: Increases in price have been shown to decrease consumption, though by a proportionately smaller amount. A 10 per cent. increase in price, for example, would be expected to lead to a reduction in consumption in the range of 3 per cent. to 6 per cent.

General Practitioner Fundholders

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidance she has given to regions concerning their plans for the funding allocations for general practitioner fundholders.

Dr. Mawhinney: Guidance on setting general practitioner fundholder budgets is given in EL(93)93, copies of which are available in the Library.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what discussions she has had with North West Thames regional health authority over its proposed adjustment to the funding allocation for fundholding general practitioners; and if he will make a statement.

Dr. Mawhinney: All regional health authorities set general practitioner fund-holder budgets within the framework set out in EL(93)93, which requires them to take account of significant local factors. Copies of EL(93)93 are available in the Library.

Private Ambulance Operators

Mr. Ian Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans she has to issue a code of practice for private ambulance operators.

Mr. Sackville: A code of practice for private ambulance operators has been published today. Copies will be placed in the Library. The code sets out minimum standards in a range of important operational areas including staff selection and training, vehicles, equipment and telecommunications. It will provide valuable guidance for purchasers in judging the quality of potential providers against the high standards set by national health service ambulance services, as well as giving private providers clear indicators of the standard of service acceptable to the national health service.

National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990

Sir Michael Grylls: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will establish a task force of senior civil servants to consider the workings of the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Bowis: No.

Hospital Patients

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the average cost per day for each patient in (a) health authority-run hospitals and (b) national health service trust hospitals; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Sackville: The cost per day for each patient in directly managed units and national health service trust hospitals in 1991-92 was £149·87 and £168·89 respectively. The figures are based on patients using a bed and include day cases. Direct comparisons are not meaningful since a large proportion of first wave trust hospitals were acute units whose costs would be greater than directly managed units with long-stay facilities.

Pensioners

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the cost to public funds of each person of pensionable age cared for in (a) a NHS hospital, (b) a registered nursing home and (c) a registered residential care home; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Bowis: Information relating to the costs of hospital care is not available by age group. Information concerning financial support for residents who entered registered nursing and residential care homes prior to April 1993 is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security. No information is as yet available centrally on the situation since April 1993 under the new community care arrangements.

Asthma (Pollution)

Mr. Miller: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make a statement on the Government's assessment of the relationship between air pollution and asthma.

Mr. Sackville: The Department is advised on the effects on health of air pollutants by two independent expert committees, the Advisory Group on the Medical Aspects of Air Pollution Episodes—MAAPE—and the Committee on the Medical Effects of Air Pollutants—COMEAP. Asthma is an ill-understood disease. The role of the interactions of genetic and environmental factors, such as exposure to vehicle exhaust emissions and allergens, in triggering off asthma attacks remains unclear. Earlier this year, therefore, a sub-group of COMEAP was established, specifically to advise on the link between exposure to air pollutants and asthma. The first meeting of this sub-group took place in June. A report of its findings will be published and placed in the Library.

Hypothermia

Mr. Hanson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many deaths were recorded with a reference to hypothermia in each year since 1985.

Mr. Sackville: The information is shown in the table.

Number of deaths with hypothermia as the underlying cause of death and with any mention of hypothermia on the death certificate, England and Wales, 1985-1992

	Underlying cause	Mentions
1985	440	827
1986	437	837
1987	269	559
1988	194	440
1989	166	372
1990	152	368
1991	249	534

Note:

Neonatal deaths for 1986 to 1992 are included in the mentions but not in the underlying cause of death (neonatal deaths were not given an underlying cause of death from 1 January 1986 onwards).

Unemployment

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what studies she has undertaken to establish the impact of unemployment on health.

Mr. Sackville: Details of recent research are included in the Office of Health Economics briefing number 29 published in July 1993, copies of which are available in the Library.

Suicides

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the total number of adult suicides in 1992; and how many of these were unemployed.

Mr. Sackville: Information on the number of people who have committed suicide and who were unemployed is not available centrally. At death registration informants are asked for last occupation rather than employment status of the deceased.

The table shows adult suicide deaths—ICD[1] E950-E959—by sex for England and Wales for 1992.

Data for 1992 are provisional.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Agricultural Products

Mr. Denham: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what proportion of places on the Codex Alimentarius Commission are currently occupied by representatives of commercial companies operating businesses related to the supply, processing and sale of agricultural products and derivatives; and what measures are proposed to limit the influence of companies operating businesses related to the supply, processing and sales of agricultural products and derivatives on the Codex Alimentarius Commission.

Mr. Soames: The Codex Alimentarius is an inter-governmental body and thus the decisions reached are those reached by Governments. Generally speaking, official representation at meetings is thus by Government officials. There are, however, no rules on the composition of delegations from countries. Normally trade and consumer representatives are present at Codex meetings either as advisers in national delegations, at the invitation of the Government concerned, or as observers representing international trade or consumer organisations that have been recognised by Codex.

I see no need to limit the influence of trade, or consumer representation on matters considered at Codex meetings.

Mr. Denham: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what measures are proposed to ensure an increased representation by independent consumer, environment and public health representatives at full meetings of the Codex Alimentarius Commission; and if she will list those matters which are currently directly determined by (a) the Government of the United Kingdom and (b) the official institutions of the European Union which will no longer be determined by these institutions under the terms of the sanitary and hypto-sanitary measures in the current draft of the GATT agreement.

Mr. Soames: Representation at Codex meetings by independent consumer, environment and public health representatives is already possible, at their own expense, and I know of no measures intended to increase this.

The GATT agreement will bring with it a subsidiary agreement—the sanitary and phytosanitary agreement—whereby the standards agreed by Codex will be regarded as the international norm in cases of trade disputes that come forward for adjudication under GATT dispute settlement procedures. Nevertheless, individual countries, and the European Union, would still be free to set their own standards. In the event of a trade dispute, countries imposing more rigorous standards would have to demonstrate that they were justified scientifically.

Association of Drainage Authorities

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether her Department's officials who attended the annual conference of the Association of Drainage Authorities on 10 November will pass on the information they gained to the Department of the Environment; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Jack: There is no need to do so as the matters raised at the annual conference come within the responsibilities of my right hon. Friends the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and the Secretary of State for Wales.

Sewage Sludge

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if she will list the current designated disposal sites for sewage sludge dumping off the Yorkshire coast; how often these sites are reviewed; and if a map showing these sites can be (a) placed in the Library and (b) sent to the hon. Member.

Mr. Jack: The designated site off the Yorkshire coast for the dumping of sewage sludge is some 12 miles east of Spurn Head in an area bounded by the co-ordinates:

53° 35·00′ N 0° 30·00′ E
53° 35·00′ N 0° 35·00′ E
53° 30·00′ N 0° 35·35′ E
53° 30·00′ N 0° 30·00′ E

The site is located in deep water and its suitability for sewage sludge disposal is kept under continuous review in the light of the results of the regular monitoring programme. The monitoring results are published in the Ministry's aquatic environment monitoring report series. In March 1990 the Government announced that the disposal of sewage sludge at sea would cease at the end of 1998.

I have arranged for a chart showing the location of the disposal site to be placed in the Library and for a copy of this chart and the fourth report of the Marine Pollution Monitoring Management Group's Co-ordinating Group on Monitoring of Sewage Sludge Disposal Sites to be sent to the hon. Member.

Bomb Proofing

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what has been the cost, by location, of bomb-proofing the Department's premises.

Mr. Jack: On security grounds, I do not propose to give this information.

Overseas Visits

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many visits abroad she has made during 1993; and what was (a) the cost to public funds and (b) the purpose of each visit.

Mr. Jack: During 1993, the Minister and her predecessor made a total of 19 visits abroad. Their total travel and hotel costs amount to £24,758. Eleven visits were to EC Councils of Ministers; the remaining eight were in support of bilateral relations and trade promotion.

Cattle Imports

Sir Ivan Lawrence: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what action she is taking to ensure the maintenance of the highest health controls on the importation of cattle from abroad; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Soames: The Ministry is taking a number of measures designed to help prevent the introduction and spread of disease by imported cattle:

- we have instigated 24-hour periods of blanket surveillance at all south and east coast ports which cover exports as well as imports;
- we are targeting consignments where there is a particular animal health disease risk with up to 100 per cent. checks;
- we gave stepped up checks at points of destination to between 50 and 60 per cent. on average.

Where concerns have been greatest the following measures have been taken:

- following imports earlier this year of warbled cattle from France we have introduced a 100 per cent. check on all imported cattle from France. Diseased animals will be re-exported at the owner's expense;
- following imports last year of foot and mouth disease sero-positive cattle from eastern Europe, the European Community has not instituted a pre-export testing requirement on all cattle originating from eastern Europe; as an additional safeguard we are conducting 100 per cent. testing of all cattle imported from these countries;

it is possible but not yet proven that the recent outbreak of brucellosis in Wales was associated with an imported animal. Our investigations are continuing. In the meantime, we are stepping up our checking at destination on cattle from France and the Netherlands.

We are taking other steps which should cut down the risk of importing diseases in the future.

we raise with the member states concerned and the Commission disease problems on each occasion they arise. We also monitor very closely the Commission's role in enforcing proper implementation of Community animal health rules in other member states;

we are urging the Community to harmonise standards of veterinary certification based on the principles drawn up by the Federation of Veterinarians in Europe and in particular that vets should certify only where they have personal knowledge of the relevant facts.

Dumping at Sea

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what further steps she envisages to tackle nuclear waste dumping at sea arising out of the London convention meeting in November of the International Maritime Organisation; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Jack: The consultative meeting of the London convention held on 8-12 November agreed to introduce a ban on the disposal of radioactive waste at sea. The United Kingdom abstained from the vote. We are currently considering the implications of the convention's decision on this matter, but we have no immediate plans to carry out sea dumping of radioactive waste.

Animal Feedingstuffs

Mr. Clappison: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what arrangements she has for obtaining independent expert advice on the safety of animal feedingstuffs.

Mr. Soames: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health and I have been giving further thought to the present arrangements following the recommendation last year from the expert group on animal feedingstuffs for a standing advisory committee to have an overview of feedingstuffs safety issues.

Existing committees—the spongiform encephalopathy advisory committee, the advisory committee on the microbiological safety of food, and the veterinary products committee—are clearly well equipped to advise on major aspects of the subject. Beyond this, however, there is a need, identified by the expert group, to consider new developments concerning feed materials, manufacturing processes and feeding practices insofar as these might pose risks for human and animal health.

We have concluded that the best way of ensuring that new developments in these fields are properly assessed will be for the responsible Departments to hold regular reviews to identify any matters that may require an independent appraisal and then to obtain whatever specialist advice is needed to evaluate the specific isue. Flexible arrangements on these lines will bring the most relevant expertise to bear in the least burdensome way.

Hill Livestock Compensatory Allowances

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations she has received on the subject of the hill livestock compensatory allowance scheme; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Jack: My right hon. Friend met representatives of the National Farmers Union, the National Farmers Union of Scotland and the Ulster Farmers Union on 26 October to discuss economic conditions in the hills and uplands. Ministry officials have also had meetings with these bodies, the Farmers Union of Wales and the Country Landowners Association. In addition, my right hon. Friend and I have had correspondence with a number of hon. Members representing hill farming constituencies.

Scrapie

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what published scientific information is available concerning natural scrapie in Suffolk sheep.

Mr. Soames: I shall write to the hon. Member with a list of the information.

Offals

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food why specified offals excluded from the food chain in 1989 did not include bone marrow, liver and kidney.

Mr. Soames: I refer the hon. Member to the reply which I gave him on 1 November at column 34.

Forestry Commission Land

Mr. Tipping: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if she will list, for each separate piece of land currently owned or leased by the Forestry Commission in Derbyshire, Leicestershire, Lincolnshire and Northamptonshire (a) its name and (b) its area in hectares; and whether she will place a map in the Library which names and identifies each of these pieces of land.

Mr. Jack: The Forestry Commission manages the following areas of land in Derbyshire, Leicestershire, Lincolnshire and Northamptonshire:

County	Area (hectares)
Derbyshire	3,339
Leicestershire	669
Lincolnshire	5,627
Northamptonshire	4,090

I have made arrangements for a map showing the location of the individual areas to be placed in the Library as soon as possible.

The more detailed information requested on the individual areas is not held centrally and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Sheep Dips

Mr. Fry: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fishiers and Food what is the most recent advise she has received from the Veterinary Products Committee on the continued use of organophosphorous sheep dips.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The VPC has carefully and thoroughly examined all issues surrounding the use of OP dips. It has found that there is no evidence to support either a ban or suspension on the use of OP dips when used correctly. Nevertheless the Government and the VPC have to treat with the utmost seriousness any suggestion of potential harm to human health. We are therefore taking clear and positive steps, in a carefully planned and organised way, to restrict their availability. A useful analogy to our approach is that used with regard to pesticides.

The Veterinary Products Committee gave further considertion to the future licensing of organophosphorous sheep dip products at its meeting on 21 October 1993 and confirmed its report at its meeting on 25 November.

Organophosphorous sheep dips are highly effective weapons in our fight to ensure that the United Kingdom's 40 million sheep are properly protected from harmful disease, and I welcome the Veterinary Products Committee's clear advice following their meetings that the marketing of these dips can continue. Over the last eight years, there have been 529 cases of reported human ill health associated with sheep dip exposure. The Committee found that in the majority of cases where information was available the full recommended protective clothing had not been worn or properly used.

The number of reported adverse reactions must be seen in the context of over a million occasions when flocks—involving hundreds of millions of sheep—were dipped during that eight-year period. I am disappointed that, notwithstanding the publicity drive we have carried out since the Committee's report in April, many sheep dippers are still failing to take the necessary precaustions. The Committee has therefore recommended the introduction of a new certificate of competence, which would mean in future that only dippers who hold such certificates would be allowed to buy these dips.

The Government fully support this proposal. We have already begun discussions with the National Proficiency Test Council and the Agricultural Training Board about arrangements to bring in a statutory certification scheme before the next dipping season. We will be consulting interested parties shortly about plans to require dippers wishing to buy OP sheep dips to have enrolled for the NPTC certificate by 1 April 1994, and to have obtained certificates by 1 April 1995. Meanwhile, the training that would be required to obtain a certificate will be available on a voluntary basis at NPTC—approved courses from early January 1994 onwards.

I have also agreed with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health that a panel of medical and scientific experts should be set up, as a sub-committee of the Veterinary Products Committee, to address the question of co-ordinating research into reports of long term health effects aising from exposure. Terms of reference and composition of the panel are currently being drawn up, and a further announcement giving full details will be made shortly.

The Government will also be undertaking a review to ensure that sheep dips are disposed of safely.

I am very grateful to Professor Armour for the care and depth with which he and his Committee has considered the issues and all the information put to it, and for its clear advice.

The report setting out the Veterinary Products Committee's recommendations to the Licensing Authority (Agriculture and Health Ministers), and the measures through which the Government intend to implement them, is today beikng placed in the Library of the House.

Intervention Board

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the total number of employees, by grade, in the Intervention Board executive agency; how many at each grade are women; what steps the Intervention Board Executive Agency has taken to implement the programme for action to achieve equality of opportunity for women in the civil service, announced by the Minister for the Civil Service in 1992; and if she will place in the Library a copy of the action plan drawn up by the Intervention Board for implementing the programme in that agency.

Mrs. Shephard: Responsibility for this matter is delegated to the Intervention Board executive agency and I have asked the chief executive to reply to the hon. Gentleman direct.

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the total number of employees, by grade, in the Intervention Board executive agency; how many at each grade are of ethnic minority origin; what steps the Intervention Board executive agency has taken to implement the programme for action to achieve equality of opportunity for people of ethnic minority origin, announced by the Minister for the Civil Service on 22 May 1990; and if she will place in the Library a copy of the action plan drawn up by the intervention board for implementing the programme in that agency.

Mrs. Shephard: Responsibility for this matter is delegated to the Intervention Board executive agency and I have asked the chief executive to reply to the hon. Gentleman direct.

Letter from G. Stapleton to Mr. Frank Field, dated 1 December 1993:

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food has asked me to reply to the Parliamentary Questions on the Equal Opportunities Programmes for Action which appeared under your name on the Notice of Questions given on 23 November. The information you requested is set out below and in the enclosed annexes, together with explanations of the general background.

Women in the Civil Service

Enclosed at Annex I is a list of the total number of employees in the Agency, by grade, showing separately the number of women in each grade. Following the introduction of the Programme for Action in 1992 the Agency drew up its Action Plan, a copy of which is at Annex II. We are fully committed to equal opportunities with the aim of implementing those recommendations within the Programme for Action which are Applicable to the agency.

The Intervention Board has a policy on flexible working patterns which includes staff who work part-time but only during school term time, as well as the more usual part-time arrangements which apply throughout the year. Currently about 15% of the staff of the Agency are part-time employees. There are also some examples of job sharing within the Agency and the arrangements are being examined to identify other posts to which this flexibility could apply. Career breaks are granted to staff in appropriate circumstances to meet their domestic commitments and proposals have been put to our Trade Union Side to formalise this scheme. The Agency has agreed to take the lead on Child Care on the co-ordinating body for Civil Service departments and agencies within the Reading area and is liaising with the Thames Valley Training and Enterprise Council in order to provide a child care information service. For the 1993 summer holiday, places were offered for the children of staff on a local play scheme. Opportunities for the provision of future schemes is being examined.

Recruitment and promotion boards wherever possible include at least one woman member and the Agency's Equal Opportunities Policy is publicised to job applicants and staff. Sexual Harassment Contact Officers have received specialist training and are available to counsel staff. The Agency's training strategy takes account of the needs of women and includes courses directed specifically towards women. In-house training courses have also been re-organised on a flexible basis to suit the needs of part-time members of staff.

It is encouraging to see that the proportion of women in the management grades has steadily increased in recent years; at Executive Officer level women now represent just under 50% of the grade total; at Higher Executive Officer level women account for just under 40%; and at Senior Executive Officer level just over 20%. If this trend continues, as we are confident it will with the assistance of our Equal Opportunities Policy, it augurs well for the achievement of the Agency's aims. However, more needs to be done and the Agency team dealing with Equal Opportunities Policy is being strengthened.

Ethnic Minority Issues in the Civil Service

Attached at Annex III is a list containing the total number of employees by grade with an estimation of those of ethnic minority origin. The details given in Annex III were obtained from an exercise undertaken solely for the purpose of this reply. However, dicussions have been under way over the last 2-3 months with the local Trades Union Side on the details of an ethnic monitoring survey of all staff in the Agency. This survey will be underpinned by a Code of Practice governing access to the data and its confidentiality.

Since the Programme for Action for People of Ethnic Minority Origin was announced in 1990 steps have been taken to ensure that all staff are aware of the Agency's commitment to equality of opportunity. Managers in particular are made aware of the requirement to operate equal opportunities in such matters as staff reporting and promotion, and of their responsibilities to develop all staff. All training avoids the use of racial stereotypes. Once the Code of Practice has been agreed and the questionnaires issued and returned we will be able to monitor more closely the effectiveness of the Agency's commitment to the Programme of Action including the publication of its Action Plan on race which is currently under preparation.

Since the publication of the Programme for Action the Agency has not had any grievance raised concerning discrimination or harassment on the grounds of race and has aimed to ensure that all personnel policies seek to prevent discrimination on these grounds. The publication of the Agency's Departmental Action Plan will help to reinforce these policies and we are confident that they will improve the Ethnic Minority representation more widely throughout the Agency's management grades. The strengthening of the Agency's Equal Opportunities team will enable the Agency to press ahead with the implementation of the Departmental Action Plan.

ANNEX II

Intervention Board—Executive Agency: 1993 Departmental Action Plan for Women

Introduction

1. The Intervention Board is a medium size Agency, firmly committed to a strong, sound policy of equal opportunity for women, covering current staff, potential recruits and future employees.

2. The Agency's basic aim is to operate the Common Agricultural Policy Guarantee Section within the United Kingdom, as efficiently and effectively as possible in accordance with policies laid down by Agriculture Ministers.

3. The Agency has no responsibility for public appointments and the activities, other than direct appointment of staff, do not offer the opportunity of influencing women's issues. The activities set out in this plan therefore relate solely to the employment of women by the Agency and their career development.

Issues for Women

4. The Agency's approach is based on central guide-lines issued by the Cabinet Office's (OPSS) 'A Programme for Action to Achieve Equality of Opportunity for Women in the Civil Service', (first introduced in 1984 and revised in 1992).

5. The Agency has reviewed its progress in meeting aims of the 1984 programme and has now set out challenging but achievable targets for future years in line with the methodology suggested by the Opportunity 2000 Campaign which is supported by the OPSS and the revised directions issued in March 1992. The Agency, as with other smaller Government bodies, belongs to the Opportunity 2000 Campaign by virtue of the Cabinet Office "umbrella" subscription.

6. There is already a well established framework of existing procedures in the Agency, which is being strengthened to demonstrate the Agency's commitment to equal opportunities for women on merit.

7. Monitoring and, where appropriate, procedures will be strengthened which will:

(a) seek to attract a greater number of women job applicants;
(b) ensure that recruiting procedures do not discriminate against women;
(c) encourage women to enhance their career prospects through appropriate training;
(d) ensure that all women employees are given opportunities to develop their job and career prospects;
(e) monitor the annual staff reporting and performance pay awards to ensure that equal opportunity practices are followed for women;
(f) ensure that there is no discrimination against women at the Agency's promotion boards;
(g) run pro-active policies to retain women staff and to encourage their return after career breaks.

8. The Agency has established within the framework of these main commitments, individual targets to achieve further progress for the Agency's women staff. Some of the targets are short term to be achieved within 6 to 12 months, others intermediate within 2 to 5 years, and the balance within 5 to 8 years.

9. The Agency is headed by a Chief Executive at Grade 3. There is currently a balance of women in posts up to and including Executive Officer level which represents the national average of women in the economically active proportion of the population. Although there is no woman officer above Grade 7 level, we have already enhanced the numbers in our middle management grades and intend to improve the balance by grade profile in future years subject to individuals' merit.

10. The computer Personnel Project, currently being developed, will, when in place, enhance monitoring and the availability of statistics on a gender basis.

11. The Agency has for several years, pioneered and operated schemes for part time working including permanent term time only posts, with varied and flexible working patterns, including job sharing. These have enabled women staff to return to work despite family commitments as well as new staff to be attracted to its employ.

12. Some women in the Agency have already taken advantage of the 'Women Only' training courses run by the Civil Service College, and the Industrial Society.

13. A policy statement and complaints procedure for Sexual Harassment, was published in February 1990 and is currently being updated. A female Sexual Harassment Officer for women is already in place and a male counterpart will be appointed shortly.

14. Wherever possible internal promotion and external recruitment boards have suitably qualified women represented.

Priorities for action

15. Although the Agency has a very good record as an employer of women, it considers that there is still more to achieve, in particular, in their representation at middle and senior management grades. Its intentions to meet this and other commitments are set out in the following priorities to be met by 31 March 1993:

(a) to endorse the equal opportunities statement in all recruitment advertisements;
(b) to set up more effect gender monitoring on recruitment;
(c) to improve gender monitoring statistics on training (and career progression);

16. The following have been identified as priorities to be met by 30 June 1993:

(a) to agree a training strategy for women to enhance their career prospects;
(b) to decide on a possible biennial conference for women in the Agency;
(c) to agree procedures for monitoring Staff Reporting overall assessments by gender;
(d) to implement a Career Break Scheme;
(e) to take a decision on whether child care facilities can be provided.

17. The Agency has continuing commitments:

(a) to review separate internal training schemes for part-time and term-time staff where appropriate and to enhance the availability generally of all training in the Agency for these staff;
(b) to promote, where appropriate, "positive action" training for women only on both internal and external courses;
(c) to establish career progression statistics by gender;
(d) to keep under consideration with its line managers all posts that may prove suitable for varied work patterns;
(e) to ensure that its "in house" magazines encourage articles and features from women.

Review and publication of results

18. Progress toward the set targets on equal opportunities will be continuously monitored, and existing procedures will be reviewed and updated. The staff will be notified by means of Office Notices.

21 December 1992.

Bananas

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (1) what consultation she has had with the chairman of the Intervention Board for Agricultural Produce in relation to the issuing of banana import licences in the present year; and if she will make a statement;

(2) what consultation she has had with representatives of the banana importing trade in relation to potential conflict of interest between the functions of the Intervention Board for Agricultural Produce in issuing licences for import of bananas and the position of the chairman of the board being also chairman and chief executive of Fyffes.

Mr. Jack [holding answer 26 November 1993]: When the EC banana regime was established, arrangements were put in place to avoid the possibility of any conflict of interest arising from the chairman of the Intervention Board also being chairman and chief executive of Fyffes. The chairman is not, in any case, involved in the day-to-day running of the agency. The board's officials have issued licences to import bananas into the European Community in the present year entirely in accordance with the provisions of Council Regulation 404/93 and Commission Regulations 1442/93 and 1443/93 with this in mind, my right hon. Friend has had no need for consultations with the chairman of the board, nor with representatives of the banana importing trade on this matter.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Disability Allowances

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was his original estimate of the number of people who would be in employment as a result of the disability working allowance once the scheme was fully operational; what is the current figure; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: The original estimate that about 50,000 people might be entitled to DWA was based on surveys of disabled people carried out by the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys. The current case load is 3,176. New benefits can, of course, be expected to take a period of years to become established and so the original estimate has not been revised.

Ms Hoey: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what special rules for the terminally ill still apply for claimants of disability living allowance.

Mr. Scott: Special arrangements ensure that people with a limited life expectancy of six months or less are awarded the highest rate of the care component of disability living allowance, or the higher rate of attendance allowance, whether or not they have care needs, and without having to serve a qualifying period. Such claims are handled under special administrative procedures to ensure a speedy response.

It is also possible for a third party to make a claim on behalf of the terminally ill person, with or without that person's knowledge.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many persons over the age of 65 years claim both mobility component disability living allowance and care component disability living allowance or mobility component disability living allowance and attendance allowance.

Mr. Scott: The information requested is not available because the age of the claimant is not recorded unless the claim is successful.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) how many persons over the age of 65 years are in receipt of attendance allowance or disability living allowance care component;

(2) how many persons over the age of 80 years are in receipt of attendance allowance or disability living allowance care component;

(3) how many persons over 65 years receive mobility component disability living allowance.

Mr. Scott: We estimate that on 31 March 1993 there were 929,000 people over the age of 65 getting the care component of disability living allowance or attendance allowance; of these, 507,000 were over 80 years of age. We also estimate that 228,000 people over the age of 65 were getting the mobility component of disability living allowance.

Note: For attendance allowance the source to determine age is a 1 per cent. sample used to adjust and apportion the AA pay load by age. For disability living allowance the source is a 5 per cent. sample.

State Earnings-related Pensions Scheme

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will make a statement on the future of SERPS.

Mr. Hague: The Government are committed to ensuring that all individuals have the opportunity to make provision for their retirement in addition to the basic state pension. SERPs is one of several options available to people. Some 10 million people are contracted out of SERPs through occupational pension schemes; and an additional 5 million people have chosen to contract out of SERPs through personal pensions. The Government want to encourage personal responsibility in the provision of pensions, and we are considering ways of ensuring that personal pensions remains attractive across the age range.

Mr. Bates: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many individuals who contracted out of SERPs during the last year for which figures are available had earnings whch when expressed as a fraction of national average earnings were (a) less than 50 per cent., (b) 50 to 99 per cent., (c) 100 to 149 per cent. and (d) 150 per cent. or more.

Mr. Hague: The information is not available in the form requested. Information on the earnings of members of contracted out occupational schemes expressed as a percentage of national average earnings, as at the end of 1991-92, is shown in the table. Such information as is available on the earnings of individuals contracted out of SERPs by virtue of appropriate personal pensions is contained in "Social Security Statistics 1993", a copy of which is in the Library.

Earnings band	Number of employees in contracted-out employment (000s)
Less than 50 per cent. of national average earnings	360
Between 50 and 99 per cent. of national average earnings	2,620
Between 100 and 149 per cent. of national average earnings	3,270
Over 150 per cent. of national average earnings	3,110

Notes:

1. Data derived from Inland Revenue statistics. It relates to the whole of the United Kingdom.
2. The figures are based on an analysis of a 1 per cent. sample of all end-of-year PAYE returns submitted to the Inland Revenue by employers. Each relates to a single employment.
3. The definition of national average earnings for this purpose is calculated from the sample using the amount of pay and an estimate of the length of employment covered by each return, and includes both part-time and full-time employment.

Cold Weather Payments

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security where is the weather station whose recordings trigger payments to the residents of Balmoral and Braemar; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: A list of all weather stations and the post-coded areas which they cover is contained in the social fund cold weather payments general regulations, copies of which are in the Library.

Child Support Agency

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if the Child Support Agency will instigate a system of credits so that cross-subsidies from parents are taken fully into account; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Burt: The formula which the Child Support Agency uses to assess maintenance contains a protected income provision which takes account of the fact that a parent is supporting stepchildren, and of whether or not maintenance is paid for those children.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what current review the Child Support Agency is undertaking in respect of maintenance payments in clean-break divorces where arrangements have been made by courts; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Burt: Any review of child support policy is a matter for Ministers, not the Child Support Agency. As with any new policy, the improved arrangements for child maintenance are being carefully monitored. If, in the light of experience, the system can be made even better, changes will be considered.

Unemployment Benefit

Ms Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has for changing the 21-hour rule; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Burt: The 21-hour rule enables unemployed claimants in receipt of income support to follow part-time education and training courses while continuing their search for work. We have no plans to change this rule.

Absent Fathers

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many women have been asked to date to name an absent father at benefit offices in the Doncaster area; how many have demurred; how many have had their benefit deducted as a penalty; and if he will show in his answer from what benefit the deduction was made.

Mr. Burt: The administration of the Child Support Agency is a matter for Ros Hepplewhite, the chief executive. She will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from R. Hepplewhite to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 30 November 1993:

I have been asked to reply to your Question to the Secretary of State asking how many women have been asked to name an absent father at benefit offices in the Doncaster area; how many have demurred; how many have had their benefit deducted as a penalty; and the benefit from which deductions were made.

Between 5 April and 31 October 1993, 137 parents with care of children were interviewed in connection with their applications for child maintenance in the Doncaster area; 4 declined without good cause to co-operate with the Agency in arranging maintenance. As yet no Reduced Benefit Directions have been implemented in the area.

Fuel Bills

Mr. Colvin: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what help he is proposing to give householders in need in order to meet their fuel bills; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Burt: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State gave to my hon. Friend the Member for Gainsborough and Horncastle (Mr. Leigh) on 30 November 1993.

Rent Allowances

Mr. Spellar: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will give the latest figures for the cost of rent allowances in respect of private tenancies.

Mr. Burt: The estimated expenditure on rent allowances for 1993-94 is £3,254 million.

Notes: The source of this information is the 1993 departmental report, published in February 1993. A copy of the report is in the Library.

Funeral Grants

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to review the inequalities between men and women in the provision of funeral grants.

Mr. Scott: There is no such inequality.

Income Support

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his current estimate of eligible persons in (a) Inverclyde, (b) Strathclyde and (c) Scotland who do not claim income support; what means are being used to improve the take-up rate; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Burt: Take-up figures for income support are not available on a regional or local basis. Estimates for the take-up of income-related benefits for Great Britain were published in January 1993 in "Income Related Benefit Estimates of Take-up for 1989" and showed that 87 per cent. of available income support was being received by 75 per cent. of those eligible to claim it.

Social security legislation puts the onus of claiming benefit on individuals who may decide, for various reasons, not to take up benefit entitlement. The Department's role is to ensure that people are in a position to make informed choices.

In this respect, the Benefits Agency are responsible for a wide range of initiatives to increase awareness of entitlement: Exhibitions talks, liaison with citizens advice bureaux, operation of multilingual freelines, participation in local radio phone-ins and now the one-stop initiative.

Payment Recovery

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what studies are available to indicate the effect DSS recovery procedures may have on legal settlements of compensation and associated civil actions; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: I am not aware of any such studies.

Housing Benefit

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the current estimate of eligible households in (a) Inverclyde, (b) Strathclyde and (c) Scotland which do not take up housing benefit; what means are used in order to improve the take-up rate; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Burt: Take up figures for housing benefit are not available on a regional basis. Estimates of the take up of income related benefits for Great Britain were published in "Income Related Benefit Estimates of Take-up in 1989" in January this year, a copy of which is in the Library. These figures show that 91 per cent. of available housing benefit was being received by 83 per cent. of those eligible to claim.

Information on housing benefit is available at all benefit agency and unemployment benefit offices, though as responsibility for the administration of housing benefit lies with individual local authorities they are in the best position to undertake local publicity and initiatives to improve local take-up.

WALES

Overseas Visits

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many visits abroad he has made during 1993; and what was (a) the cost to public funds and (b) the purpose of each visit.

Mr. Redwood: The previous Secretary of State undertook a visit to Brussels on 1-2 April 1993 for the purpose of inward investment and to attend EC meetings. The total cost of the visit was £983·20. My right hon. Friend also visited Stuttgart on 8-9 May 1993. The purpose of the visit was to perform the opening ceremony of the Wales at Stuttgart Arts Festival and participate. The total cost to the Department was £908·80.

In September 1993 I undertook an inward investment mission to Hong Kong, Japan and North America. The final cost is expected to be below £30,000 and comes from the WDA budget.

Felinheli Bypass

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement giving details of the causes of the delay in opening the Felinheli bypass in Gwynedd; what is the additional cost to the Welsh Office arising out of this delay; how much of those costs will be recouped; and what is the new scheduled date for opening the road.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The contract completion date for the Felinheli bypass is July 1994. The contractor is, however, intending to open the bypass before the end of the contract period but accidental damage to the new bridge over the bypass during the movement of heavy earth moving plant has frustrated his attempt to open it before the end of the year. He still expects to open the bypass early next spring, several months ahead of its contract completion date.

All the repair costs will be borne by the contractor.

Training and Enterprise Councils

Ms Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what accumulated reserves were held in total and by each TEC in Wales on 1 April 1992 and on 1 April 1993; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The reserves held by each TEC are set out in their annual reports and accounts as at 29 March 1992 and 28 March 1993 and copies of these are held in the Library of the House.

Ms Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many learning for work places and what budget have been allocated to each TEC in Wales; how many people are currently on learning for work in each area; what monitoring information is collected about learning for work participants and the subsequent destinations they will be entering; how he plans to evaluate the programme; and if he will make a statement about its extension beyond 1994.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The number of learning for work places contracted with TECs in Wales and the number of participants on the programme as at 29 October are set out in the table. Information about the allocation of budgets by the Welsh Office to individual TECs is commercial in confidence. However, the total budget available for learning for work in Wales is £3·887 million.

Information is being collected about starts, participants and qualifications, and take up by gender and disability.

Destinations of leavers will be obtained through follow-up questionnaires. The programme will be evaluated in the costs and benefits compared to other programmes.

The learning for work programme is scheduled to run until August 1994 and its future beyond that date is currently being considered.

Moated Sites

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) if he will list for the last 10 years the archaeological moated grange sites that have been demolished;

(2) if he will list the archaeological moated grange sites that are due to be lost because of planning permission approval being granted.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Responsibility for the subject of the questions has been delegated to Cadw: Welsh Historic Monuments Executive Agency under its chief executive, John Carr. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from E. A. J. Carr to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 1 December 1993:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your two recent Parliamentary Questions about the loss of moated grange sites in Wales.

In my letter of 30 November in answer to your earlier questions about the identification and protection of moated sites generally in Wales I referred to recent Planning Policy Guidance issued by the Department on Archaeology and Planning. The Guidance gives advice on the handling of archaeological matters in the planning process. In particular it emphasises that the desirability of preserving an ancient monument and its setting is a material consideration in determining planning applications whether that monument is scheduled or unscheduled. Advice to local authorities in Wales who for the most part do not have in-house archaeological staff is available from the Welsh Archaeological Trusts who, as you know, maintain the Sites and Monuments Record. Against this policy background it is for local authorities themselves to determine planning applications for development of sites of archaeological interest. Cadw does not keep details of planning permission granted by Welsh local authorities which affect such sites.

Where development is planned on a site scheduled as an ancient monument consent needs to be submitted to the Secretary of State. This is in addition to any application for planning permission. As I mentioned in my earlier letter Cadw's records of consent do not identify the monument by type but we are not aware of consent being granted for the demolition of any scheduled moated site in Wales in the past 10 years.

Urban Energy Management

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what role councils in Wales play in the United Kingdom urban energy management network.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Cardiff city council represents Wales on the seven-city strong urban energy management network.

Energy Efficiency

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what involvement training and enterprise councils in Wales have had in assessing the skill base in Wales for implementation of an energy efficiency programme in (a) industry, (b) commercial and (c) domestic sectors in Wales.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The TECs were commissioned by the WDA under the auspices of the Welsh energy project to add specific questions on training needs relating to energy and environmental issues, in the industrial and commercial sectors, as part of the 1992 Welsh labour market information survey.

Investors in People Award

Ms Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many employers in each TEC area in Wales have been given the investors in people award; how many have made a commitment to meeting the standard; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Wyn Roberts: As at 31 October 1993, 33 employers in Wales have been awarded investor-in-people status, and 213 have made a commitment to meeting the investors standard. The table sets out the breakdown by TEC.

Investors in people
Wales at 31 October 1993

TEC	Awarded investor status	Commitment made
South Glamorgan	6	37
Mid Glamorgan	6	35
Gwent	7	26
West Wales	6	56
Powys	1	8
North West Wales	5	24
North East Wales	2	27

Energy Technology Development Projects

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what collaborative energy technology development projects co-sponsored by the European Commission are currently under way in Wales.

Mr. Redwood: European programmes in the more efficient use of energy are actively promoted in Wales. An annual seminar is held specifically for this purpose.

There are currently nine projects funded by European programmes in Wales, a list of which will be placed in the Library of the House.

Valleys Programme

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what steps he intends to take to rectify the structural problems identified in the Hausner Associates report on the programme for the valleys prepared for his Department, in regard to the decline in manufacturing employment and creation of long-term jobs in the valleys.

Mr. Redwood: Victor Hausner's evaluation of the first programme for the valleys—1988 to 1993—has informed the development of the latest five-year programme.

Two of the programme's aims specifically tackle unemployment by focusing on creating more, better quality jobs, and improving training, education, and transport so that local people can benefit.

DEFENCE

Imported Artillery Systems

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence for what purpose the 14 larger calibre artillery systems shown in the United Nations arms register were imported from France; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Aitken: The United Nations conventional arms register refers to 14 large-calibre artillery systems. These are 14 self-propelled launcher loaders (SPLLs) for the multiple launch rocket system (MLRS). MLRS is an international collaborative project and under the workshare arrangements for the project some SPLLs are finally assembled by Aerospatiale in France before delivery to the partner nations. The 14 SPLLs in question were delivered in 1992 from Aerospatiale to the British Army of the Rhine as part of the United Kingdom's total requirement for MLRS launchers.

Animal Research

Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what species of animals are currently used by his Department or on its behalf for the purposes of research and experimentation.

Mr. Aitken: The species of animals currently used by the Department for purposes of research and experimentation are rats; mice; guinea pigs; rabbits; sheep; goats; pigs; miniature pigs; marmosets; and rhesus monkeys.

All experiments involving the use of animals fully meet the spirit and letter of the Animal (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986.

AS90 Ammunition

Sir Nicholas Bonsor: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the nature of the fault in the round due to be fired from the AS90 at the demonstration on 16 November; what was the country of manufacture of the round; why 155 mm artillery shells of foreign manufacture are in service with the Royal Artillery; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Aitken: The failure to fire by an AS90 howitzer in the opening moments of the otherwise very impressive demonstration of this new equipment on 16 November was caused by a defective primer which failed to ignite the propelling charge. This is a rare event and initial indications are that it may have been due to incomplete filling of the primer, which was manufactured in Germany. Other elements of the round in question were manufactured in the United Kingdom. 155 mm ammunition currently in use was procured initially for the FH70 gun under the terms of the tri-national MOU with Germany and Italy which governed this project.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what changes have been made since the opening of the Scott inquiry in the criteria adopted by his Department in deciding whether to give substantive replies to parliamentary questions seeking details of arms or military equipment exports from the United Kingdom.

Mr. Aitken: None. The present criteria are of long standing and have been maintained by successive Governments.

Overseas Visits

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many visits abroad he has made during 1993; and what was (a) the cost to public funds and (b) the purpose of each visit.

Mr. Hanley: The Secretary of State for Defence has made 14 overseas visits in 1993. The cost and purpose of each visit was as follows:

Date 1993	Destination	Purpose	Approximate cost £
January
5th to 9th	Far East (Hong Kong)	To visit British Forces and have official talks.	141,048
25th to 26th	Belgium (Mons)	Visit NATO Military Headquarters.	1,685

15th to 16th	Norway	To visit British Forces and have official talks.	4,462
25th to 26th	Gibraltar	To visit British Forces and to have official talks.	4,793
March
22nd to 24th	Falkland Islands	To visit British Forces.	1,813
29th	Belgium (Brussels)	NATO Ministerial meeting.	3,358
April
20th to 23rd	United States of America (Washington)	To represent Her Majesty's Government at opening of Holocaust Museum, and to have bilateral talks.	9,269
May
16th to 21st	Far East (Malaysia, Indonesia, Brunei and Singapore)	Bilaterals.	45,145
25th	Belgium (Brussels)	NATO Ministerial Meeting.	1,238
June/July
No visits abroad
August
2nd to 4th	Bosnia/Croatia, Italy	To visit British Forces in Bosnia and Croatia, and for bilateral talks in Croatia and Italy.	22,000
September
19th to 24th	CIS (Russia and Ukraine)	Bilaterals.	67,761
October
20th to 21st	Germany (Travemunde)	NATO Ministerial meeting.	10,711
22nd	Germany (Bielefeld)	To visit British Forces.
23rd to 24th	Germany (Bonn)	To participate in Bertelsmann Forum.
24th to 26th	France	Bilateral.
November
21st to 22nd	Austria (Vienna)	Bilateral.	6,257
25th	Germany (Bonn)	Anglo-German Summit.	1,071

Note: Figures are based on the cost of the Royal Air Force and civil flights involved. Where RAF flights were used (in all cases except the visit to the United States of America in April and the vast majority of the Far East visit in May) the costs also include the flight costs of accompanying officials. Accommodation normally provided by Her Majesty's Ambassador or High Commissioner, other Government representative, or by host.

Infantry

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what will be British infantry strength in 1994 and 1995.

Mr. Hanley: The total trained strength of British infantry is expected to be about 29,000 on 1 April 1994 and between 26,000 and 27,000 on 1 April 1995.

Royal Clarence Yard

Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will take immediate steps to contain the infestation of dry rot in several buildings at Royal Clarence yard, Gosport.

Mr. Hanley: Treatment of the dry rot found in three buildings at Royal Clarence yard is being considered in the context of our future plans for the establishment.

Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what are his plans for disposing of the Royal Clarence yard, Gosport; and what is the proposed timing of the disposal;

(2) if he will dispose of the four residential properties at the entrance to Royal Clarence yard, Gosport.

Mr. Hanley: We are examining the scope and feasibility of releasing some or all of Royal Clarence yard and hope to announce a decision shortly.

Regent's Park Barracks

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list to-date the organisations and individuals who have written to his Department opposing the erecting of a multi-storey car park at the Regent's Park barracks; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: Since notification of our intention to proceed I have received letters from six organisations and individuals about provision of a garage facility at Regent's Park barracks, including representations from Camden council, the Crown Estate, the Georgian Group, a local residents' association, a firm of solicitors and a local resident.

Convoy (Doncaster)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the cargo being carried by the convoy of three military lorries which travelled along the A638 road into Doncaster town, South Yorkshire at approximately 12.30 hours on 27 October; where the convoy originated; what was its final destination; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: Without details of vehicle types, registration numbers, and so on, it is not possible positively to identify the vehicles concerned. On the day and about the time in question, however, two Army Landrovers and a four-ton lorry were travelling on the A630 where it merges with the A638 in Doncaster. The vehicles had been collected from Grantham and were proceeding to 219 Transport Squadron (V) at Scarborough barracks in Doncaster. They were not carrying any cargo.

Headquarters Fire

Mr. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will place in the Library a copy of the report written by the London Fire and Civil Defence Authority into the serious fire that took place whilst construction work was being carried out in the basement of his Department's Whitehall headquarters in 1985.

Mr. Hanley: Yes, a copy of the London Fire Brigade letter dated 3 May 1985 will be placed in the Library.

Clyde Submarine Base

Mr. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the annual running costs of the Clyde submarine base, Faslane.

Mr. Hanley: The annual operation costs for 1993-94 are estimated to be £85,600,000.

RAF Land

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the estimated land sale value of each of the RAF stations involved in the review of pilot flying training.

Mr. Hanley: The estimated value of the individual sites on the defence estate is commercial in confidence.

Departmental Land

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much land, by acreage, his Department owns in each of the counties of England.

Mr. Hanley: The land owned in acres by the Ministry of Defence in each of the counties of England is set out in the table.

	Acres
Avon	408
Bedfordshire	3,249
Berkshire	4,722
Buckinghamshire	1,601

Figures are at 1 April 1993, the latest date for which records are available, and relate to freehold landholdings, including foreshore, for which deeds were held. Acquisitions or disposals which may have been completed but where deeds had not been transferred by 1 April 1993 are not included.

Maralinga

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when the ex gratia payment towards the clean-up of the Maralinga site will be made; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: On 14 July 1993 the United Kingdom Government agreed in principle to make an ex gratia payment to the Federal Government of Australia as a contribution to cost of the further clean-up of the Maralinga site. Final arrangements for making this payment are close to completion and I hope to be able to make an announcement shortly.

Search and Rescue (Chivenor)

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make it his policy to authorise the continuation of the Wessex helicopter search and rescue service at RAF Chivenor in the event of any decision being made not to transfer the Sea Kings to Chivenor from April 1994.

Mr. Hanley: I will write to the hon. Member.

Lesbians and Gay Men

Mr. Watson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he proposes to introduce the new regulations dealing with lesbians and gay men in the armed forces; and if he will set out the regulations currently in force.

Mr. Hanley: New regulations reflecting the policy announced in June 1992 that homosexual activity of a kind that is legal in civilian law should not constitute an offence under the service law cannot be introduced until the law has been amended. This will be done as soon as the legislative programme allows. The new policy is, however, being followed by the armed forces and new tri-service guidelines on handling cases of homosexuality are currently being drawn up.

Mr. Watson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the benefits payable (a) to lesbians and gay men who have been dismissed from the services because of their homosexuality and (b) to men and women administratively discharged.

Mr. Hanley: The level of financial benefits payable to all personnel who are administratively discharged from the armed forces depends on their length of service and the circumstances of each case. Where misconduct or unsatisfactory behaviour has occurred, the individual's rate of pension could be affected. If personnel do not qualify for an immediate pension there is no difference in the level of their preserved pension and gratuity. If they have completed sufficient service for them to qualify for an immediate pension they receive a lower rate of pension and, therefore, of gratuity as this is three times the first year's pension. To qualify for an immediate pension, however, they would have had to complete a minimum of 16 years' reckonable service if officers or 22 years' reckonable service if non-commissioned personnel. Individuals discharged as a result of homosexuality would normally receive the full extent of benefits to which they are entitled based on their length of service.

Able Seaman Brett Burnell

Mr. Watson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what plans he has to review the case of Able Seaman Brett Burnell; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: The Royal Navy has a well established statutory complaints procedure of which Able Seaman Burnell was fully appraised prior to his discharge. Should he wish to do so he may seek redress through these channels.

Armed Forces (Protective Clothing)

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) what assessment he has made of the effectiveness of the flak jackets issued to United Kingdom forces serving in the former Yugoslavia in protecting against sniper fire;

(2) what plans he has to issue United Kingdom forces serving in the former Yugoslavia with bullet-proof vests;

(3) what factors have been taken into account in deciding not to issue United Kingdom forces in the former Yugoslavia with bullet-proof vests.

Mr. Hanley: All United Kingdom personnel serving on the ground in Bosnia are equipped with lightweight combat body armour (CBA), which provides protection against shrapnel and would normally be worn in battle. Contoured ceramic chest plates are also available for use in theatre. These can be fitted to the CBA to cover the heart area, back and front, and will stop high velocity bullets. They are designed to provide maximum protection with minimum degradation of the wearer's effectiveness. The decision to issue and to wear the plates is a matter for the judgment of the local commanders, who have not identified any requirement for protection over and above that which is available in theatre.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what would be the cost of issuing bullet-proof vests to United Kingdom forces serving in the former Yugoslavia.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for defence what is the cost of an individual set of body armour used by British service personnel in the former Yugoslavia.

Mr. Hanley: The cost of the combat body armour, including ceramic plates, issued to United Kingdom forces serving in the former Yugoslavia is £156 per set, including VAT.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the operational locations where United Kingdom forces have been issued with bullet-proof vests.

Mr. Hanley: Body armour is issued as a matter of course for any form of operational duty where the risk warrants it wherever that might be. Records of issue, however, are not kept.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many national contingents serving with UNPROFOR in the former Yugoslavia have issued their forces with bullet-proof vests.

Mr. Hanley: All contingents in UNPROFOR serving in Bosnia issue some form of body protection, either individually or on a pool basis for certain duties.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the relevant merits of the body armour worn by (a) British service personnel and (b) Dutch service personnel deployed in the former Yugoslavia; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: All body armour issued to British troops has been researched, developed and trialled extensively against specific military requirements. This applies to the combat body armour (CBA) issued to personnel in the former Yugoslavia, which specifically protects the wearer from fragments produced by exploding munitions, which is considered to be the main threat, and, with the ceramic plates inserted, also protects against high velocity bullets. Dutch personnel are currently using a heavyweight British commercial body armour providing a high degree of protection against high velocity bullets, which is double the wieght of the CBA issued to British troops and considerably reduces mobility.

Defence Equipment Programme

Mr. Riddick: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the defence equipment programme in the light of the Chancellor's Budget statement.

Mr. Aitken: The Government will continue to ensure that the armed forces are properly equipped to carry out their tasks effectively. I am, therefore, pleased to announce decisions on a number of important equipments.

The way ahead on ordering new tanks for the Army has been decided. Having examined a range of options, we have concluded that the most cost-effective way forward would be to buy more Challenger 2 rather than upgrade Challenger 1. Accordingly, subject to the negotiation of satisfactory contractual terms, we intend to place a further order with Vickers Defence Systems for up to 259 more Challenger 2 tanks, together with the associated support and training package. As part of these negotiations, we will ask the company to quote for production bands below this quantity so that we can consider possible options for varying the order. The contractual negotiations will be conducted under the Department's "No Acceptable Price No Contract"—or NAPNOC procedures—in order to secure the best value for money. I would expect to be able to place a contract next year.

A decision has also been taken on the way forward on support helicopters. The main need is for additional large helicopters with good load-carrying capacity and a rear loading ramp. Only two types can meet this Medium Support Helicopter requirement: The Westland Group plc EH101 utility and the Boeing Helicopters Chinook. Some large loads could only be carried by Chinook, which is a reliable and capacious aircraft, proven in RAF service, but for other tasks advantages would be offered by the operational flexibility of a mixed fleet containing the modern, sophisticated and agile EH101.

We therefore intend to enter NAPNOC negotiations with Westland and Boeing to determine the lowest prices available and other details of EH101 utility and Chinook helicopters respectively. On the basis of this information, we will decide what helicopters to buy. Value for money is the key and the prices determined through the parallel NAPNOC process will be crucial to decisions on the way forward.

Finally, the 1993 Statement on the Defence Estimates stated that our plans for the Royal Navy include building up to a fleet of 25 highly capable mine countermeasures vessels of the Hunt and Sandown classes. In this context I am delighted to be able to announce that we are now in a position to invite tenders for a further batch of Sandown class single role minehunters.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Overseas Visits

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how many visits abroad he has made during 1993; and what was (a) the cost to public funds and (b) the purpose of each visit.

Mr. Waldegrave: During 1993 I made five visits abroad which incurred costs borne on public funds. The costs of each visit, including those of officials travelling with me, were as follows:

Destination	Cost £	Purpose
Carnegie, Canada	2,240	Meeting of Science Ministers
Luxembourg	1,905	European Research Council meeting
Geneva	1,748	Visit to European Laboratory for Particle Physics (CERN)
Hong Kong/Japan	16,597	Ministerial visit covering science and technology issues
Washington, United States of America	12,109	Discussions on public service reforms with the Vice-President

County of Lancashire

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster what evidence he has submitted to the Local Government Commission relating to the future of the county of Lancashire; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Waldegrave: I have not submitted any evidence to the Local Government Commission relating to the future of the county of Lancashire. The County Palatine of Lancaster has been in existence for more than 640 years, and I hope it will continue for at least as long again.

Charter Line (East Midlands)

Mr. Garrett: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will set out the cost of the Charterline he has established in the east midlands, the number of calls made on it daily and the number of staff engaged in running it.

Mr. David Davis: The cost of setting up the Charterline pilot study was £880,000. The cost of the software system design was £109,000, and planning, project management and evaluation costs were £195,000. These are all one-off rather than on-going costs. At current levels of usage, it would not be necessary to purchase additional equipment to extend Charterline nationally. Operational costs to 3 November 1993 were £340,400. Significant economies of scale could be achieved if Charterline were to be rolled out on a national basis.

Charterline has, to date, received over 4,700 calls. IBM, which runs the Charterline service on behalf of the citizens charter unit, has nine trained staff available to answer Charterline calls, of whom three are awaiting calls at any one time.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Local Authorities (Loans)

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the total value of loans taken out by each of the 26 councils at the date of their last local government audit.

Mr. Atkins: The information is as follows:

Prosperity

Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland in what working party his Department participates jointly with representatives of the Irish Republic to examine ways and means of promoting greater prosperity in both parts of Ireland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Ancram: The major forum for such discussions is the Anglo-Irish Intergovernmental Conference whose objectives include working together for peace, stability and prosperity throughout the island of Ireland by promoting reconciliation, respect for human rights, co-operation against terrorism, and the development of economic, social and cultural co-operation.

Other forums include

(a) the Anglo-Irish Secretariat;

(b) A steering group which oversees the upgrading of the Belfast to Dublin rail link involving officials of the Department of the Environment for Northern Ireland and the Department of Transport, Energy and Communications, Republic of Ireland;

(c) A joint steering committee on cross-border rural development in which the Department of Agriculture for Northern Ireland participates; and

(d) A joint working party set up to deliver the Northern Ireland/Ireland Interreg programme involving officials from the Department of Finance and Personnel, Department of Education for Northern Ireland, Department of Economic Development, Department of the Environment for Northern Ireland and the Department of Agriculture for Northern Ireland.

Development Agencies

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will list the development agencies together with their directors; and how much has been paid to each director, including expenses, in each of the past five years, and this year to-date.

Mr. Aitkins: Laganside corporation has functions similar to those of urban development corporations in Great Britain. Payments to members over the past five years were as follows:

Members	Amounts Paid (Salary and Expenses)

Student Nurses

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the estimated total cost per annum of training nurses from the Republic of Ireland in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Ancram: At 31 October 1993 there were 263 nurse students from the Republic of Ireland attending colleges in Northern Ireland. It is estimated that the total cost of training these students in 1993-94 will be approximately £1·9 million.

Association for the Care and Resettlement of Offenders

Mr. Maginnis: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what has been the amount of Government financial support paid to the Northern Ireland Association for the Care and Resettlement of Offenders in each of the last five years.

Sir John Wheeler: The Northern Ireland Office has paid the following direct grant aid to the Northern Ireland Association for the Care and Resettlement of Offenders in each of the last five years.

1988-89	197,764
1989-90	211,881
1990-91	219,500
1991-92	286,828
1992-93	302,000

The Northern Ireland Association for the Care and Resettlement of Offenders also contracts with other Northern Ireland Departments to provide progammes for a range of client groups within the criteria set by those departments. Information on the amounts involved is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Victim Support

Mr. Maginnis: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what has been the amount of Government financial support paid to Victim Support Northern Ireland in each of the last five years.

Sir John Wheeler: The following sums were paid to Victim Support Northern Ireland in each of the last five years.

1988-89	33,000
1989-90	40,580
1990-91	44,000
1991-92	93,000
1992-93	167,000

Bomb-proofing

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what has been the cost, by location, of bomb-proofing the Department's premises.

Sir John Wheeler: On security grounds, I do not propose to give this information.

EMPLOYMENT

Claimants

Ms Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many people were interviewed at each stage and how many of those who claimed unemployment benefit—including continuing to claim cases—had their claim disallowed following availability, actively seeking work or refusing suitable employment action taken at (a) the new claims stage, (b) 13 week interviews, (c) restart interviews and (d) other counselling interviews for 1992-93 and 1993-94 for each region and for Great Britain as a whole; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service Agency under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Mr. M. Fogden to Ms Clare Short, dated 1 December 1993:

As the Employment Service is an Executive Agency, the Secretary of State has asked me to write to you direct to respond to your Parliamentary Question about how many people were interviewed at each stage and how many of those who claimed unemployment benefit (including continuing to claim cases) had their claim disallowed following availability, actively seeking work or refusing suitable employment action taken at (a) the new claims stage, (b) 13 week interviews, (c) Restart interviews and (d) other counselling interviews for 1992-93 and 1993-94 for each region and for Great Britain as a whole; and if he will make a statement. This is something which falls within the responsibilities delegated to me as Chief Executive of the Agency.

This information is not available in the precise form which you request it. However, the attached tables show, for each region, the numbers of interviews conducted at each stage of unemployment together with the total number of disallowances by Adjudication Officers on each eligibility condition. We have no information available that tells us the stage of unemployment at which the disallowances occurred.

Also, the Employment Service has changed it's performance monitoring at national level for 1993-94 and the numbers of interviews for this year cannot be given in exactly the same format as the previous year.

Table 1 contains information for the 1992-93 operational year. Table 2 shows information to June 1993—these are the latest published figures for Adjudication Officer's decisions.

I hope this is helpful.

As decided by the Administration Committee of the House of Commons, Chief Executive replies to written Parliamentary Questions will now be published in the Official Report. I will also place a copy of this letter in the Library of the House.

Employment Service

Ms Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what progress the employment service has made in meeting the targets outlined in the 1993-94 agency agreement; and if he will list for each quarter the (a) total unemployed job placings and variance from targets, (b) long-term unemployed job placings and variance from target, (c) people with disabilities job placings and variance from target, (d) inner-city job placings and variance from target, (e) number of claims not pursued following initial contact and variance from target, (f) number of claimants moved from unemployment benefit to another benefit and variance from target and (g) number of people who withdrew their claim to benefit after contact with fraud investigators and variance from target.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The Employment Service is making progress against its targets for 1993-94, meeting or exceeding almost all at the mid-year stage. It placed 859,000 eople in the first two quarters, against an annual target of 1·470 million. This represents 130,000 more placings than at the same stage last year. The Employment Service does not have a target for the number of claimants moved from unemployment benefit to another benefit. The performance is shown in the table.

Employment Service performance against target July to September 1993

Annual performance targets	Quarter 1	Quarter 2	Cumulative	Target levels
(a) Total placings of unemployed people into jobs	394,000	465,000	859,000	1·47 million
	Per cent.	Per cent.	Per cent.	Per cent.
(b) Long-term claimants placed into jobs as a percentage of total unemployed placings	28·6	27·6	28·0	27·0
(c) People with disabilities placed into jobs as a percentage of total unemployed placings	3·2	3·3	3·2	3·0
(d) Unemployed people in inner cities placed into jobs as a percentage of total unemployed placings	34·1	35·0	34·6	35·0
(e) Benefit claims not pursued following initial contact with ES (as percentage of initial enquiries)	8·4	8·5	8·5	9·0

Restart Courses

Ms Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many unemployed people have been referred to restart courses by employment service counsellors since April for each region and for Great Britain as a whole; how many of them were unemployed for over two years; how many attended and completed the course; what were the outcomes of the participants; how many had benefit penalties imposed for not attending or failing to complete their attendance at the restart course; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service Agency under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Mr. M. Fogden to Ms Clare Short, dated 1 December 1993:

As the Employment Service is an Executive Agency, the Secretary of State has asked me to write to you direct to respond to your Parliamentary Question to him about Restart Courses. These are matters which fall within the responsibilities delegated to me as Chief Executive of the Agency.

As you will know from our previous correspondence, Restart Courses are short courses aimed at helping people who are having the most difficulty returning to work. They are not an alternative to regular job search or other employment or ttraining programmes. Essentially they provide people with the opportunity to explore all the options open to them and give them confidence to take the next step back to work.

People who have been unemployed for two years or more who refuse or fail to take up a place on an Employment Department employment or training programme at their Restart interview, are asked to attend a Restart Course.

As your question has raised a number of specific points, I am setting out the information you have asked for in the two tables attached—one deals with all Restart Course attenders, the other just those covered by the requirement to attend.

I hope this is helpful.

As decided by the Administration Committee of the House of Commons, Chief Executive replies to written Parliamentary Questions will now be published in the Official Report. I will also place a copy of this letter in the Library of the House.

About 87 per cent. of all decisions lead to a reduction of up to 40 per cent. of personal Income Support.

Counselling

Ms Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many unemployed people have been referred to jobplan workshops by employment service counsellors since April for each region and for Great Britain as a whole; how many of them were unemployed for over one year; how many attended and completed the workshop; what were the outcomes of the participants; how many had benefit penalties imposed for not attending or failing to complete their attendance at the jobplan workshop; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service Agency under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from M. E. G. Fogden to Ms Clare Short, dated 1 December 1993:

As the Employment Service is an Executive Agency, the Secretary of State has asked me to write to you direct to respond to your Parliamentary Question to him about Jobplan Workshops. These are matters which fall within the responsibilities delegated to me as Chief Executive of the Agency.

Jobplan is a new programme which aims to help people who have been unemployed for a year or more to compete successfully for jobs and opportunities. About 80 per cent. of the people who first become unemployed leave the unemployment register within a year. For those who remain unemployed, confidence and the intensity of jobsearch can decrease. They may believe that there are very few positive options open to them. It is therefore important that at this stage people take a fresh look at their situation and have the chance to review their strengths and skills and set themselves new clear, achievable job goals that take advantage of the range of help available.

This can be achieved on Jobplan, through in-depth guidance interviews with one of the leaders, access to computer assisted guidance programs and tests of attainment. During the week participants will draw up a comprehensive action plan which will map out the steps that they need to take to find work. For many people this will involve further help such as Training for Work or a place on a Jobclub.

People who have been unemployed for a year will be asked to attend a Jobplan workshop unless they prefer to take up a place on another Employment Department programme. People who fail to attend each day of the workshop may, under the Income Support (General) 1990 Regulation 21A, amended in March this year, lose a proportion of their personal entitlement to Income Support. When making this amendment, Ministers consulted the Social Security Advisory Committee who accepted that it was reasonable to ask people unemployed for some time to go on an event such as this.

I have set out the information you have asked for in the table attached.

I hope that this is helpful.

As decided by the Administration Committee of the House of Commons, Chief Executive replies to written Parliamentary Questions will now be published in the Official Report. I will also place a copy of this letter in the Library of the House.

Training and Enterprise Councils

Ms Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the amount of overpayment made by his Department to training and enterprise councils in each year for which information is available; how much has been recovered; how many TECs are still holding money which has been overpaid; and if he will make a statement.

Miss Widdecombe: Information currently available shows that the Department identified overpayments amounting to £3,407,887·71 and £8,807,118·79 made to the 75 training and enterprise councils (TECs) in England in 1990-91 and 1991-92 respectively.

Of these overpayments Treasury agreement has been given to write off £231,054 and a further £11,513,773 has been recovered. In consultation with legal advisors the Department is vigorously pursuing recovery of the remaining balance from the three TECs which still hold overpayment monies.

In 1992-93 information currently available shows overpayments amounting to £6,586,421·73 were made to 51 TECs. Action is in hand to ensure that the overpayments are recovered by the end of December 1993.

No information is held centrally with regard to overpayments in 1993-94, but regional staff have been instructed to ensure that any overpayments are recovered as they are identified.

The Department is committed to ensuring that sound systems of financial control are in place in all TECs and in all training providers and to recovering any overpayments that may be made as they are identified.

Liverpool

Mr. Parry: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will make a statement on his recent visit to Liverpool.

Mr. David Hunt: Last Friday, I visited TWG Packaging, where I was given a presentation on the company's achievements. I then met members of the Merseyside Manufacturing Challenge Group who made a presentation on the work of the group and their vision for the long-term economic regeneration of Merseyside.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Animal Procedures Committee

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his Department will accept the recommendations made by the Animal Procedures Committee in its annual report 1992.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The document is a report on the activities of the committee including matters upon which it has made recommendations in the course of 1992. The committee recommended the extension of the controls of the Animals (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986 Octopus vulgaris and made recommendations in respect of nine applications for project licences under section 5 of the Act. Its recommendations were accepted.

Section 11 Funding

Ms Gordon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the total estimated saving to the Treasury from the proposed cuts in section 11 funding.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Departmental expenditure plans are reviewed annually and details of planned provision are set out in Home Office annual reports. Reductions in future financial provision for section 11 grant were made in the context of the 1992 public expenditure survey. The following table shows planned provisions for section 11 grant in the 1991 and 1992 public expenditure surveys, as published in the annual reports of 1992 and 1993 respectively.

Life Sentences

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) men and (b) women held in prisons in England and Wales were serving a life sentence as of 19 November.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the director general of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Mr. Derek Lewis to Mr. Tom Cox, dated 30 November 1993:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about the population of life sentence prisoners in Prison Service establishments.

The latest available information is for 30 September 1993 and shows that there were 3,086 prisoners in Prison Service establishments in England and Wales serving life sentences, of whom 2,980 were men and 106 were women.

Clothing (Fire Safety)

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many children were killed or injured as a result of clothing catching fire (a) nationally and (b) in the London borough of Lewisham in each year since 1980.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Information for the United Kingdom is shown in the table. It shows casualties where clothing being worn was the first item to catch fire. The statistics cannot identify fires starting elsewhere spreading to clothing. Data are not separately available for Lewisham.

Wormwood Scrubs

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list each of the projects now under development at Wormwood Scrubs prison, London, the cost of each project and if funding for each project has been approved and granted.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for these matters has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from: Mr. Derek Lewis to Mr. Tom Cox, dated 30 November 1993:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about the current development work at Wormwood Scrubs prison.

The major phase of redevelopment work currently being carried out at the prison is due to be completed by the end of April 1994. This will create a secure corridor to connect the four existing accommodation wings and provide additional accommodation for 146 prisoners. A new kitchen, gymnasium, medical centre, workshops and reception and discharge unit are also being provided. The estimated capital cost is £43·7 million.

In later phases of the redevelopment it is proposed to complete the modernisation of the four existing accommodation wings, which will include upgrading security and 24 hour access to sanitation in those cells which do not have it at present. A final decision is still to be made about the timing and phasing of this work.

Prison Building

Ms Gordon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the total amount of money to be allocated for the prison building programme.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Mr. Derek Lewis to Ms Mildred Gordon, dated 30 November 1993:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about the money to be allocated to the prison building programme.

Over the next three years a total of £620·3 million will be assigned to the prison building programme, as follows:

£ million

1994-95	1995-96	1996-97
251·4	223·1	145·8

The overall total includes nearly £43 million for the completion of the current prison building programme and the purchase of sites and infrastructure work for the programme of building six new prisons to which the Home Secretary referred on 6 October.

The remaining £577 million will be spent on providing additional accommodation, repairs and modernising facilities in existing prisons.

Child Prostitution

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what research his Department undertakes into the problem of child prostitution.

Mr. Maclean: The Home Office has not conducted or funded research into child prostitution.

Prison Service

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the bonus payment paid to the Director General of the Prison Service since his appointment.

Mr. Howard: £8,280, in respect of the period 6 January 1993 to 31 March 1993.

Segregation Units and Prison Statistics

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) what was the number of (a) men and (b) women held in segregation units in prisons in England and Wales on 19 November;

(2) what was the number of (a) men and (b) women held on rule 43 in prisons in England and Wales on 22 November.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for these matters has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Mr. Derek Lewis to Mr. Tom Cox, dated 30 November 1993:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Questions about the number of men and women in Prison establishments segregated from association under Rule 43 and the number held in segregation units.

The table below shows the number of inmates held on Prison Rule 43 and Young Offender Institution Rule 46 on 22 November.

	Rule 43 & 46 (own protection)	Rule 43 & 46 (good order and discipline)
Men	1,251	267
Women	19	14
Total	1,270	281

The above table does not include inmates held in vulnerable prisoner units. Information on numbers held in segregation units is not collected centrally.

Deportations

Ms Gordon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many women have been deported from Britain in each of the last five years after breakdown of their marriage.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The information requested is not available as wives are not separately identified in the deportation statisics.

Fraudulent Leaflets

Ms Gordon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will bring forward legislation to outlaw the production of fraudulent leaflets purporting to come from a rival political party.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: My right hon. and learned Friend sympathises with the hon. Member's concerns. The Government have, however, no present plans to introduce such legislation, the technical feasibility of which is not beyond doubt.

Muderers (Prison Sentences)

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will detail the average amount of time spent in prison by those who were sentenced for murder and have since been released.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Mr. Derek Lewis to Mr. Frank Field, dated 30 November 1993:

AVERAGE SENTENCE LENGTH FOR MURDER

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about the average time served by inmates sentenced for murder and who have since been released.

I attached a copy of a table showing the numbers of life sentence prisoners released from 1981-1991. This information ispublished annually in "Prison Statistics, England and Wales" (Table 8.5 of the latest volume, for 1991, Cm 2157), a copy of which is in the House of Commons Library.

Prisons

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what new money is to be made available and how much for building new prison establishments in England and Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for these matters has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Mr. Derek Lewis to Mr. Tom Cox, dated 30 November 1993:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about the funding for the construction of new prison establishments.

On 2 September 1993 the Home Secretary announced that the design, construction, management and potential financing of future new prisons would be contracted out to the private sector. It is intended that both the construction and operation of the six new prisons planned will be funded in this way. It is too early to indicate the cost of these prisons which will be assessed on the basis of value for money obtained for the complete financial package comprising both capital and operating costs. Outline proposals and expressions of interest in the first two prisons have recently been invited. It is expected that almost all of the expenditure will fall outside the period covered by the 1993 Public Expenditure Survey (that is, beyond 1996-97).

Doncaster prison which is due to open next year is the last of the current programme of 21 new prisons to be built.

Temazepam

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has now considered the recommendations of the Advisory Council on Misuse of Drugs for measures to reduce Temazepam misuse.

Mr. Maclean: I am considering the report of the advisory council in consultation with other Government Departments and I hope to reach a decision shortly.

Domestic Fires

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many domestic fires occurred in (a) 1963 and (b) the latest year for which figures are available; what were the casualty figures in each year; and what proposals he has to reduce these.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The information required is given in the table.

Fire certification arrangements under the Fire Precautions Act 1971 are not possible in single dwellings. The Government therefore continue to seek reductions in casualties from fires in such dwellings through effective initiatives in publicity and education.

Criminal and Motoring Cases

Mr. Gapes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many (a) criminal and (b) motoring cases were brought to trial at Redbridge magistrates court and Snaresbrook Crown court for each quarter of 1991, 1992 and 1993 to date.

Mr. Maclean: Information for 1991 and 1992, which is provisional, is given in the table. Information for 1993 is not yet available.

[1] Indictable and summary non motoring offences.
[2] Summary motoring offences.
[3] Improvements in the data collection methods used by the Metropolitan police district (MPD) have led to an increase from this quarter in the number recorded as proceeded against in magistrate courts for indictable and summary non-motoring offences of about a third in the MPD area as a whole.

Special Constables

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what actions he intends to take to improve the training for special constables; and what further action he will take before recruiting.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Chief constables are responsible for the recruitment and training of special constables in their force area.

The central planning and training unit has developed a number of standard training packages as a resource for training special constables. National special constable training packages covering induction and basic training are now in use in the majority of forces in England and Wales, and a new development training package is being introduced in a number of police forces.

Suspects' Rights

Mr. Meacher: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total expenditure of his Department on promoting the rights of suspects under the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 since the coming into force of the Act and for each subsequent year.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The approximate expenditure incurred in distributing to police forces new or revised versions of the codes of practice required under section 66 of the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984 and notices to detained persons required under paragraph 3.2 of code C was as follows:

1985	33,700
1986	2,000
1988	14,600
1991	138,300
1992	[1]—

[1] No expenditure.

Police Resources, London

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what recent discussions he has had with the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis on existing police resources covering the Greater London area; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Charles Wardle: My right hon. and learned Friend meets the Commissioner from time to time to discuss matters of common concern, including resource matters.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many visits abroad he has made during 1993; and what was (a) the cost of each visit to public funds and (b) the purpose of each visit.

Mr. Howard: I have not made any official visits abroad since becoming Home Secretary.

Details of visits made by my predecessor during 1993, and the associated travel and subsistence costs, including those of a private secretary, are as follows:

Purpose	Cost £
Official visit to India, Pakistan and Bangladesh	12,504
European Conference on Uncontrolled Migration, Budapest	2,430
Ad Hoc Immigration/TREVI Ministerial Meeting, Copenhagen	1,784

Fire Inspections

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what response he has had from local authorities to the Government's proposal to end local authority fire inspections of bed-sitters and multi-tenant flats.

Sir George Young: I have been asked to reply.

Local housing authorities have a statutory duty under the Housing (Means of Escape from Fire in Houses in Multiple Occupation) Order 1981 to require that houses in multiple occupation (HMOs) with at least three storeys (excluding basements) and with a combined floor area of over 500 square metres are provided with adequate means of escape from fire.

Housing authorities have discretionary powers to inspect smaller HMOs under section 395 of the Housing Act 1985.

We have no plans to remove these powers.

SCOTLAND

Forestry Commission

Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans the Government have to privatise the landholdings of the Forestry Commission.

Sir Hector Monro: Forestry Ministers have asked the forestry review group to review options for the ownership and management of Forestry Commission woodlands, and to make proposals for changes which would improve the effectiveness of the delivery of the Government's forestry policy objectives, having regard to the Government's other economic and environmental policies.

Once they have received and considered the advice of the review group, they will decide what further action, if any, should be taken.

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list by generic and specific name the trees and shrubs, indigenous or otherwise, which are most commonly grown by the Forestry Commission; if he will show the density of each species as a percentage of land use; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Hector Monro: The species most commonly grown by the Forestry Commission are listed in the table, together with the percentage of the total area of the commission's productive woodland which each occupies.

Species	Percentage of Total Area
Conifers
Picea sitchensis (Sitka spruce)	48·0
Pinus contorta (Lodgepole pine)	11·6
Pinus sylvestris (Scots pine)	9·5
Larix kaempferi (Japanese larch)	5·3
Picea abies (Norway spruce)	5·0
Pinus nigra var maritima (Corsican pine)	4·2
Pseudotsuga menziesii (Douglas fir)	2·7
Larix eurolepis (Hybrid larch)	1·5
Larix decidua (European larch)	0·7
Tsuga heterophylla (Western hemlock)	0·7
All other conifers	1·4

Quercus spp (Oak)	3·1
Fagus sylvatica (Beech)	2·6
Betula spp (Birch)	2·0
Fraxinus excelsior (Ash)	0·5
Acer pseudoplatanus (Sycamore)	0·3
Castanea sativa (Sweet Chestnut)	0·3
All other broadleaves	0·6
Total Broadleaves	9·4

Mr. Tipping: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what estimate he has of the number of trees on Forestry Commission land in (a) Nottinghamshire, (b) England, (c) Scotland and (d) Wales.

Sir Hector Monro: A broad estimate is given in the table.

	Number of Trees (Millions)
Nottinghamshire	7
England	300
Scotland	800
Wales	200

Training

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many trainees were recruited to employment training and the successor training for work programme in each local enterprise company area in (a) 1991-92, (b) 1992-93 and (c) between 1 April and 1 October.

Mr. Lang: In Scotland the responsibility for the monitoring of recruitment to employment training and its successor training for work rests with Scottish Enterprise and with Highlands and Islands Enterprise. I have therefore asked the chairmen of these bodies to write to the hon. Member.

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what sum of money was spent by each local enterprise company on employment training and its successor programme, training for work, in (a) 1991-92, (b) 1992-93, (c) between 1 April to 30 September, actual and (d) 1993-94, estimated outturn.

Mr. Lang: In Scotland the responsibility for the monitoring of local enterprise company expenditure on employment training and its successor training for work rests with Scottish Enterprise and with Highlands and Islands Enterprise. I have therefore asked the chairmen of these bodies to write to the hon. Member.

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what analysis has been made in each local enterprise company area of the leaver destination of trainees on employment training or its successor programme, training for work; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: In Scotland the responsibility for analysis of leaver desinations of trainees on employment training and its successor training for work rests with Scottish Enterprise and with Highlands and Islands Enterprise. I have therefore asked the chairmen of these bodies to write to the hon. Member.

Nursery Education

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what information he has regarding the percentage of (a) three-year-old children and (b) four-year-old children who attend nursery school in each local education authority area in Scotland.

Mr. Lang: The information is set out in the table. The percentage figures are based on the mid-1992 estimates of the three- and four-year-old population.

Percentage of three-year-olds and four-year-olds attending education authority nursery schools/departments at September 1992.

Scenic Areas

Mr. Charles Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list those notified applications for developments in national scenic areas which have been called in since 1979.

Mr. Stewart: The Town and Country Planning (Notification of Applications) (Scotland) Direction 1980 was issued in August 1980. Since then, the Secretary of State has called in four notified applications for developments in national scenic areas. These were:

an application for a hill track at Little Gruinard;
two applications for housing development at Kelton, Dumfries and Galloway; and an application for seven houses on the foreshore at Ballachulish.

Smoke Detectors

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent discussions have taken place between his officials and representatives of Convention of Scottish Local Authorities concerning the installation of smoke detectors in homes in (a) the public housing sector and (b) private homes; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stewart: In discussions earlier this year with COSLA, and also with Scottish Homes, about the implementation of the health promotion initiatives outlined in "Scotland's Health—A Challenge to Us All", the Chief Medical Officer and officials of the Scottish Office Home and Health Department emphasised the importance of smoke detectors in reducing fatalities from fires and encouraged COSLA and Scottish Homes to continue their efforts to secure the installation of detectors throughout their housing stocks.

Regulations making the fitting of mains-operated smoke alarms compulsory in all new dwellings came into force in Scotland on 23 July 1993.

Sports Centres

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a table showing the provision of (a) swimming pools and public baths and (b) indoor sports centres by each relevant Scottish local authority on a per capita basis; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Hector Monro: This information is not held centrally.

Locate in Scotland

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what has been the budget of Locate in Scotland in each year since its establishment; and what would the budget be in 1993, using the year of its establishment as a baseline, had it kept pace with inflation.

Mr. Stewart: Locate in Scotland was established in 1981. Between 1981-82 and 1983-84 costs were not held in a format to identify separately those attributable to Locate in Scotland.

The cost of running Locate in Scotland from 1984-85 to 1992-93, taking account of salaries, administration expenses, travel, overseas offices and marketing is shown.

£ million

Year	Cost
1984-85	3·3
1985-86	3·5
1986-87	3·8
1987-88	3·9
1988-89	4·0
1989-90	4·3
1990-91	4·6
1991-92	5·1
1992-93	6·2

Had costs since 1984-85 kept pace with inflation, the budget in 1992-93 would have been £5·1 million.

Hardy Nursery Stock

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the health of the hardy nursery stock industry in Scotland; and what plans he has further to develop and promote it.

Sir Hector Monro: The container sector of the industry has seen increasing sales and prices whereas in the bare-root sector overproduction of some lines has led to price reductions. Overall demand is good and activity on the landscape supply side shows signs of an increase. Growers have generally accepted the new single market plant health regime—plant passports—without major problems.

I was pleased to be able to lend my personal support this year again to the Scotgrow exhibition and I hope to attend the launch of Scottish Plants early next year. In the meantime we are considering whether the Government could make a financial contribution towards a joint initiative by the National Farmers Union of Scotland, the Horticultural Trade Association and Scotgrow to employ a full-time promotional officer.

Community Councils

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on his plans for community councils.

Mr. Stewart: I announced, on 11 November, new measures to strengthen the role of community councils following local government reform.

Under the changes, community councils will gain the legal right to be consulted on local planning issues and schemes which the new councils will be preparing for decentralising service delivery arrangements. In addition, local licensing boards will be urged in new Government guidance to keep community councils fully informed of local developments in their area.

Glasshouse Crops

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to promote the use of waste heat from incinerators, distilleries and industrial units for the production of glasshouse crops; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stewart: The Energy Efficiency Office commissions a wide range of studies, including waste heat recovery projects. The results of these studies are widely promoted.

Renfrewshire Enterprise

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is his estimate of the number of full-time permanent jobs that have been created by Renfrewshire Enterprise since its inception; and how many full-time permanent jobs have been lost in its catchment area in the same period.

Mr. Stewart: Estimates of jobs created by the local enterprise companies are made not by my right hon. Friend but by the local enterprise companies themselves, since it is they who have access to all necessary details about the projects and activities in which they have been involved. Renfrewshire Enterprise estimates that, during the period April 1991 to October 1993, its activities have created 6,500 jobs; and that it has had a considerable impact over and above this in maintaining and safeguarding jobs across its area.

No central register of jobs lost in the area is held. However, Renfrewshire Enterprise's monitoring of major job losses over the same period suggests losses of around 3,500.

Lending Libraries

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will publish a table showing the provision of lending libraries by each relevant Scottish local authority on a per capita basis; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Hector Monro: Local authorities revenue expenditure on library provision in 1991-92, the latest year for which figures are available, is set out in the table.

Benomyl

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what guidelines his Department currently issues on the use of benomyl as a crop fungicide; what precautions he advises on its use; what are the effects of misuse; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Hector Monro: My Department receives advice on pesticide safety issues from the Advisory Committee on Pesticides, an independent body of scientific and medical experts. Following a review of benomyl by the ACP, it was announced in March of this year that there was no cause for concern over its continued use in the United Kingdom.

In addition to the statutory conditions governing pesticide usage in general, benomyl products carry label restrictions including warning not to contaminate waterways, to keep off skin, to wash after use, to empty the container completely and dispose of safely; and, for home garden produce, to store away from children. Exposure to extremely large amounts of benomyl can cause anophthalimia and microphthalmia in rats. However, provided conditions of use are followed, exposure of consumers and operators is 1,000 times less than that demonstrated as a no-effect level in rats.

Paisley

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will commission a study by Scottish Enterprise into the potential for the development of manufacturing of Paisley pattern goods in Paisley.

Mr. Stewart: Renfrewshire Enterprise, in partnership with Renfrew district council, is already supporting the industry and examining a number of strategic issues through the Paisley pattern initiative. The initiative covers the heritage of the industry; commercial and product development; and marketing and promotion of Paisley pattern and its links with the local area.

Renfrewshire Enterprise plans to examine in the new year the full market potential for the manufacturing of Paisley pattern products, to build on the strategic examination of the industry conducted under the Initiative.

I am sure Renfrewshire Enterprise would be happy to provide the hon. Member with further details about the initiative should he wish to contact it direct.

Windyhill Farm, Elderslie

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he will consider the appeal against refusal of planning permission by Renfrew district council for the development of a quarry at Windyhill farm, Elderslie; what procedures will be followed before final determination of the appeal; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stewart: Evidence on this appeal will be heard by a reporter at a public local inquiry scheduled to commence on 14 June 1994. The reporter appointed will subsequently submit a comprehensive report based on the evidence led at the inquiry and the many other written representations submitted by local residents and other parties. The report and reporter's recommendations will, thereafter, be referred to my right hon. Friend who has directed that he should determine this appeal on the grounds that the proposal would constitute a significant development within a designated green belt.

Lord Lieutenants

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the procedure for the appointment of a lord lieutenant of Renfrewshire to replace the retiring incumbent; if he will publish a table showing the name, occupation and date of appointment of (a) the vice-lord lieutenant and (b) each deputy lord lieutenants of (i) Glasgow and (ii) Renfrewshire; how nominations can be made for these positions; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Lord lieutenants in Scotland are appointed by Her Majesty under section 131 of the Reserve Forces Act 1980. Deputy lieutenants are appointed by the lord lieutenant under section 133 of that Act, which includes the requirement that the lord lieutenant must ascertain that Her Majesty does not disapprove of the proposed appointment. Under section 135 of that Act, each lord lieutenant may, with Her Majesty's approbation, appoint a deputy lieutenant or a lieutenant as vice-lord lieutenant. Current information about the occupations of vice-lords lieutenant and lords-lieutenant is not held centrally. The other information requested by the hon. Gentleman is as follows:

Planning Regulations

Sir David Steel: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will consider extending planning regulations to make it the duty of planning authorities to ensure that service copies of proposed developments which are available to the public exactly match development plans on planning application forms and associated plans.

Mr. Lang: Responsibility for completion of neighbour notices rests with the applicant. It is intended that the description given of the proposed development should be consistent with the information on the planning application form. However, there is no requirement for it to match exactly. If it comes to light that there is a general problem on this matter, I will of course be willing to look into it.

Land (Public Access)

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what changes planning authorities are enacting or proposing when approached for planning permission for a change of ownership of forestry regarding freedom to roam; what representations he has had on this matter; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Hector Monro: Change in the ownership of a forest is not subject to planning permission. The Forestry Commission operates procedures, where it plans to dispose of forestry land, which offer local authorities the opportunity of entering into an access agreement between the commission and the authority. These arrangements are being reviewed at present in conjunction with the work of the forestry review group. The review group and Ministers have received many representations of which a large proportion are concerned about maintenance of access.

Procurators Fiscal

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what are the arrangements for reporting perceived cases of maladministration by local procurator fiscal's offices; how many such cases have been reported in relation to the operation of the procurator fiscal's office in Paisley since 1991; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Where my noble and learned Friend the Lord Advocate receives a complaint about the conduct of business in a procurator fiscal's office, he obtains an immediate and full report of the circumstances. Procurators fiscal know that they may be called upon at any time to explain their actings to my noble and learned Friend the Lord Advocate. In addition, a programme of practice review involves inspection of local offices. Procurators fiscal also submit monthly returns of their activities to the Crown Office. In matters of administration procurators fiscal are accountable through their regional procurator fiscal to the Crown Agent. Regional procurators fiscal have powers to visit and inspect offices in their regions, and routinely do so. Local offices are also subject to regular financial auditing.

There have been no reports of maladministration as such in relation to the operation of the procurator fiscal's office at Paisley, although a number of complaints have recently been made about the handling of particular cases by that office. The Crown Agent has discussed these with the procurator fiscal, and certain new procedures have been adopted as a result.

Job Creation

Mr. Gallie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what major job-creating projects have been announced in Scotland in the last 12 months.

Local Government Review

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will give a detailed explanation of his reasons for proposing to detach Musselburgh from the East Lothian local authority area, citing the specific representations or evidence of public opinion which supported that plan.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 30 November 1993]: In reaching the decision to include Musselburgh in the proposed Lothians authority, particular attention was paid to the petition of 8,000 names from the "Hands Off Musselburgh" campaign which expressed opposition to Musselburgh's inclusion within an expanded Edinburgh authority. The fact that Musselburgh traditionally formed part of Midlothian, and became part of East Lothian as recently as 1975, was also taken into account.

Gourock Rope Works

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he or his officials last discussed the subject of the current circumstances surrounding the Gourock rope works, Port Glasgow, and its future with representatives of Historic Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Hector Monro [holding answer 30 November 1993]: Historic Scotland, as an executive agency responsible to my right hon. Friend, reports to me for my interest in the Gourock rope works as a listed building.

Historic Scotland officials had a meeting with officials of Inverclyde district council regarding the rope works building on 12 August. Regular communication has been maintained since then. I hope the future of the category A listed building will be made secure by a scheme for its restoration.

I shall write to the hon. Member as matters develop.

Ayrshire and Arran Health Board

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many members of Ayrshire and Arran health board's valuation committee have recently resigned from the evaluation committee.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 23 November 1993]: No members have resigned from the evaluation committee.

Countryside Survey

Dr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what discussions he has had with the Secretary of State for the Environment on the results of the countryside survey 1990 and the implications of these results for his Department.

Sir Hector Monro [holding answer 30 November 1993]: My right hon. Friend maintains regular contact with his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment on these matters and will continue to do so. My right hon. Friend is committed to integrating environmental concerns into all policy areas.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Pensions

Mr. Bowden: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) how much of the total amount of money raised by measures to restrict the amount of tax which can be reclaimed by a pension fund introduced in the last Budget will be paid by members of money purchase occupational schemes in the form of a reduction in the assets available to purchase a pension;

(2) how much of the total amount of money raised by measures introduced in the last Budget, to restrict the amount of tax which can be reclaimed by a pension fund, will be paid by employers in the form of additional contributions;

(3) how much of the total amount of money raised by measures to restrict the amount of tax which can be reclaimed by a pension fund introduced in the last Budget will be paid by individuals paying additional voluntary contributions into occupational schemes in the form of a reduction in assets available to purchase a pension;

(4) how much of the total amount of money raised by measures introduced in the last Budget, to restrict the amount of tax which can be reclaimed by a pension fund, will be paid by pension funds in the form of a reduction in assets;

(5) how much of the total amount of money raised by measures to restrict the amount of tax which can be reclaimed by a pension fund introduced in the last Budget will be paid by holders of personal pensions in the form of a reduction in the assets available to purchase a pension.

Mr. Dorrell: The impact of the changes in the taxation of dividends announced in the March Budget on contributions to, and the assets of, pension funds will depend upon a wide range of factors including future rates of return on investments, earning levels and the existing levels of assets and liabilities.

Mr. Bowden: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how much tax will be raised in a full tax year by the measure introduced in the March Budget restricting the amount of tax which can be reclaimed by a pension fund.

Mr. Dorrell: The overall Exchequer yield from the changes in the taxation of dividends announced in the March Budget is estimated to be £900 million in 1995-96 and about £1 billion a year subsequently.

Mr. Bowden: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what discussions his officials have had with officials in the Department of Social Security on the extent to which the tax changes affecting pension funds introduced in the March Budget are likely to affect the number of people relying on various forms of private pension provision;

(2) what discussions his officials have had with officials in the Department of Social Security on the extent to which the tax changes affecting pension funds introduced in the March Budget are likely to affect the numbers contracting out of SERPS.

Mr. Dorrell: Regular discussions take place between officials of my Department and Department of Social Security officials on a wide range of topics affecting pension funds.

Mr. Bates: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what discussions his officials had with officials of the Department of Social Security before changing the taxation of the income of pension funds in the March Budget.

Mr. Dorrell: The potential effects of changes to the taxation of dividends announced in the March Budget were taken fully into account in developing the proposals. Issues affecting pensions are the subject of regular discussions between my officials and those of the Department of Social Security.

Parliamentary Questions

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how the current cost threshold for answering parliamentary questions is calculated.

Mr. Dorrell: The threshold is set at a level which is eight times the average direct cost of staff involved in answering written parliamentary questions. The average direct cost is updated annually by indexation. The cost threshold is increased in £50 steps, rounded upwards.

Tax Credits

Mr. George: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what representations he has received from the National Association of Pension Funds about the effects of further reductions in the value of tax credits on dividends payable by United Kingdom companies to United Kingdom resident or other non-resident shareholders; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: The National Association of Pension Funds has written to my right hon. and learned Friend, and I met representatives of the association on 27 October.

Corporate Tax Fraud

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what plans he has to increase penalties for corporate tax fraud.

Mr. Dorrell: The Government have no such plans. We believe the existing system of tax-geared penalties to be quite adequate.

Value Added Tax

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 26 November on payments by the VAT commissioners, what was the value of the VAT payable orders gone astray since 1 July 1988 subsequently recovered.

Sir John Cope: Of the total sum of £360,638, reported as gone astray in the previous answer £237,624·11 had been recovered as at 30 November 1993. The sums still outstanding continue to be subject to any possible further recovery action.

Mrs. Roche: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 26 November, Official Report, column 273, what inquiries he has instituted as to why traders do not take advantage of electronic transfer; and if he will make a statement.

Sir John Cope: Customs ask traders to provide bank account details on first registration, by an annual mailshot to verify registration details and when officers carry out visits to their premises.

The option of payment by electronic transfer or by payable order can be helpful to business, but the choice of method is a commercial decision for the trader.

Inquiries and general feedback to Customs indicate that a proportion of those who choose to receive payable orders do so to enable them to retain control over the sum, both as to destination and timing.

Government Car Service

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what is the annual cost to the Department of the car service for Ministers; and how many vehicles are involved.

Sir John Cope: The annual cost to the Treasury for use of Government car service cars by its Ministers in financial year 1992-93 was £270,282. Five cars were allocated to Treasury Ministers on long-term hire and are available for other official use within the Treasury when not required by Ministers.

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Legal Aid

Mr. Sweeney: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what plans he has regarding future arrangements for the grant of criminal legal aid in the magistrates courts; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John M. Taylor: Decisions on the grant or refusal of legal aid in criminal cases brought in the approximately 600 magistrates' courts in England and Wales are an integral part of procedures which, in the interests of the liberty of the subject, have to be as expeditious as possible. The Legal Aid Act 1988 vests the function of deciding in the courts themselves, but gives me the power to transfer it to the Legal Aid Board.

The evidence continues to indicate that, under the present arrangements, the Lord Chancellor cannot be certain that the existing regulations governing the grant of legal aid are being applied sufficiently rigorously, in particular in determining the financial eligibility of applicants. This has led the Comptroller and Auditor General repeatedly to qualify my Department's appropriation account because of material doubt whether this category of legal aid spending is regular.

In no circumstances can any irregularity in dispensing public money be acceptable, and the Lord Chancellor will take every available step to ensure proper safeguards consistent with the due administration of justice. In addition to the guidance issued last year, the Lord Chancellor has made changes in the regulations, with effect from September 1993, to clarify and strengthen the duty on justices clerks to satisfy themselves of an applicant's means before granting legal aid. In addition, with the help of the Justices Clerks Society and the Legal Aid Board, the Lord Chancellor is considering whether the previous guidance on the "interests of justice" criteria requires to be revised. The impact of these measures will be closely monitored.

In January 1992, the Lord Chancellor invited the Legal Aid Board to consider whether, in the interests of making decisions on the grant of criminal legal aid in the magistrates courts more uniform and systematic, I should transfer this function from the courts to the board. The board reported earlier this year that it would be ready to assume responsibility if certain changes were made in the present scheme, but that it could not do so until 1995 at the earliest. In consultations on the board's report, reservations were expressed about some of the details, while other aspects commanded widespread support.

Transferring responsibility for the grant of criminal legal aid to the Legal Aid Board offers the advantage of greater consistency in decision-making. However, there could be countervailing risks to the speed and efficiency of criminal procedures. As a matter of policy, I feel bound to take these risks seriously, and I am not at present satisfied that they are outweighed by the advantage.

However, if the current measures do not achieve an acceptable result, I will give further consideration to a transfer to the board. At the same time, I will consider any identifiable alternative measures, with a view to achieving the best practicable balance between speed of decision-making and assured regularity in the handling of public money.

TRANSPORT

London Underground (Power Failures)

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will publish a table listing the number of occasions on which the London Underground service has been affected by a power failure in the past five years in each case indicating the number of lines, train services and passengers affected and the length of time during which the service was interrupted; and whether or not passengers had to be evacuated from any part of the system.

Mr. Norris: Over the past five years London Underground has experienced one other significant power failure, at Charing Cross station on the morning of 19 October 1992. As a result of the failure of the local station power supply, the station was evacuated and remained closed for the rest of the day, reopening at the start of service on 20 October. All Jubilee line trains were terminated at Green Park, and Bakerloo and Northern line trains did not stop at Charing Cross. There are no figures available for the number of passengers directly affected.

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what estimate he has been given of the theoretical risk of simultaneous failure of all power supplies to the London Underground system.

Mr. Norris: An independent risk analysis report has estimated the risk of simultaneous loss of Lots Road and Greenwich generating stations and the Neasden bulk supply point to be one in 3,378 years.

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many passengers on the London Underground were affected by the power failure on 24 November; and what proportion of the total number of daily users of the underground service this represents.

Mr. Norris: London Underground has provided the following information:

300,000 passengers were affected by the morning failure, representing 12 per cent. of daily users.

20,000 passengers were evacuated from trains stalled between stations—in tunnel or in the open—due to the morning failure, representing 0·8 per cent. of daily users.

150,000 passengers were affected by the evening failure, representing 6 per cent. of daily users.

2,000 passengers were evacuated from trains stalled between stations—in tunnel or in the open—due to the evening failure, representing 0·08 per cent. of daily users.

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether (a) the Lots Road or (b) Greenwich power station reserve for London Underground were called upon on 24 November; and whether either failed.

Mr. Norris: I understand from London Underground that there was no failure of the basic power supply system from the two generating stations. I am informed that the incident on 24 November was caused by the malfunctioning of equipment designed to protect the high-voltage system from thermal danger in the event of a fault.

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the lines affected and estimate the number of train services delayed as a consequence of the power failure on the London Underground on 24 November.

Mr. Norris: The latest information from London Underground on lines and train services affected as a consequence of the power failure on 24 November is as follows:

Central Line
08:00—16:15. No service east of Marble Arch; 80 per cent. of services affected.

Circle and Hammersmith and City Lines
08:00—13:30. No service between Edgeware Road and Moorgate; 50 per cent. of services affected.

District Line
07:45—13:30. No service between Embankment and Barking; 20 per cent. of services affected.

East London Line
08:00—11:00. No service.

Metropolitan Line
08:00—13:30. No service between Baker Street and Moorgate; 10 per cent. of services affected.

At 17:33, following restoration of eastern Central line services there was a further power failure affecting both the Central and the District lines. Twenty per cent. of District line services were affected and 80 per cent. of Central line services. Normal service was not resumed on the Central line until the morning of 30 November. Between 25 and 29 November the Central line was able to achieve an average of 38 per cent. of its normal scheduled mileage.

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what information he has about the age and state of repair of the cable used to transmit power to the London underground; and what advice he has received about the likelihood of any future repetition of the power failure which occurred on the underground on 24 November.

Mr. Norris: I have asked London Transport for a full report on the cause of the power failure on 24 November. Until I have received that report, it would be inappropriate for me to comment.

Maritime Safety

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received regarding a draft resolution on the application of the competition rules to maritime transport proposed by the President of the Council of Ministers; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. MacGregor: I received representations on the proposed draft resolution on competition and maritime transport both from individual United Kingdom shippers and from organisations representing shippers and shipowners; those representations were carefully considered. The Council of Ministers meeting on 29 November decided not to proceed with the resolution.

Railtrack

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he last met the management of Railtrack to discuss levels of investment need in track and infrastructure in the west coast main line.

Mr. Freeman: I last met the chairman of Railtrack yesterday when it was announced that the modernisation of the west coast main line will be taken forward as a privately managed and financed investment as part of the private finance initiative.

Nuclear Waste

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what assessment he has made of the transport implications of the United Kingdom Government's abstention on the vote for a permanent world-wide ban on nuclear waste dumping at sea at the London convention meeting in November; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norris: The United Kingdom is currently considering what declarations may need to be made to the International Maritime Organisation in respect of the resolution prohibiting the sea disposal of radioactive waste. The transport of radioactive materials, including radioactive waste, is a separate issue, subject to stringent international safety standards.

West Coast Main Line

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he last met the management of the west coast main line to discuss issues relating to investment.

Mr. Freeman: I last met the director of the west coast main line at the end of October.

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received regarding investment in the west coast main line during the last year; and if he can give a breakdown as to the sources of such representations.

Mr. Freeman: I have received a large number of representations from hon. Members, local authorities and others on the need to modernise the west coast main line.

The Government announced on 30 November that the modernisation of the west coast main line will be taken forward as a privately managed and financed investment as part of the private finance initiative.

Biodiversity

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make it his policy to ensure that the Government's biodiversity action plan will include an objective to avoid the loss of important biodiversity sites to transport developments.

Mr. Norris: The Government will consider the implications for biodiversity when formulating and reviewing transport policies and will ensure that biodiversity objectives are fully taken into account in the assessment of new transport infrastructure.

We have a long-standing policy of keeping transport infrastructure away from protected areas such as sites of special scientific interest, wherever possible.

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if the biodiversity action plan will allow for the re-routing of ships to avoid marine areas of special interest for wildlife.

Mr. Norris: The Government have already agreed with the International Maritime Organisation a number of routing measures to reduce the risk of oil pollution around the United Kingdom coast.

An amended "Area to be Avoided" off the Shetland islands and new "Areas to be Avoided" off Orkney and around Fair Isle came into force on 28 November. Specific recommendations, most of which include prescribed routes, also came into force covering the Pentland firth, the Isles of Scilly, the Minch, the North channel, off Smalls and Grassholme channel, the Needles channel, the English channel and Dover strait and the Firth of Forth.

The European Community is currently identifying sensitive areas which are at high risk from maritime traffic and further measures may be proposed by the Commission to protect these areas.

Government Car Service

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the annual cost to the Department of the car service for Ministers; and how many vehicles are involved.

Mr. MacGregor: The annual cost to the Department of the car service for Ministers is £286,000 for the financial year 1993-94. Five vehicles are involved.

Rail Privatisation

Mr. Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport who will be responsible for (a) setting targets and (b) paying compensation for non-fulfilment, in terms of the passengers charter, in the event of rail privatisation.

Mr. Freeman [holding answer 1 December 1993]: Each rail franchise agreement will set out the operating standards which franchisees will have to deliver and the incentives and penalties which will apply if performance exceeds or falls short of those standards. The setting of standards and the related incentive and penalty arrangements will be the responsibility of the franchising director acting within guidelines laid down by my right hon. Friend.

M11

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what proposals he has to provide a motorway service station on the M11; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Key: The Department has secured planning clearance for a motorway service area at Birchanger adjacent to junction 8 of the M11 and has appointed Forte Welcome Break to construct it. Building work is now under way and the service area is due to open early in 1995.

Kingston upon Hull City Transport

Mr. Prescott: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement about the ownership of Kingston upon Hull City Transport.

Mr. Leigh: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement about the future of Kingston upon Hull City Transport Ltd.

Mr. Freeman: The Secretary of State has given formal consent to the sale of Kingston-upon-Hull City Transport Ltd, the bus company owned by the Hull city council, to Cleveland Transit Ltd. The new owners are to offer a 49 per cent. shareholding in the company to the employees.

Change of ownership takes place under the terms of section 75(3) of the Transport Act 1985, which allows authorities to sell their public transport companies with the consent of the Secretary of State.

I wish the company success in the private sector.

Advertising

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how much his Department spends annually on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising and (c) press advertising; and what were the corresponding figures for 1985 and 1979.

Mr. Norris: Figures are £,000s

	1993-94	1992-93	1985-86	1979-80
(a) TV	[1]5,155	5,467	70	4,141
(b) Radio	—	566	858	62
(c) Press	[1]15	131	834	105

Motorway Charging

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement about the Government's plans for taking forward motorway charging.

Mr. Macgregor: The Chancellor of the Exchequer said in his Budget speech that I would shortly be making a statement about motorway charging in the light of responses to the Green Paper, "Paying For Better Motorways", which I published last May with the Secretaries of State for Scotland and for Wales. The Green Paper considered how the introduction of direct charging for the use of our most important inter-urban roads could provide another source of finance to expand the network more quickly; and how it could help to ensure that we make more efficient use of the network.

Our aim was to stimulate an informed, wide-ranging debate. By far the most striking feature of the responses was the widespread acknowledgement among bodies representing industry and road users of the potential benefits of direct charging. An important effect of charging would be to provide another source of finance for improving the motorway network, so avoiding the congestion that will otherwise come with economic growth and increasing traffic. The motorway network carries 15 per cent. of all road traffic and 30 per cent. of heavy goods vehicle traffic. An effective network is an important contributor to our continued economic prosperity.

As many respondents recognised, motorway charging could have other important advantages. It would provide the key to increasing private sector investment in the operation and expansion of the motorway network. It would make more efficient use of the network, for example by the use of pricing structures designed to spread peak period congestion. It would put the charges on those who actually use motorways rather than the near-50 per cent. of road users who rarely or never travel on the network. And it would improve the competitive position of rail and other forms of public transport for which users are already charged directly.

The Green Paper described three options for direct charging. The first was conventional tolling with toll plazas and booths of the sort found on estuarial crossings in this country and on motorways in a number of other countries. The Green Paper said that this option should be ruled out for existing motorways because of the land that would be required and the traffic delays which conventional tolling would itself cause. There was almost unanimous agreement with that decision.

The second option, suggested as a possible interim measure, was charging by means of a permit system of the sort currently used in Switzerland. The Government have decided that the benefits of such permits would not be sufficient to justify the likely costs of introducing them as an interim measure. We shall not therefore pursue this option.

The third option discussed in the Green Paper was fully electronic tolling, where vehicles using the motorway network would carry an electronic tag which would react to signals as the vehicles passed roadside beacons. Vehicles would not have to stop. The toll would be worked out automatically and would either be charged to the road user's account or deducted from a pre-paid smart card on the vehicle. It is clear from responses to the Green Paper that this is widely seen as the best way of introducing motorway charging in this country.

The technology for electronic tolling on the scale necessary for the British motorway network needs further development. The electronic tolling systems currently operating or being tested in the United States and in Europe would not fully meet the requirements here. In the light of the responses to the Green Paper, we have decided to launch immediately a major programme of research, development and trials to identify the capabilities of the existing technology and to draw up a specification for a motorway charging system. The first step will be to invite industry to demonstrate available technology. We shall then assess in detail the most promising systems, with trials on a specific stretch of motorway. On the basis of the many discussions I have had with manufacturers and organisations involved in electronic road charging here and abroad, I am convinced that there is a great deal of work being undertaken internationally, and it would be feasible technologically to install motorway charging here within about five years.

The assessment of the available technology and systems will provide the basis on which to decide when to go ahead with motorway charging and at an appropriate time bring forward the necessary legislation for Parliament to consider.

The Green Paper also invited views on the best ways of involving private finance in the operation and expansion of the motorway network. We announced a year ago that, as a possible transitional step to motorway charging, the private sector might be invited to bid for contracts under which they would design, build, finance and operate roads for which they would receive payment from Government in relation to the use of those roads. There is strong support for DBFO contracts from the construction industry and the City. Accordingly, we shall enter into early discussions with the construction industry and others to identify a list of potential DBFO schemes which could provide for substantial transfer of risk to the private sector. Our aim would be to let DBFO contracts on schemes which have already been taken through public inquiry. I therefore hope that the first contracts could be let and work started within 18 months.

The Green Paper made it clear that this was not the only option for increasing the role of private finance in the provision of roads. We have decided that the DBFO approach offers the best way forward for the present, whilst we develop for the future more extensive use of private finance and expertise.

I shall be appointing as soon as possible financial advisers to assist in preparing DBFO contracts and to work up further private finance options for the future.

Concerns were expressed in the responses to the Green Paper about the possible side-effect of charging on diversion of vehicles from motorways to other roads. I recognise that concern and devoted a whole chapter of the Green Paper to this question. Charging across the network at levels well below those used in other countries—as was proposed in the Green Paper—is unlikely to cause much diversion, and the Government are very conscious of the need to avoid this. It also has to be taken into account that, without improvement of the motorways, congestion on them will grow, and such congestion would itself cause diversion on to alternative routes. So doing nothing is not a realistic option.

Many respondents indicated that their support for charging was dependent on the resources being used to fund additional road capacity. The Green Paper gave two important assurances. First, that it would be the Government's intention to ensure that the revenue and expenditure on roads subject to charges would be transparent, and that the proceeds of charges would be applied only to the construction and operation of the charged network. Secondly, that the Government would take into account the relationship between the charges and existing motoring taxes in setting their respective levels. The Government reaffirm these assurances.

Many issues, such as the precise definition of the network to be charged and the level of charges require further exploration, which we shall undertake in parallel with the technology trial. Until these detailed decisions are taken, there is no case for amending our national road traffic forecasts and our traffic forecasting methodology to take account of the contingent effect of tolling, any more than there is for anticipating the possible introduction of city congestion charging.

M20 (Services)

Sir Keith Speed: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what motorway service facilities open 24 hours a day will be available on the M20 motorway in time for the opening of the channel tunnel to passenger traffic.

Mr. Key: Planning consent has been granted for motorway service areas—MSAs—on the M20 at Hollingbourne and Westenhanger. Neither is expected to open by May 1994. On completion, both will be required to guarantee 24-hour access, fuel availability, free parking and toilet facilities.

ENVIRONMENT

Gulf War

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many scientists from his Department participated in the study by the United Nations Environment Programme, document UNEP/GC.17/NF.9 into the long-term environmental effects of the Gulf war; and if he will arrange for a copy of the study to be put in the Library.

Mr. Yeo: The document was prepared by the United Nations Enviroment Programme—UNEP; scientists in the Department were not involved in its preparation. As well as summarising the latest information on the effects of the conflict, the document refers to studies by 12 United Nations agencies to which the United Kingdom contributed. A copy of the document is being placed in the Library of the House.

Special Needs Housing

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make it his policy to employ a special needs adviser with a specific remit of developing United Kingdom-wide standard for wheelchair housing.

Sir George Young: The Government recognise the desirability of providing accessible housing for disabled people. However, the development of a national standard for wheelchair housing is more appropriate to the work of the British Standards Institution than that of a special needs adviser within my Department. There is a British standard, BS5619, "Design of housing for the convenience of disabled people". The revision of this standard, which does not currently address the special needs of wheelchair users, is being considered and my Department would be willing to play a full part, alongside organisations which provide housing for special needs, in discussions on incorporating improved provisions for wheelchair users in any such revision.

Housing

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what assessment he has made of the impact of cutting the Housing Corporation's approved development programme by £300 million on the total number of housing association homes produced for 1994-95.

Sir George Young: Following the changes to Housing Corporation expenditure in 1994-95 announced in the Budget, we estimate that 53,000 new homes will be provided with Housing Corporation funding in 1994-95.

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his Department's estimate of the number of homes which will be produced in (a) 1993-94, (b) 1994-95 and (c) 1995-96 by maintaining the Housing Corporation's approved development programme at its current level.

Sir George Young: Under this year's approved development programme — ADP — the Housing Corporation estimated in January that the number of homes produced would be 54,500 in 1993-94, 49,400 in 1994-95, and 50,100 in 1995-96. Despite the changes in Housing Corporation expenditure made in the Budget, it still expects to achieve 154,000 new homes over this period. No estimate has been made of the number of new homes which would have been provided had the ADP been held at its current level.

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will publish his Department's latest estimate of the number of housing association homes which will be produced in 1994-95.

Sir George Young: Following the expenditure plans announced in the Budget we estimate that the Housing Corporation's capital programme will provide for some 53,000 new homes in 1994-95.

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his estimate of the total number of new housing association units which will be produced in 1994-95 if the Housing Corporation's approved development programme is reduced by (a) £300 million, (b) £400 million and (c) £500 million.

Sir George Young: Following the Budget announcement that the Housing Corporation's capital expenditure programme has been reduced by some £300 million in 1994-95, we estimate that this will nevertheless provide for some 53,000 housing association homes in 1994-95. No estimate has been made of the effect that the greater reductions identified would have had on total units produced. Any such figure would depend not only on the overall size of the approved development programme, but on the likely balance between sub-programmes.

Water Quality

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, how many laboratories in the north-west exist for testing the quality of water.

Mr. Yeo: North West Water currently has eight laboratories for testing drinking water supplies or waste water. The National Rivers Authority has one chemical and three biological laboratories in the north-west. Both North West Water and the NRA are in the process of rationalising their laboratory facilities.

Biodiversity Convention

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has for the ratification of the biodiversity convention by the United Kingdom; whether he intends to qualify the act of ratification in any way; whether he intends to lodge an interpretative declaration alongside the United Kingdom's signature; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Yeo: It remains our intention to ratify the convention on biological diversity given satisfactory progress towards securing safeguards regarding our concerns on the financial provisions of the convention. We intend to reaffirm on ratification the interpretative statements we made on signature.

Sites of Special Scientific Interest.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what was the total cost of payments to landowners in respect of sites of special scientific interest; how many landowners received such grants in each of the last 10 years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Yeo: Details of the cost of management agreements entered into with landowners in such circumstances and of grants paid in respect of SSSIs are published in the annual reports of English Nature and of the former Nature Conservancy Council, copies of which are in the Library of the House.

Community Care Homes

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what plans he has to undertake an inter-departmental review of the funding of community care homes managed by housing associations to ensure their viability, prior to reinstating certification 10 and the consequential withdrawal of the housing revenue funding provided via the Housing Corporation from those individuals sponsored by social services departments under the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990.

Sir George Young: My Department is consulting other Government Departments before a decision is taken on the arrangements for the Housing Corporation's revenue funding of housing association special needs schemes beyond the current financial year.

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what figures are available to show the number of bed spaces which will be lost if proposals to withdraw funding from registered care homes managed by housing associations providing community care schemes under sponsorship arrangements are carried out.

Sir George Young: Revenue grants paid by the Housing Corporation are just one element in the income stream of housing associations which run schemes for clients with special needs. It is not possible, therefore, to quantify the effects of any changes in the level of that particular contribution in terms of the number of bed-spaces that associations are able to make available. Representations have been made to my Department about the effect which any reductions in the corporation's revenue support might have on individual schemes and those representations will be taken into account before a decision is taken on the arrangements for that support beyond the current financial year.

Defective Housing

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment which houses, designated as defective under defective housing legislation, are now capable of having those defects rectified; which houses are awaiting a system of treatment to be discovered; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: Under part XVI of the Housing Act 1985 eligible owners of all 24 designated house types can have their homes reinstated by substantial demolition and reconstruction if the local authority determines this is a practicable and cost effective solution. Repair schemes meeting the requirements of the legislation are available for all designated house types except Boswell, Dyke, Stonecrete, Underdown, and Waller.

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the types of houses currently designated under defective housing legislation.

Sir George Young: The following 24 types of dwellings have been designated defective under part XVI of the Housing Act 1985:

Airey
Boot
Boswell
Cornish Unit
Dorran
Dyke
Gregory
Myton
Newland
Orlit
Parkinson
Reema Hollow Panel
Schindler and Hawksley SGS
Smith
Stent
Stonecrete
Tarran
Underdown
Unity and Butterley
Waller
Wates

Sustainable Development

Mr. Knapman: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when the Government will publish their strategy for sustainable development.

Mr. Gummer: We have almost completed our preparation of a sustainable development strategy for the United Kingdom and now propose to publish it after the House returns in January. We will publish the United Kingdom's climate change programme, biodiversity action plan and forestry programme at the same time.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Brazier: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will explain the basis of his calculations of the distributable amount of non-domestic rates for 1994-95.

Mr. Curry: As my right hon. Friend announced in his reply to the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, South-West (Sir A. Grant) on 30 November 1993, at column 496, the distributable amount of non-domestic rates for 1994-95 will be £10,685 million. This is based on a non-domestic rate multiplier of 0·423 and includes an allowance of £464 million for an Exchequer payment to the non-domestic rates pool to compensate for the shortfall which would otherwise occur as a result of the Non-Domestic Rating Acts 1992 and 1993. The basis of the calculation is set out in the table:

Calculation of distributable amount 1994-95

	£ million
1. Income from Local Lists in 1994-95
Total Local List RV × multiplier (£29,745×0·423)	12,582
(i) Reliefs
(a) Less transitional decrease	(487)
(b) Less reliefs on (i) empty properties	(1,280)
(ii) partially empty properties	(18)
(c) Less reliefs to charities	(353)
(d) Less discretionary reliefs	(19)
Net Yield	10,425
(ii) Collection Costs/Reductions to Contributions
(a) Less costs of collection	(70)
(b) Less losses on collection	(220)
(c) Less offset for City of London	(8)
Contribution in respect of year	10,147
(iii) Adjustments and Additions
(a) Less Net Repayments and interest	(670)
(b) Less outturn adjustments in respect of prior years	(875)
Net Local Contribution	8,602
2. Income from Central List in 1994-95
Total Central List RV×multiplier (and after transition)=(2,672m×0·423)	1,130
3. Income from Crown Contributions in Aid in 1994-95
(a) Add Net Crown Yield (after transition)	463
(b) Less relief	(7)
(c) Add Metropolitan Police contribution	33
Net Crown yield	489
Total NDR Yield (1+2+3)	10,221
4. Exchequer Contributions
(a) Add income foregone in 1993-94 due to revised transitional arrangements	37
(b) Add income foregone in 1994-95	427
Total contribution	464
Total NNDR pool payments (1+2+3+4)	10,685
Total NNDR Distributable amount for 1994-95:	10,685

Notes:

1. Item 1: the estimated total local list rateable value (RV) represents the average value of non-domestic hereditaments on local rating lists, taking into account the effect of appeals decided during 1994-95.
2. Item 1(i)(a): the adjustment includes the estimated amount of rates that will not be recouped locally due to the revised transitional arrangements under the provisions of the Non-Domestic Rating Acts 1992 and 1993.
3. Item 1(i)(b): adjustments based on estimated mandatory reliefs for empty property in 1994-95 and earlier years not taken into account in the calculation of the distributable amount for 1993-94.
4. Item 1(i)(d): discretionary relief granted to charities, non-profit making organisations and for other reasons.
5. Item 1(ii)(a): the allowance for the costs incurred by local authorities in collecting non-domestic rates from ratepayers.
6. Item 1(ii)(c): a preliminary estimate of the reduction in the amount which the City of London will not be required to pay into the non-domestic rating pool on account of the local rate in the City. It is the amount which will be retained by the authority to meet its own expenditure.
7. Item 1(iii)(a): net adjustments in respect of appeals and other amendments to the rating list affecting liability for previous year's rates settled in 1994-95.
8. Item 1(iii)(b): Outturn adjustment based on outturn for 1992-93 and estimates for 1993-94. Much of the adjustments relate to reduced yield as a result of the number of appeals expected to be decided during 1993-94.
9. Item 2: the rateable value of non-domestic hereditaments on the central rating list after adjustments for appeals and adjustments in respect of previous years.
10. Item 4(a) and (b): the contribution from central government to offset the amount of the Secretary of State's estimate of income foregone arising from the provisions of the Non-Domestic Rating Acts 1992 and 1993. The amount in respect of 1993-94 takes into account the contribution which was made in the distributable amount for that financial year.

Local Government Finance

Sir David Knox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what percentages of (a) local authority and (b) housing association tenants were receiving rate rebates or community charge benefit in each year since 1979-80.

Mr. Burt: I have been asked to reply.

Complete information on the numbers of local authority tenancies receiving rate rebate was not collected prior to 1988-89. The available information is as follows:

Year	Percentage
1988-89	56
1989-90	56

Note: Figure for 1988-89: England, Wales and Scotland

Sources: Caseload figures taken from the Housing Benefit Management Information System and local authority tenancies in "Housing and Construction Statistics".

Comparable information concerning housing association tenancies is not avaialble.

From 1989 in Scotland, and 1990 in England and Wales, domestic rates were replaced by the community charge. As community charge was a personal charge it would not be appropriate to analyse community charge benefit recipients by tenure type.

Housing Benefit

Sir David Knox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what percentages of (a) local authority and (b) housing association tenants were receiving housing benefit in each year since 1979-80.

Mr. Burt: I have been asked to reply.

The percentages, which should be used as a general guide only, of local authority tenancies in receipt of housing benefit rent rebates are as follows:

Year	Percentage
1979-80	18
1980-81	20
1981-82	25
1982-83	49
1983-84	62
1984-85	63
1985-86	64
1986-87	65
1987-88	65
1988-89	58

Year	Percentage
1989-90	57
1990-91	58
1991-92	60
1992-93	64

Comparable information concerning housing associations tenancies is not available, having been collected only from 1992.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Unemployment

10. Mr. Mark Robinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the level of unemployment in the Province; and if he will make a statement.

13. Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the current level of unemployment.

22. Mr. Bates: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the level of unemployment in Northern Ireland; and if he will make a statement.

28. Dr. Liam Fox: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the current level of unemployment; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: At 14 October there were 102,842 unemployed claimants in Northern Ireland, representing a decrease of 3,594 over the year.

The Union

11. Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is Her Majesty's Government's policy on the future of the Union.

Sir Patrick Mayhew: The Government's policy is to uphold the democratically expressed wishes of the people of Northern Ireland. Northern Ireland is part of the United Kingdom; this is recognised in national and international law. There will be no change to that position unless or until that is the wish of a majority of the people of Northern Ireland.

Stormont

12. Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the annual cost of maintaining the Stormont building.

Mr. Atkins: The cost of maintaining the Stormont building in 1992-93 was £225,000.

Terrorism

14. Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland with which political parties in Northern Ireland he has discussed a policy of opposing terrorist violence.

Sir Patrick Mayhew: My colleagues and I regularly meet representatives of the Northern Ireland constitutional parties to discuss a wide range of issues, including the Government's security policy. The first priority of that policy is the eradication of terrorism, from wherever it originates.

Peace Talks

15. Mr. Hain: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement about progress towards peace in Northern Ireland.

16. Dr. Wright: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the progress of the peace initiative.

Sir Patrick Mayhew: The Government's objective for Northern Ireland is peace, properly attained. All the Government's policies have this objective. The people who can deliver an end to violence are the paramilitaries and they should do so immediately. But enduring peace will be assisted by a political settlement, which we continue to seek with the constitutional parties and, where appropriate, the Irish Government.

21. Mr. Charles Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what prospects he sees for further peace talks in the Province; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Patrick Mayhew: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave the hon. Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. Burden) earlier today.

18. Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on his dialogue with the constitutional parties of Northern Ireland.

Sir Patrick Mayhew: I refer my hon. Friend to the answer I gave the hon. Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. Burden) earlier today.

Income Support

17. Mr. Wicks: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what number and percentage of families with children receive income support and family credit.

Mr. Ancram: It is estimated that at 29 May 1992, 77,725 families were receiving these benefits, representing 35 per cent. of all families receiving child benefit.

Irish Government (Talks)

19. Mr. Soley: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what further discussions he has had with the Irish Government on the future of Northern Ireland.

Sir Patrick Mayhew: I most recently met Mr. Dick Spring, the Irish Foreign Minister and Tanaiste, at the meeting of the Anglo-Irish conference on 3 November. We noted the support of the Prime Minister and Taoiseach for the objectives of the political talks process and expressed our determination to pursue those objectives within the framework of the statement of 26 March 1991.

Employment Law

20. Mr. Mackinlay: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when he last met representatives of the Irish trade unions and the Trades Union Congress to discuss Northern Ireland's employment law, and industrial and economic prospects.

Mr. Atkins: I met representatives of the Northern Ireland Committee of Trade Unions to discuss employment and economic issues on 13 May. There are no plans at present for any further meeting but any such request would be accorded favourable consideration.

Security Forces

23. Lady Olga Maitland: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps he is taking to ensure that the security forces in the Province have equipment appropriate to their needs.

Sir John Wheeler: The equipment requirements of the police and army are kept under constant review. The Government are fully committed to providing the security forces with the resources they need to defeat terrorism.

Investment

24. Mr. John Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assessment he has made for the prospects for increased industrial and commercial investments in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Atkins: The Government do not carry out formal assessments of the prospects for increased industrial and commercial investment in Northern Ireland. However, the most recent independent surveys of business prospects show that both business confidence and companies' investment intentions are rising. This suggests that recovery from the recession is well underway in Northern Ireland and that investment prospects are good.

Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the level of inward investment; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: So far this year the Industrial Development Board has secured four new inward investment projects involving a total investment of approximately £163 million and I am confident that there will be further announcements during the remainder of the financial year.

Northern Ireland (Consultation)

25. Mr. Dowd: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans he has to include the people living on the mainland of the United Kingdom in any consultation over the status of Northern Ireland.

Sir Patrick Mayhew: The status of each of the constituent parts of the United Kingdom is a matter for Parliament and, to that extent, the people living on the mainland of the United Kingdom already participate in consultation over the status of Northern Ireland. The Government's policy is that the status of Northern Ireland should be determined in accordance with the democratic wishes of its own people, and I have no plans to broaden the consultation.

Sinn Fein

27. Mr. Skinner: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what recent discussions he or his officials have had with Sinn Fein.

Sir Patrick Mayhew: There have been no negotiations with Sinn Fein on political matters at either ministerial or official level. As I told the House on Monday, there has been an exchange of documents through a channel of communication since February—and these are in the Library of the House. It is also a matter of record that Ministers and officials have met council delegations, which from time to time have included Sinn Fein members, to discuss constituency matters.

Cardiac Surgery

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what is the current average time between referral to a cardiac surgeon in Northern Ireland and the first appointment with that surgeon;

(2) what was the longest interval in Northern Ireland for waiting time between referral to a cardiac surgeon and the first appointment with that surgeon for the most recent available period.

Mr. Ancram: During the quarter ending September 1993, the medium waiting time between the date of referral to a cardiac surgeon and first appointment was 0·3 months.

Records for the same quarter indicate that the longest a patient waited between referral and first appointment with a cardiac surgeon was 21 months and 20 days. The unusual delay in this case appears to have arisen as a result of an administrative oversight. The Royal Victoria hospital is undertaking a validation of the records of those waiting for appointment with a cardiac surgeon which should ensure that similar oversights do not occur in future.

Community Care

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what steps have been taken towards the implementation of the Government's community care policy in the Eastern and Southern health and social services boards.

Mr. Ancram: The Eastern and South health and social services boards, in common with the other two boards in Northern Ireland, have in place the following arrangements for the implementation of the community care reforms from April 1993:

care management and assessment procedures;
arrangements for purchasing community care services;
procedures for financial assessment, charge collection, and payment of providers; arrangements for the dissemination, to the public and to user, carer and professional interests, of information on procedures and services; and procedures for dialogue with independent sector providers.

In addition, since 1991, community care complaints procedures have been functional in each board area, and registration and inspection units have been set up to monitor the standards and operation of all residential and nursing homes.

All these arrangements are being refined and developed in the light of experience of the operation of the new community care procedures.

Banagher Glen

Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is his estimate of the average number of vehicles which presently use the road in Banagher glen each day; what is his estimate of the average number which will use it when the glen is reopened to the public; and what are the present and projected figures of (a) winter and (b) summer months and for (i) weekdays and (ii) weekends.

Mr. Atkins: The number of vehicles which presently use the road in Banagher glen is estimated at 14 per weekday. No estimate is available for weekends. When the road up to the nature reserve is opened to the public, it is estimated that at peak times the average number of vehicles using it will be 45 per weekday. Estimates for other times have not been made.

Ulster Painters

Mr. Trimble: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what discussions he has had with the Arts Council for Northern Ireland concerning its decision for the sale in London of the work of leading Ulster painters.

Mr. Ancram: None.

Youth Training

Dr. Hendron: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (1) what is the policy of the Northern Ireland Training and Employment Agency regarding the future of community training organisations and the provision of youth training in Northern Ireland;

(2) what is the strategy for the provision of youth training in (a) north Belfast, (b) south Belfast, (c) east Belfast and (d) Lagan valley;

(3) how many young people are currently employed in community workshops; and if he will make a statement on the future of the workshops;

(4) what is the strategy for the provision of youth training in west Belfast;

(5) what plans he has to change the policy of block funding for community training organisations;

(6) what plans he has to assist young people leaving school without any recognised academic qualification.

Mr. Atkins: Responsibility for the subject in question has been delegated to the Training and Employment Agency under its chief executive, Mr. Julian Crozier. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from J. S. Crozier to Dr. J. Hendron, dated 1 December 1993:

Parliamentary Questions Nos. 1377 to 1382: 3 December 1993

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland has asked me to reply to your questions about:—

(a) what is the policy of the Training and Employment Agency regarding the future of Community Training Organisations and the provision of Youth Training in Northern Ireland;

(b) how many young people are currently employed in Community Workshops; and if he will make a statement on the future of workshops;

(c) what plans he has to change the policy of blockfunding for Community Training Organisations;

(d) what is the strategy for the provision of youth training in West Belfast;

(e) what is the strategy for the provision of youth training in North, South, East Belfast and Lagan Valley; and

(f) what plans he has to assist young people leaving school without any recognised academic qualifications.

The responses to your questions are:—

(a) The Agency would wish to maintain a community sector element within the Youth Training Programme (YTP) as part of the range of provision which is available to young people. As you are aware some workshops are facing financial difficulties caused mainly by fewer young people in the population more of whom are staying on at school. The introduction of a single school leaving date has exacerbated the difficulties. Given this background some community-based training organisations are finding it difficult to remain viable given the diminishing number of trainees and some rationalisation is inevitable; preferably through mergers although some closures may be difficult to avoid. The Agency has recently written to Workshop Chairmen proposing a package of assistance. Where mergers take place full redundancy costs will be paid by the Agency which will also meet the cost of consultancy help. Fifty per cent. of redundancy costs will be paid to workshops which choose to close.

As to youth training in NI the Agency remains committed to providing a Youth Training place for all 16 and 17 year olds who desire it. Arrangements will be made for all those young people affected by a rationalisation to be offered a training place with an alternative provider.

(b) Young people in Community Workshops are not employed by them but are in the Youth Training Programme. At the end of October 1993 there were 3,046 young people in training in Community Workshops. The future of workshops is dealt with in the preceding paragraphs.

(c) There are currently no plans to change the policy of blockfunding for community workshops. The present levels of blockfunding within YTP compare more than favourably with funding elsewhere in the United Kingdom and with that available within the education system in Northern Ireland. However the Agency is currently piloting a single, integrated scheme called Jobskills which may replace both YTP and the Job Training Programme (JTP) and which would have a different system of funding.

(d & e) The Agency's objective is to maintain a network of training organisations across all areas of the Province, including Belfast and Lagan Valley which will enable the Agency to continue to meet the Government guarantee of a training place for all 16 and 17 year olds who want one.

(f) Every school leaver aged 16 or 17 is guaranteed a training place within the Youth Training Programme (YTP). YTP offers a structured programme of training leading to a recognised vocational qualification to help participants compete for suitable jobs.

I hope that you find this information helpful.

Works of Art (Northern Ireland)

Mr. Trimble: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether public bodies holding works of art relating to Northern Ireland are required to consult the Ulster museum or the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland before disposing of such works outside Northern Ireland.

Mr. Ancram: No.

Hospitals, Downpatrick

Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what proposals he has to visit hospitals in Downpatrick to discuss reorganisation.

Mr. Ancram: My noble Friend Lord Arran visited Downe hospital and maternity unit last month. He recently received the Eastern health and social services board's strategy for general (acute) hospital services which includes proposals concerning both those facilities. He intends to take until the end of February to consider any views which hon. Members and health and personal social services interests wish to put to him before taking final decisions on the strategy.

Documents

Mr. Mates: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland whether he has any correction to make to the text of any document placed in the Library and the Vote Office at the time when he made his statement on 29 November.

Sir Patrick Mayhew: In rechecking the documentation some transcription and typing errors have come to light in the dossier of messages between the IRA and the Government which I placed in the Library and Vote Office on 29 November. I have placed in the Library and the Vote Office the corrected version of the dossier. A list of the necessary corrections appears at the beginning of the corrected versions of the dossier.

These errors do not change the sense of the messages, but nonetheless they should be corrected. Parliament must have fully authentic documents. The errors arose from the speed with which the dossier had to be completed and checked in Northern Ireland on Sunday, after the decision that day that it should be published in Parliament the following day. The relevant corrections also apply to the quotations from the documents in my statement on 29 November.

The corrections cast no doubt whatsoever upon the authenticity of the original message of 22 February from the IRA leadership, which I read out in my statement and which said

"The conflict is over but we need your advice on how to bring it to a close".

As I said in my statement, this came from Martin McGuinness. Equally, the Government—notwithstanding allegations by Sinn Fein to the contrary—has no reason to doubt the authenticity of the message sent by the IRA leadership on 2 November, which I also read to the House together with the Government's reply of 5 November.

Nor does the need for corrections of the transcription errors in paragraph 3 of the nine paragraph note sent on 19 March carry any implication that it was the Government rather than the IRA leadership which was seeking advice. The advice referred to in that paragraph is the advice sought in the IRA message of 22 February. The speaking note accompanying the nine paragraph note, published in the dossier and first printed in the Observer, makes it entirely clear that the British message gives "substantive advice in response to the initial message", which is indeed the case.

Although they do not carry the implications claimed, I very much regret that those corrections need to be made. I naturally accept full ministerial responsibility for the inaccuracies.

The corrections have been notified to the House at the earliest opportunity. Copies of a letter to all Northern Ireland MPs and spokesmen, enclosing the list of corrections and the text, thus corrected, of the nine paragraph message from the British Government despatched on 19 March, were placed last night in the Library of the Vote Office.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Sheehy Inquiry

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) for what studies the Sheehy inquiry employed (a) Ernst and Young and (b) Towers Perrin; and what was the cost thereof;

(2) what budget limits were placed on the Sheehy inquiry;

(3) if he will list in respect of the visits by the secretary to the Sheehy inquiry, Miss Jenny Rumble, to (a) Australia, (b) New Zealand, (c) the United States of America, (i) the dates of departure and return to the United Kingdom, (ii) the airline and seat class funded and used, (iii) the dates and police forces visited, (iv) the subjects studied, (v) the travel cost, (vi) the subsistence costs and (vii) other costs;

(4) if he will list in respect of Mr. Caines's Sheehy inquiry trip to Australia, (a) the dates of departure and return to the United Kingdom, (b) the airline and seat class funded and used, (c) the dates and police forces visited, (d) the subjects studied, (e) the travel cost, (f) the subsistence costs and (g) other costs.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The inquiry into police responsibilities and rewards spent £580,000 in 1992-93. Financial provision for the inquiry is £459,000 for 1993-94. The management of expenditure within these sums was the responsibility of the inquiry. The use made by the inquiry of consultancies is described in paragraphs 2.5 and 2.8 of its report, a copy of which is in the Library.

Kickstart Clubs

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what contribution his Department has made to the kickstart programme of Legal and General; and if he will promote moves towards a national network of kickstart clubs, in an attempt to steer youngsters away from crime.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The Home Office is providing £500,000 this year to the core running costs of Crime Concern, the national crime prevention organisation which has established the kickstart youth activity clubs, with funding from Legal and General. Crime Concern was specifically set up by the Government to seek sponsorship from the private sector for crime prevention projects.

The kickstart scheme was launched nationally by Crime Concern on 14 May 1993. We fully support the work of Crime Concern in this area, and generally, to steer young people away from crime.

South Yorkshire

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to visit south Yorkshire; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Howard: I have no plans to visit south Yorkshire at present.

Stolen Property

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the total value of property recorded by police as stolen in 1991; what percentage of this was not recovered; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: The total value of property stolen recorded by the police in England and Wales in 1991 was £3·6 billion, of which 66 per cent. was not recovered.

Crime

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many crimes were recorded in Britain in 1992; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: There were 5,591,717 notifiable offences recorded by the police in England and Wales in 1992. The figures for Scotland are a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland.

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how much was spent in 1991-92 (a) in the criminal justice system on crime and (b) by the Home Office to prevent crime; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Charles Wardle: Public expenditure on the criminal justice system in England and Wales in 1991-92 was £8·7 billion. Of that sum, £5·4 billion was expenditure on the police, one of whose key functions is crime prevention. Estimated expenditure on all aspects of crime prevention was £167 million in that year, of which Home Office expenditure was £15·6 million.

Strip Searching

Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many female prisoners in Great Britain have been subjected to forcible strip searching since March 1992.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from D. Lewis to Mrs. Helen Jackson, dated 2 December 1993:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about the forcible strip-searching of women prisoners.

Prisons are not required to maintain statistics of the number of strip searches carried out.

Strip-searching is a routine security measure carried out under the provisions of Rule 39 of the Prisons Rules 1964. The action that would follow a refusal to be searched would depend on the circumstances but in some situations there might be no alternative to the use of force.

Prisoners

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department who decides whether a convicted prisoner is placed in an open or closed prison.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

letter from D. Lewis to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 2 December 1993;

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about who decides whether a convicted prisoner is placed in an open or closed prison.

Decisions about security category, including whether or not to place a prisoner in open conditions, are taken by the governor holding the prisoner except in the case of category A prisoners and transfer of life sentence prisoners to open conditions. Decisions about category A prisoners are made at Prison Service headquarters. Life sentence prisoners may be moved to open prisons as part of their pre-discharge preparation. The decision to make a recommendation for such a transfer is taken at Prison Service headquarters and then referred for decision to Ministers.

The criteria and procedures to be used in reaching decisions are set out in Circular Instructions 7/1988 and 2/1991, copies of which I recently sent to you and which are also available in the House of Commons Library.

Male Rape

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to make male rape a formal legal offence.

Mr. Maclean: Non-consensual buggery of a male is already an offence under section 12 of the Sexual Offences Act 1956, as qualified by the Sexual Offences Act 1967.

Car Crime

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to introduce fines for the victims of car crime.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The Government have no such plans.

While we shall continue to encourage car owners to take all reasonable security precautions, if their vehicles are stolen it must be the thieves who are held fully responsible for their crimes.

Visas

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list each country whose nationals will need a visa to enter the European Union under the proposals put forward on 24 November by the European Commission.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The European Commission has not yet published its proposals in respect of the list of countries whose nationals must be in possession of a visa when crossing the external borders of the member states. When it does so, they will be made available to Parliament in accordance with the normal scrutiny arrangements.

Mr. Tony Lundy

Mr. Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis giving the total cost of investigating allegations made against ex-Detective Superintendent Tony Lundy by both the Metropolitan police and the South Yorkshire police; and if he will make a statement giving the reasons for the time taken to complete the investigations.

Mr. Charles Wardle: These are matters for the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis.

Vandalism

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the reported number of cases of vandalism in each of the police divisions covering the South Yorkshire area in each of the last four years, and the current year to date.

Mr. Maclean: The available information by division relates to offences of arson and criminal damage and is published annually in the report of the chief constable of South Yorkshire. Copies of this publication are available in the Library.

James Bulger Murder

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the length of time the two boys sentenced for the murder of James Bulger will be detained.

Mr. Howard: I have not yet received the views of the judiciary on this case. When I do, each offender will be informed, as soon as is reasonably practicable, of the substance of the judicial recommendations. The boys, or those acting on their behalf, will then be given the opportunity to submit written representations before I decide the period to be served for retribution and deterrence. My decision will be conveyed to the two boys —or their representatives—and, if it differs from the period recommended by the judiciary, reasons will be given.

The arrangements for determining the period of custody which those convicted of murder are required to serve in order to satisfy the requirements of retribution and deterrence were set out in my replies of 27 July, Official Report, columns 863-65, and 4 November, Official Report, columns 376-78, to the hon. and learned Member for Burton (Sir I. Lawrence).

Bomb-proofing

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what has been the cost, by location, of bomb-proofing the Department's premises.

Mr. Howard: On security grounds, I do not propose to give this information.

Males (Convictions)

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what percentage of males have a conviction before the age of 35 years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: It is estimated from the offenders index that 35 per cent. of males[1] born in 1953 had a conviction for at least one offence on the "standard list"[2] by the age of 35. Further information is published in "Digest 2: Information on the Criminal Justice System in England and Wales", which is available in the Library.

[1] Estimates from the Home Office offenders index covering all convictions for "standard list" offences since 1963. Results from the 1953 birth cohort sample.

[2] Mainly indictable offences but includes some summary offences such as assault on a constable and cruelty to or neglect of children.

Custody

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his estimate of the total number of persons in custody in 1990, 1991 and 1992 who were (a) awaiting trial or (b) imprisoned in default of payment of fines.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from D. Lewis to Mr. David Nicholson, dated 2 December 1993:

Receptions of untried prisoners and fine defaulters

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about the total number of persons in custody in 1990, 1991 and 1992 who were (a) awaiting trial or (b) imprisoned in default of payment of a fine.

Information for 1990 and 1991 was published in the 1991 edition of "Prison statistics England and Wales" (Table 1.14 of the 1991 edition, Cm 2157) a copy of which is in the library. Information for 1992 is only currently available from 1 January to 31 August 1992. During this period 35,689 untried prisoners and 13,308 sentenced fine defaulters were received into Prison Service establishments in England and Wales.

Prison Statistics

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the number of hospital beds at each of the London prisons as of 22 November; and what was the number of prison inmates being held in each of these prison hospital wings on that date.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from D. Lewis to Mr. Tom Cox, dated 2 December 1993:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about the number of available hospital beds at each of the London prisons on 22 November and the number of occupied on that date. The information requested is as follows:

	Number of beds	Number of beds occupied
HMP Belmarsh	73	47
HMP Brixton	66	62
HMYOI Feltham	30	26
HMP Holloway	86	85
HMP Pentonville	26	18
HMP Wandsworth	39	36
HMP Wormwood Scrubs	51	48

Victim Support

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans the Government have to increase funding of (a) the victims support scheme in general and (b) Lewisham victim support scheme.

Mr. Maclean: Additional funding for Victim Support was included in the public expenditure plans presented to Parliament by my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer on 30 November. The Home Office grant to Victim Support in 1994-95 is being increased by 20 per cent. to just over £10 million. Two further annual increases of 8 per cent. are planned, taking projected funding for 1995-96 and 1996-97 to £10·8 million and £11·7 million respectively.

The allocation of the Home Office grant to local schemes and branches and the priorities which guide that allocation are matters for the Victim Support local funding panel, a sub-committee of Victim Support's national council.

Deaths (Fires)

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people in (a) south-east London and (b) in the London borough of Lewisham died as a result of a fire in a bed-sitter or multi-tenant flats in each year since 1980.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The information is not available centrally.

Public Houses

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his Department will carry out a review of licensing procedures in those cases where a lessee of a public house passes the lease and the licence to a holding company; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Charles Wardle: No.

Swansea Prison

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what changes are planned in prisoner numbers at Swansea prison over the next five years.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from D. Lewis to Mr. Alan Williams, dated 2 December 1993:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about whether any changes are planned in prisoner numbers at Swansea prison over the next five years.

The present certified normal accommodation of Swansea prison is 232 with an operational capacity of 285.

Current plans for Swansea include an extension to D Wing and the building of a new houseblock.

It is planned to close D Wing in March 1994 to enable work to commence on the redevelopment. Although there will be an initial loss of 78 operational capacity places, this is part of a wider plan to increase the overall operational capacity to 125. This work should be completed by June 1996.

Work should then commence on the building of a new houseblock, providing an additional 70 single cells by March 1998.

B Wing is programmed to close in December 1994 with a loss of 60 operational places.

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what representations he has received about the provision of modesty screening for Swansea prison; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from D. Lewis to Mr. Alan Williams, dated 2 December 1993:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about representations he received about the provision of modesty screening for Swansea prison.

Provision of 24 hour access to sanitation for prisoners at Swansea is part of the overall sanitation programme set out in the White Paper "Custody, Care and Justice". Given the high population and extensive refurbishment programme at Swansea, it was decided that simple sanitation would be the most appropriate system to install. This involves the installation of a toilet and washbasin in each two person cell, but without any modesty screening. Sixty cells, each accommodating two prisoners, have been converted to date. The bunk bed in the cell is positioned on the same side of the cell as the toilet.

No representations have been received about the lack of modesty screening. It is understood that prisoners are generally content with the arrangement.

Siemion Serafimowicz

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement of the status of Siemion Serafimowicz as a resident in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Charles Wardle: It is not our practice to make public information from immigration records relating to individuals.

Fraud Trials

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will reconsider his response to the recommendations of Lord Roskill about the handling of fraud trials.

Mr. Maclean: The majority of the recommendations made by the Fraud Trials Committee, chaired by Lord Roskill, were accepted by the Government and implemented in the Criminal Justice Act 1987.

The operation of that Act, and the handling of fraud trials generally, is kept under review. In particular, in June 1993, the Lord Chancellor's Department produced the interim report of the working group on long criminal trials, which examined ways of shortening and simplifying such trials, including fraud trials. The recommendations in that report are being considered alongside those made by the Royal Commission on criminal justice relating to the investigation, pre-trial arrangements and conduct of fraud trials. In addition, my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General announced a review of the Serious Fraud Office and the fraud investigation group of the Crown Prosecution Service on 18 October.

Sentences

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will seek to amend the Criminal Justice Act 1988 so that sentences in all cases can be referred to the Court of Appeal.

Mr. Maclean: The Government have already announced an intention to extend the scope of the Attorney-General's power to refer unduly lenient sentences to the Court of Appeal to incorporate the most serious sexual and violent offences that are triable either way. There are no plans to bring sentences in all cases within the scope of section 35 of the Criminal Justice Act 1988.

Refugees

Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (1) how many refugees have been admitted to Britain from former Yugoslavia over the past year;

(2) how many women from former Yugoslavia have been allowed into the United Kingdom as refugees (a) in their own right and (b) as dependants over the past year.

Mr. Charles Wardle: I have been asked to reply.

In the 12 months October 1992 to September 1993 inclusive around 4,500 nationals of the former Yugoslavia —excluding dependants—applied for asylum in the United Kingdom. The large majority of these applications are still under consideration and the applicants are being allowed to remain here in the meantime. Comprehensive data on the gender of these principal applicants are not yet available, but provisional data suggest that about 45 per cent. were female.

Reliable information on dependants of these applicants is not yet available.

In addition, we have announced that the United Kingdom is willing to accept 1,000 particularly vulnerable individuals—including ex-detainees—from Bosnia and other parts of the former Yugoslavia, together with their dependants, totalling perhaps 4,000 in all. As of 30 November 1993, around 450 particularly vulnerable individuals and 650 of their dependants have arrived since my initial announcement of these arrangements on 30 November 1992. Most dependants are wives and children. Also a small proportion of vulnerable individuals are women.

EMPLOYMENT

Social Affairs Council

Mr. Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment, pursuant to his answer of 24 November to the hon. Member for Chingford, (Mr. Duncan Smith), Official Report, column 72, what was the voting record of member states at the meeting of the European Community's Social Affairs Council held on 23 November; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: There were no formal votes at the Labour and Social Affairs Council on 23 November. However:

- on the draft directive on working time, the council reached final agreement with the United Kingdom abstaining;
- on the draft directive on young workers, the council agreed to a common position with Spain and Italy abstaining;
- on the draft directive on the protection of workers on board fishing vessels, the Council reached final agreement, with the United Kingdom and France abstaining; and
- a declaration to end the European Year of the Elderly and of solidarity between generations was agreed unanimously.

Workstart

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many long-term unemployed have taken up the workstart pilot scheme in Cornwall and Devon.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: In the period to 23 November, three long-term unemployed people had been placed in workstart supported employment. Originally Devon and Cornwall training and enterprise council, which is managing this pilot, used its own staff to identify suitable people from the target group for workstart jobs, but this has not worked well. There are difficulties in matching individuals to vacancies in an area as large as Devon and Cornwall.

Following a discussion with Employment Department officials, the TEC has now agreed to work more closely with the employment service's wider network of local offices. This should improve performance in matching individual unemployed people to specific vacancies, which will in future identify suitable clients and match them with vacancies.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many people living in (a) York travel-to-work area and (b) York parliamentary constituency who were registered unemployed at the most recent date for which data is available had been unemployed for (i) less than six months, (ii) between six and 12 months and (iii) more than 12 months.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The information requested is given in the following table:

Claimant Unemployment in York, by Duration (October 1993)

Duration of Unemployment	Travel-to-work area	Parliamentary Constituency
Up to 6 months	3,688	2,204
Over 6 and up to 12 months	1,351	808
Over 12 months	2,043	1,431

Note—Claimant unemployment figures by duration are available on a quarterly basis for the months of January, April, July and October and are not adjusted for seasonal influences.

Employment Service

Ms Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the outcome of interviews carried out by the Employment Service for (i) 1992-93 and (ii) 1993-94, showing the (a) number of adviser new claims taken, (b) number of administrative officers new claims taken, (c) total new claims not pursued, (d) first letters sent for main restart interview, (e) contact rate with restart interview client group, (f) main restart interviews carried out, (g) other interviews carried out, (h) caseload interviews carried out, (i) offers not made, (j) offers not accepted, (k) job placings, (l) EAS—business start-up—starts, (m) ET/TFW starts, (n) employment action starts, (o) other benefit starts, (p) sign offs as a direct result of client adviser action, (q) restart course starts, (r) jobplan workshop starts, (s) jobclub starts, (t) job interview guarantee starts, (u) job search seminar starts, (v) attended job referral service interviews and (w) job review workshop starts.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Responsibility for the subject of the question has been delegated to the Employment Service Agency under its chief executive. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from M. E. G. Fogden to Ms Clare Short, dated 2 December 1993:

As the Employment Service is an Executive Agency, the Secretary of State has asked me to write to you direct to respond to your Parliamentary Questions to him about the outcome of interviews carried out by the Employment Service for (i) 1992-93 and (ii) 1993-94, showing the (a) number of adviser new claims taken, (b) number of administrative officers new claims taken, (c) total new claims not pursued, (d) first letters sent for main Restart interview, (e) contact rate with Restart interview client group, (f) main Restart interviews, (g) other interviews, (h) caseload interviews, (i) offers not made, (j) offers not accepted, (k) job placings, (l) EAS (Business Start Up) starts, (m) ET/TFW starts, (n) Employment Action starts, (o) other benefit starts, (p) sign offs as a direct result of client adviser action, (q) Restart Course starts, (r) Jobplan Workshop starts, (s) Jobclub starts, (t) Job Interview Guarantee starts, (u) Job Search Seminar starts, (v) attended Job Referral Service interviews and (w) Job Review Workshops starts. This is something which falls within the responsibilities delegated to me as Chief Executive of the Agency.

It is important to recognise that these figures are only a partial indication of the effectiveness of advisory interviews. Equally important is the effect they have in causing people to leave the register earlier than they would otherwise have done.

The attached table contains the information you requested. During the 1992-93 operational year all the information you asked for was collected and is represented in column 1 of the table. The Employment Service has changed its performance monitoring at national level for 1993-94 and the information for this year cannot be given in exactly the same format as the previous year. Information for April 1993 to October 1993 is shown in column 2 of the table.

Notes at the foot of the table explain the differences in the information collected for each year.

I hope this is helpful.

As decided by the Administration Committee of the House of Commons, Chief Executive replies to written Parliamentary Questions will now be published in the Official Report. I will also place a copy of this letter in the Library of the House.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Grace and Favour Apartments

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how many grace and favour apartments there are in (a) St. James's palace, (b) Kensington palace and (c) Windsor castle; to whom they are awarded; and which members of the royal family have apartments at each palace.

Mr. Sproat: There are 22 grace and favour residences at St. James's palace, 37 at Kensington palace and 122 at Windsor castle and the home park. Grace and favour apartments are awarded to royal household staff for the better performance of their duties.

Members of the royal family have apartments or residences at each palace as follows:

Windsor Castle
- Her Majesty the Queen
- His Royal Highness the Duke of Edinburgh

Royal Lodge, Windsor
- Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth the Queen Mother

St. James's Palace (including Clarence House and York House)
- Her Majesty Queen Elizabeth the Queen Mother
- The Prince of Wales
- The Duke and Duchess of Kent
- Princess Alexandra

Kensington Palace
- The Princess of Wales
- Princess Margaret
- Princess Alice, Duchess of Gloucester
- The Duke and Duchess of Gloucester
- Prince and Princess Michael of Kent

Bomb-proofing

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage what has been the cost, by location, of bomb-proofing the Department's premises.

Mr. Sproat: On security grounds, I do not propose to give this information.

BBC Contracting

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage if he will establish a public inquiry into BBC contracting.

Mr. Brooke: No. I am satisfied that the management of the BBC is well seized of the need for effective financial controls in all its areas of activity, and is able and willing to investigate and rectify any irregularities which may come to light.

EC Cultural Affairs Council

Mr. Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage, pursuant to his answer of 24 November 1993 to the hon. Member for Gateshead, East (Ms Quin), Official Report, column 57, what was the voting record of member states at the meeting of the European Community's Cultural Affairs Council held on 5 November; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Brooke: At the Cultural Affairs Council on 5 November, decisions and conclusions were reached by consensus. No votes were taken.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Government Car Service

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is the annual cost to the Department of the car service for Ministers; and how many vehicles are involved.

Mr. Goodlad: Official transport for Ministers is provided by the Government car service at an annual cost in 1992-93 of £453,917.

Six vehicles are provided.

Manchester United Supporters

Mr. Alfred Morris: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations his Department received about the treatment by the Turkish police of supporters of Manchester United football club at the time of the club's recent European cup match in Turkey; what replies were given; what subsequent action was taken by Her Majesty's Government in regard to complaints of violence used by Turkish police officers against the club's supporters and some of its players; how many people from Manchester complained of maltreatment by Turkish police officers and how many of them were charged with an offence; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: My hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs first raised our concern over events surrounding the football match, particularly those leading to British fans being detained, with the Turkish ambassador on 8 November. Our ambassador in Ankara also pressed the Turkish authorities for an early report. We have now sent the Turkish ambassador detailed allegations of mistreatment of British fans and tourists and asked for the Turkish authorities' comments.

I am glad to say that the six fans who were detained were unconditionally released on 30 November and that the Turkish authorities are to hold a judicial inquiry into the events.

Western Sahara

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on when he expects a referendum will be held on the future of the western Sahara.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The United Nations Secretary-General states in his latest report dated 24 November that he hopes that the referendum will take place in mid-1994 subject to the co-operation of both parties.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of the extent to which the Government of Morocco are co-operating with United Nations attempts to hold a free and fair referendum in the western Sahara.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The United Nations Secretary-General's latest report makes no criticism of the co-operation he has received from either Morocco or the Polisario Front, but he has stressed that their continued co-operation is essential if the referendum is to be held next year.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations he has made to the Government of Morocco about the future government of the western Sahara.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We have used our contacts with both sides to this dispute to urge full co-operation with the United Nations Secretary-General in the implementation of the United Nations settlement plan.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what reports he has received from the United Nations Special Representative to the western Sahara.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The United Nations Secretary-General's Special Representative reports to Mr. Boutros Ghali. The Secretary-General's latest report was issued on 24 November.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has about the number of Moroccan troops in western Sahara.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We have no information on the precise numbers of Moroccan troops in the western Sahara.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has about recent settlement in western Sahara by Moroccans.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We have no reliable information about recent settlement in the western Sahara by Moroccans.

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what assessment he has made of whether United Nations troops in western Sahara have the necessary freedom to undertake their mission successfully.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The Secretary-General's latest report pays tribute to the military personnel of the United Nations mission for the referendum in the western Sahara —MINURSO—for the contribution they have made to the maintenance of the ceasefire in western Sahara. It contains no suggestion that they lack the necessary freedom to undertake their duties successfully.

European Community and Union

Mr. Cash: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Her Majesty's Government's policy on the use of the terms (a) European Community and (b) European Union.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The European Community—which was formerly the European Economic Community —continues in being and also includes the European Coal and Steel Community and the European Atomic Energy Community. Together, these Communities constitute one of the "pillars" of the Union. Government policy is to use the term "European Community" when describing matters specific to that pillar and to use the term "European Union" when referring to all three pillars collectively or to matters specific to the two intergovernmental pillars outside the Community.

Nigeria

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs at what recent international meetings he has raised the crisis in Nigeria; and what was the outcome.

Mr. Goodlad: We have been consulting closely our partners in the European Union, and in the wider international community. The European Union has decided to press the new regime to take urgent steps to restore democratic rule, unhindered by the military, and has reached agreement on measures to add to those imposed by the European Community last June.

We fully support the position of the European Union. The new measures will be implemented nationally as follows:

the movement of Nigerian defence staff outside London will in future be restricted without prior permission;

new export licence applications for defence equipment to Nigeria will be reviewed; on a case-by-case basis, with the presumption of denial;

those Nigerian military students still on courses in the United Kingdom will be asked to leave; the offer by ODA of a £23 million grant for the power sector will be withdrawn.

The measures imposed by the United Kingdom on 24 June will remain in place.

We will keep the situation in Nigeria under close review and will modify these measures, or add to them, in the light of progress towards the establishment of democratic civilian rule.

Human Rights

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 24 November 1993, Official Report, column 79, (1) if he will consult widely with interested bodies concerned with human rights before writing and submitting the United Kingdom's next report to the United Nations Human Rights Committee in August 1994;

(2) what opportunities are available for non-governmental organisations and hon. Members to submit evidence to his Department prior to the writing and submission of the United Kingdom's next report to the Human Rights Committee of the United Nations in August 1994.

Mr. Charles Wardle: I have been asked to reply.

Periodic reports in the United Nations Human Rights Committee, which are submitted in accordance with article 40 of the international covenant on civil and political rights, are a factual account of the measures taken by the Government to give effect to the rights recognised in the covenant. As such, we do not look to those outside Government to submit evidence or otherwise contribute to the writing of the reports. But non-governmental organisations, hon. Members and others are consulted widely in the formulation of the policies recorded in these reports.

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, pursuant to his answer of 24 November, Official Report, column 79, if he will place in the Library a draft of the United Kingdom's next report to the Human Rights Committee of the United Nations prior to its submission in August 1994.

Mr. Charles Wardle: I have been asked to reply.

In accordance with our usual practice, a copy of the United Kingdom's fourth report will be placed in the Library on the day that it is submitted to the Committee.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Equal Opportunities

Mrs. Angela Knight: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster if he will make a statement on progress under the programme for action to achieve equality of opportunity in the civil service for people of ethnic minority origin.

Mr. David Davis: There has been further progress this year; the proportion of ethnic minority staff in the civil service continues to rise. A report summarising progress during 1992-93 is being published today. Copies are being placed in the Library of the House.

Council for Science and Technology

Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how many social scientists are members of the Council for Science and Technology.

Mr. Waldegrave: No social scientists are members of the Council for Science and Technology. Council members were chosen in their personal capacities to provide a top-level overview of science and technology issues, rather than for expertise in specific areas, or as representatives of particular sectors.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Westminster Customer Care

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: To ask the Chairman of the Accommodation and Works Committee what is the expected cost of teaching staff at Westminster Customer Care.

Mr. Beith: I have been asked to reply as the Member answering for the House of Commons Commission.

The cost of the customer care training programme for the Serjeant at Arms Department was met from that Department's training budget for which the overall figure was £20,000 in 1993-94. I have asked the Serjeant at Arms to write to the hon. Member with the details.

Palace of Westminster

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: To ask the Chairman of the Accommodation and Works Committee if he will itemise the changes made within the Palace of Westminster during the summer recess with the precise cost of each and the names of those who authorised them and agreed to their cost.

Mr. Ray Powell: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to the hon. Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen) on 27 October, Official Report, column 667.

Members' Rooms

Mr. Allen: To ask the Chairman of the Accommodation and Works Committee how many of the rooms available to hon. Members are available to office holders; and which office holders are so accommodated.

Mr. Ray Powell: The Deputy Speakers, Government Ministers, the Government Whips, the Leader of the Opposition, the Deputy Leader of the Opposition, the shadow Cabinet, the Opposition Whips, the leader of the third party, the third-party Whips and the Whips of other parliamentary parties occupy a total of 93 rooms or suites of rooms.

DEFENCE

Nuclear Tests

Mr. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much money the Government have saved by not conducting any nuclear tests at the Nevada test site in the last 12 months.

Mr. Aitken: It has been the practice of successive Governments not to publish costs associated with the testing of British nuclear weapons.

Polaris

Mr. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if the figure given for the annual operation and maintenance costs of Polaris to the Defence Committee on 30 January 1985, HC 37 (1984-85), p159, 935, included (a) the cost of refits, (b) a share of the running costs of the Clyde submarine base, Faslane, (c) manpower and related costs of the crew and associated civilian staff, (d) a share of the intramural and extramural running costs of the atomic weapons establishments and (e) the cost of stores, personnel and the transport of stores.

Mr. Hanley: It would not be possible to carry out a detailed examination of the basis for the figure given in 1985 without incurring disproportionate cost.

AWE Aldermaston

Mr. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the incident that occurred at AWE Aldermaston recently involving a leak of uranium contaminated oil from a machine used for manufacturing weapons components.

Mr. Aitken: During routine operations in a workshop at AWE Aldermaston, a small quantity of coolant spilled from a machine used for making weapons components. The coolant, which was contaminated with uranium from normal machining operations, was immediately contained and safely disposed of. There was no release of material beyond the immediate area surrounding the machine and no contamination of personnel occurred. There was no risk to the public or the environment from the incident.

In the interests of safety the machine, and a small number of similar machines, were immediately isolated and taken out of service. Remedial action to remove the contaminated material to safe storage has now been completed. The Health and Safety Executive was informed about the incident and issued two prohibition notices. The machines concerned will not be brought back into use until the Health and Safety Executive is satisfied that adequate safety arrangements are in place.

Mr. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he expects the sludge solidification plant at AWE Aldermaston to become fully operational.

Mr. Aitken: We expect the plant to be fully operational in 1997.

Mr. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the incident that occurred at AWE Aldermaston on 11 November in the liquid treatment plant.

Mr. Aitken: During routine monitoring operations a higher than normal level of radioactive material was detected in a storage tank in the liquid effluent treatment plant, at AWE Aldermaston. The material has been disposed of in a safe and controlled manner, but as a precaution, employees and contractors' personnel were temporarily excluded from the immediate vicinity of the effluent plant. The remainder of the site continued to operate normally and there was no risk to personnel, the public or the environment.

Mr. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when he now expects red commissioning of the A90 plant at AWE Aldermaston to commence.

Mr. Aitken: White commissioning is progressing well. I hope to be in a position to make an announcement on red commissioning in the next few months.

Mr. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence in what form and quantity barium is used by the atomic weapons establishment, Aldermaston.

Mr. Aitken: Elemental barium is not used at AWE Aldermaston; varying quantities of barium compounds are used for experimental and analytical purposes.

Trident

Mr. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what technical difficulties are involved in adapting the Trident missile system so it may carry anything between one and eight nuclear warheads.

Mr. Aitken: None.

Radioactive Waste

Mr. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much liquid radioactive waste was dealt with by the present liquid radioactive waste treatment plant at AWE Aldermaston during 1992.

Mr. Aitken: The amount of liquid radioactive waste treated at AWE Aldermaston during 1992 was 12,450 m^3.

Mr. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much liquid radioactive waste is expected to be dealt with by the new A91 building at Aldermaston when it becomes fully operational.

Mr. Aitken: The specification for the A91 plant is based upon an annual throughput of 15,000 m^3 per annum. However, it is expected that waste minimisation initiatives will reduce the annual throughput to 10,000 m^3 per annum by the time the plant becomes operational.

Radiation Exposure

Mr. Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give a breakdown for (a) Aldermaston atomic weapons establishment, (b) Burghfield atomic weapons establishment, (c) Cardiff atomic weapons establishment, (d) Devonport dockyard, (e) Rosyth dockyard, (f) CSB Faslane and (g) RNAD Coulport of individual radiation dose exposures for workers in the bands (i) 0 to 10, (ii) 10 to 15, (iii) 15 to 20, (iv) 20 to 30, (v) 30 to 40 and (vi) greater than 40 mSv for the year 1992.

Mr. Aitken: The information requested is given in the following tables. It is not possible to split the band 0 to 15 into 0 to 10 and 10 to 15 in respect of Devonport and Rosyth dockyards, CSB Faslane and RNAD Coulport. There are no workers who have received doses greater than 10 or 15 mSv respectively.

Atomic weapons establishment sites	Exposure (mSv) 0 to 10
AWE (A)	3,132
AWE (B)	220
AWE (C)	157

Other sites	Exposure (mSv) 0 to 15
Devonport dockyard	1,188
Rosyth dockyard	1,153
CSB Faslane	309
RNAD Coulport	272

A1 Yamamah Contract

Mr. Gordon Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the A1 Yamamah contract in relation to the future of Cleveland Guest (Engineering) Ltd.

Mr. Aitken: Sub-contracts under the Al-Yamamah programme are a matter for British Aerospace as prime contractor to the Ministry of Defence.

Nuclear Tests

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what advice about protection was offered to service personnel exposed to radiation during British nuclear tests since 1963; what additional or different advice is given by his Department to service pesonnel in the same circumstances today; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: Stringent safety regulations were published by, or on behalf of, the Ministry of Supply and were promulgated in HM Forces orders for each atmospheric nuclear test. These were strictly enforced under normal HM forces command and disciplinary arrangements. The successful implementation of these regulations is shown by MOD records which demonstrate that test participants were not exposed to dangerous levels of radiation. This is confirmed by the lack of any excess of death or malignant disease among nuclear test veterans subsequently.

As the United Kingdom no longer conducts atmospheric nuclear weapon tests and has not done so since 1958, the MOD no longer has a need to promulgate such advice to service personnel.

Public Record Office

Mr. Davidson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence why there is a discrepancy between his answer of 3 November, Official Report, columns 291-92, on the date unrestricted access to the Department's archives in the Public Records Office in Hayes will be possible and the reply sent to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Davidson) by the Benefits Agency war pensions directorate based on information from the war pension disablement liaison officer to his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: While the date for unrestricted access to the whole of the Hayes archive was correctly stated by the War Pensions Directorate as February, now slipped to March 1994, priority is being given to the section holding service documents to which full access will be possible in December.

Former Yugoslavia

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence when additional cold weather personal equipment was sent to British forces in the former Yugoslavia; when the stores were received at Split; how many truck loads they represent; what prioritisation for this equipment was sought by BRITFOR HQ; when the equipment will be delivered to personnel in central Bosnia; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: Additional cold weather clothing was issued from the United Kingdom on 29 October and 1 November. It arrived in Croatia on 5 November and was cleared by Croatian customs on 8 November. The clothing consignment consisted of three 20 ft containers and was accorded due priority by BRITFOR HQ, consistent with other operational requirements at the time. The equipment was delivered to central Bosnia on 27 November.

Navy, Army and Air Force Institutes (NAAFI)

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many (a) serving officers and (b) other ranks serve on the board of NAAFI.

Mr. Hanley: The board of NAAFI includes three serving officers, one for each service who are appointed in a non-executive capacity to represent the interests of the services. There are no other ranks on the board.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what discussions he has had with James Rucker, the managing director of NAAFI, about his letter to Aims of Industry of 14 March 1991.

Mr. Hanley: None.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will dismiss James Rucker as managing director of NAAFI.

Mr. Hanley: There are no grounds for doing so.

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many civil servants from his Department serve on the board of NAAFI.

Mr. Hanley: None.

Customer Hospitality (Guidelines)

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what guidelines are given to civil servants in his Department in accepting hospitality from defence industry customers.

Mr. Aitken: Guidelines are given in staff regulations and in instructions issued annually. They explain that crown servants should not be placed in a position where their actions might give the impression that they may have been or might be influenced to show favour or disfavour to any person or organisation.

Next Steps Agencies

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is the policy of his Department to next steps agencies joining Aims of Industry.

Mr. Aitken: Next steps agencies remain part of their parent Department and it would be inappropriate therefore for them to join organisations which promote particular developments in Government policies.

Vickers Defence Systems

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many of his civil servants accepted invitations from Vickers Defence Systems to attend Twickenham on Saturday 27 November; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Aitken: From time to time companies invite members of staff to attend a variety of functions. Acceptance of such invitations is covered by official guidelines. A total of one civilian and four military members of Ministry of Defence staff attended Twickenham on Saturday 27 November as guests of Vickers Defence Systems.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT ADMINISTRATION

Cambodia

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much of the funds that the British Government have committed to Cambodia in 1993-94 through the United Nations have actually been released; and how the funds have been disbursed.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The Government have committed $1·2 million of financial assistance through the United Nations in 1993-94. We provided $1 million of budgetary aid to the United Nations Secrtary-General's fund to help meet the costs of civil administration in the interim period prior to the establishment of a constitutional Government. We have pledged $0·2 million to a United Nations development programme trust fund to enable the Cambodia mine action centre—CMAC—to continue mine clearance operations; expenditure arrangements are being finalised with the United Nations development programme.

We are also co-financing two on-going health projects with the United Nations through UNDP. These are concerned with strengthening Cambodia's health systems, and controlling malaria and will cost an estimated £450,000 in 1993-94.

In addition, the United Kingdom contributes 6·373 per cent. on the United Nations scale of assessment to United Nations peacekeeping operations. The final calls for payment for the liquidation phase of UNTAC have yet to issue, but for the financial year 1993-94 the total United Kingdom assessed contribution is expected to be £17·59 million.

PRIME MINISTER

THORP

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Prime Minister what matters in regard to the thermal oxide reprocessing plant at Sellafield were discussed in his recent meetings with (a) Prime Minister Brundtland of Norway and (b) Chancellor Kohl of Germany.

The Prime Minister: In my recent meetings with Prime Minister Brundtland of Norway and Chancellor Kohl of Germany, we discussed a range of issues.

Iraq (Weapons)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Prime Minister if he will make a statement on the evidence given to the Scott inquiry in relation to the former Prime Minister's answer of 21 April 1989, Official Report, column 311.

The Prime Minister: No. While Lord Justice Scott's inquiry continues, it would not be right to comment on any of the evidence that has so far been taken.

Engagements

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 2 December.

The Prime Minister: This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Food Labelling

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has had regarding EC food labelling for products made and sold solely in Scotland; what discussions he has had with his EC counterparts regarding the subject; if his Department will investigate the effect of EC food labelling on the Scottish market; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Hector Monro: My right hon. Friend has received no representations on this matter. The Scottish Office Agriculture and Fisheries Department works closely with the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in EC discussions on food labelling; and interested parties in Scotland are consulted on all EC food labelling issues prior to any legislation being made.

Scottish Nuclear

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what considerations underlay his decision to discourage Scottish Nuclear from providing issue specific information to the public on its operations.

Mr. Stewart: My right hon. Friend does not discourage Scottish Nuclear from providing information to the public.

Ethnic Minority Grant

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what are his Department's criteria for the allocation of the annual ethnic minority grant of £100,000; and who the advisers are on the eligibility of the applicants.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The decision on which projects should be awarded ethnic minority grant is taken by Ministers following consideration of the applications. Competitions are held regularly and any voluntary organisation can submit a project which meets the scheme's objectives of reducing racial disadvantage and promoting racial equality.

Council House Sales

Mr. Davidson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what are the rules regarding succession of tenancy for discount purposes in the purchase of council houses; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The legislative provisions governing the succession of a tenancy and the calculation of discount for the purchase of a council house are set out in sections 52 and 61 of the Housing (Scotland) Act 1987 as amended.

NHS Trusts

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to complete his consideration of the remaining third wave NHS trust applications; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stewart: Following the announcement by my noble and learned Friend, the Minister of State, on 15 October nine applications for trust status have been under consideration. These involve the Glasgow Royal infirmary, Western infirmary and Gartnavel hospitals, Stobhill, Inverclyde Royal, Renfrewshire Healthcare, Queen Margaret hospital Dunfermline, Kirkcaldly Acute hospitals, Angus unit and the Highland Communities unit.

My right hon. Friend has considered the applications very carefully, taking into account the comments made during the public consultations. He has concluded that they meet the published criteria and should be approved. Orders establishing the trusts are being signed today and the new trusts will become operational on 1 April 1994. This will bring the total number of trusts in Scotland at that date to 39.

Operating within the national health service, the trusts, between them, will be responsible for approximately 90 per cent. of hospital and community health services in Scotland. As the longer established trusts have already demonstrated, they will be able to develop services of a more local character and better adapted to meet patient needs. This augurs well for the health service in Scotland.

The latest batch of trust approvals also means that four health boards will join Grampian and Ayrshire and Arran in no longer having day-to-day operational responsibilities for hospitals in their areas. This will allow these boards to concentrate on their crucial role of determining the health needs of those in their area, securing services to meet those needs, and monitoring the services provided.

Urology Contract

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on contracts between the Ayrshire and Arran health board and the Dumfries and Galloway health board before the award by the former board of a contract for urology services;

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 23 November 1993]:

There is no contract between Ayrshire and Arran health board and Dumfries and Galloway health board for urology —or any other service—for services to Dumfries and Galloway residents. Any contract for services to residents of Dumfries and Galloway is a matter for Dumfries and Galloway health board in conjuction with whichever NHS trust, directly managed unit or other provider from which that board chooses to purchase services.

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland whether the re-submitted bids tendered for the urology contract in Ayrshire and Arran were amended by the Ayrshire and Arran health board before a final decision on the bids.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 23 November 1993]: Prior to consideration by the health board, the evaluation panel re-arranged figures in both bids, to ensure a "like for like" comparison in the preparation of its evaluation report. There was no question, however, of the health board itself amending any of the bids before a final decision was taken.

Overseas Visits

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many visits abroad he has made during 1993; and what was (a) the cost of each visit to public funds and (b) the purpose of each visit.

Mr. Lang [holding answer 1 December 1993]: I have made four overseas visits during 1993:

Destination	Date	Cost £
Brussels	25 January	389
United States	25-27 March	4,690
Brussels	20-21 September	480
Far East (Hong Kong, Korea and Japan)	14-23 October	8,860

The visits to the United States and the far east involved inward investment and trade promotion. The visits to Brussels were to attend the Joint Foreign Affairs and Agriculture Council and the Transport and Environmental Council. Costs include travel, accommodation, local transportation and interpreting service, where applicable.

Golf

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he next plans to meet representatives of the Scottish Golf Union to discuss the role of golf in Scotland; what is his most recent estimate of the revenue that golf in Scotland attracts from inward investment; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Hector Monro [holding answer 1 December 1993]: My right hon. Friend and I have no immediate plans to meet any representatives of the Scottish Golf Union to discuss any aspect of the game of golf. I would, of course, be only too willing to meet with the Scottish Golf Union to discuss any matters of mutual interest if a request for a meeting was made to me. It is not possible to quantify the revenue that golf in Scotland attracts from inward investment, but it is obviously a very considerable sum.

Motorways

Mr. McMaster: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last assessed the level of disruption caused by unmanned roadworks on the main motorway routes between London and Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton [holding answer 1 December 1993]: My right hon. Friend is responsible for the trunk road network in Scotland, where roadworks are subject to the code of practice set out in "The Reduction of Delays of Roadworks" issued by the Scottish Office in 1992. The operational effect of all roadworks on the trunk road network, including motorways, in Scotland is monitored on the basis of fortnightly reports provided by the regional councils, as agent authorities, for the roads directorate of the Scottish Office Industry Department.

A key element in the efforts to reduce delays has been the introduction of lane rental on major maintenance contracts on the strategic core network. Under lane rental the contractor pays for the length of time traffic lanes or carriageways are closed and effectively receives a bonus for early completion or conversely incurs a penalty if the contract overruns. This has led to significant reductions in the time taken to complete roadworks and has minimised delays and inconvenience to road users.

Disabled Employees

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many disabled people in (a) Inverclyde and (b) Strathclyde currently benefit from the special aids to employment scheme; and how many disabled people he expects to lose their jobs once employers have to pay 50 per cent. of the cost of special aids in the work place.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 30 November 1993]: The numbers of disabled people receiving benefit from the special aids to employment scheme in Inverclyde and Strathclyde respectively are: (a) 2; (b) 68. Changes to the Employment Service's current special schemes for helping people with disabilities, and which include the introduction of a limited employers' contribution, to provide help for existing employees who have worked for them for more than six months, are aimed at helping more people with disabilities to get and retain jobs and at making a much wider range of help available. The Employment Service is currently finalising details of these changes with these aims in mind.

NHS Land

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what was the total number of acres owned by the national health service for each of the past 14 years.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 30 November 1993]: Figures for each of the past 14 years are not held centrally in the form requested. The available information, excluding the state hospital and the health education board for Scotland, is as follows:

Period	Acres
December 1989	10,009
July 1990	9,415
December 1990	9,503
March 1992	8,766
September 1992	8,840

This information is taken from reports on national health service vacant and surplus property by the Scottish health management efficiency group.

Earnings

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what are the average weekly earnings for (a) full-time male workers and (b) full-time female workers in (i) Inverclyde, (ii) Strathclyde and (iii) Scotland.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 1 December 1993]: Information relating to average gross weekly earnings for full-time male employees and full-time female employees in Strathclyde and Scotland is shown in the table. Information relating to average earnings is not available below the level of Scottish regions.

Average gross weekly earnings of full-time employees on adult rates

	Males £	Females £
Strathclyde	326·6	240·6
Scotland	333·0	237·4

Local Government Finance

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many appeals against banding under the council tax have been made in the current year in (a) Strathclyde and (b) Scotland; what is the average length of time taken to hear such appeals; and how many were successful.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 1 December 1993]: The process of requesting a change to the council tax valuation list involves two stages. First, a proposal is lodged with the assessor's department. If the proposal cannot be resolved it proceeds as an appeal to the Valuation Appeal Committee. Proposals unresolved after six months are automatically cited for appeal. The tables set out the relevant available information supplied by assessors to the Scottish Office on proposals and appeals up to end-September 1993. Tables 1 and 2 show the outcome of proposals lodged. Table 3 shows the time taken to settle those proposals and appeals that have been settled; this includes cases where proposals are withdrawn by the appellant or the valuation list is adjusted by the assessor as well as cases decided by an appeal committee.

No information is collected centrally as to how many appeals are successful since it is not clear what that would mean in each case. It must be assumed that in all cases where an appellant withdraws his or her proposal or the assessor adjusts the valuation list then an agreed outcome has been reached.

"Scotland's Children"

Mr. Donohoe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland which elements of the White Paper, "Scotland's Children" he intends to bring forward into legislation.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 23 November 1993]: The care of children calls for a clear and coherent legislative framework and a Bill which takes forward the proposals in the White Paper should be seen as an important first step towards a consolidation of law relating to children, besides including such important subjects as the emergency protection of children including the proposed exclusion order; the extension of local authorities' existing social welfare duties; the revision of the statutory authority for the transfer of parental rights; the duties of local authorities towards children in their care; and various provisions to strengthen the children's hearings system. Work is proceeding on these topics and others which involve central guidance. They will be the subject of further consultation, as appropriate.

HEALTH

Prescriptions

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether a general practitioner may prescribe a substance on a private prescription where to do so would be cheaper for a patient than getting the same prescription on an NHS prescription.

Dr. Mawhinney: A general practitioner can offer patients the choice of between receiving a prescription on the national health service or purchasing an over the counter product themselves if the cost of the product is cheaper than the NHS prescription charge. Of course, many people are exempt from prescription charges and the GP could be regarded in breach of his terms of service if this point were overlooked. If an NHS patient requests a private prescription the GP is not precluded from providing one but may not charge a fee. The costs of dispensing a private prescription would have to be met by the patients.

Suicide

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information she has as to the relationship between anti-depressants and suicide deaths broken down by individual drug.

Mr. Bowis: Suicide deaths and undetermined deaths involving poisoning by an anti-depressant drug are shown in the tables, which are derived from the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys "Mortality Statistics: Injury and Poisoning for England and Wales" (Series DH4 No. 17), copies of which are available in the Library. In many cases the anti-depressant was taken in combination with or in addition to another type of drug.

Patients Charter

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health at what point a complaint under the patients charter concerning the right of a patient to a clear explanation of a proposed treatment, including any risks or alternatives, becomes a complaint concerning clinical judgment.

Dr. Mawhinney: If there is a complaint that a health professional in the exercise of clinical judgment did not provide an explanation of a proposed treatment, including risks or alternatives, then it is a complaint concerning clinical judgment from the moment it is made, since the decision on how much information to provide to a patient, and the terms in which any warning of any risks is given prior to treatment is a clinical decision.

Mental Health

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many patients and other mentally ill people (a) under 65 and (b) over 65 years are provided with beds or places in each type of accommodation illustrated in figure 2 of the Yates report by short and long stay.

Mr. Bowis: This information is not available centrally for all the types of accommodation shown in figure 2 of the Yates report. The information for staffed residential care homes is shown in the table.

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what the figures are for the different types of provision illustrated in figure 3 of the Yates report.

Mr. Bowis: The figures are shown in the table.

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the source of the information about private hospital provision for mentally ill people given in the Yates report, published by her Department.

Mr. Bowis: The source of this information is in the Korner return KO36, "Private Hospitals, Homes and Clinics registered under Section 23 of the Registered Homes Act 1984", copies of which are available in the Library.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what redress, under the patients charter patients, or their family, have if they are not given a clear explanation of the treatment proposed, including any risks and any alternatives.

Dr. Mawhinney: Under the patients charter, patients have a general right to have complaints thoroughly investigated. If the patient is still unhappy about the way in which a complaint has been investigated then the patient may take the matter up with the Health Service Commissioner.

The patients charter has introduced the additional provision that if a patient believes that they have been denied a specific charter right, the patient or their family may write to the chief executive of the national health service who will arrange for the matter to be investigated.

Paediatric Intensive Care

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate she has as to the number of children in each English region who did not receive paediatric intensive care owing to the shortage of such beds.

Dr. Mawhinney: Information on which to base such an estimate is not available centrally. Decisions on the referral of critically ill children are taken by clinicians in the light of the condition of the child and the proximity of available treatment facilities. A survey carried out by the British Paediatric Association in connection with preparation of the report, "The Care of Critically Ill Children" showed that, in 1991, 51 per cent. of children receiving intensive care were treated in dedicated paediatric intensive care units, 29 per cent. in high dependency beds in children's wards and 20 per cent. in adult intensive care units. Copies of the report are available in the Library.

The Department, in collaboration with appropriate professional bodies, will act on the recommendation in the report, for outcomes for children requiring paediatric intensive care to be audited to provide this information for the future.

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans she has to set targets for the number of paediatric intensive care unit beds in each of the next five years.

Dr. Mawhinney: The recently published report from the British Paediatric Association, "The Care of Critically Ill Children", copies of which are available in the Library, offers recommendations on the number and distribution of paediatric intensive care beds required to take account of developments in this highly specialised area of child health care. Health authorities will be asked to draw up plans for an effective and co-ordinated response to this report and these may include locally determined targets.

Leptospirosis

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what estimate she has made of the risk of contracting leptospirosis from drinking direct from bottles or cans.

Mr. Sackville: None.

Secure Accommodation

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what responses she has had to the Department of Health consultation paper "De-monopolising the Provision of Secure Accommodation"; and if she will place them in the Library.

Mr. Bowis: Forty-two written responses were received from local authority associations, voluntary organisations and private sector companies. There was no understanding that the responses would be made public and so I do not think it would be appropriate to place copies in the Library.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proposals her Department has put forward to privatise secure accommodation for juvenile offenders; and what arrangements will be made to advertise the contracts.

Mr. Bowis: Proposals for legislative changes to enable the voluntary and private sectors to provide secure accommodation will be introduced to Parliament in due course.

Medical Alert

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what written notices are routinely issued to patients who are the subjects of any medical alert or warning indicating they are subject to the information contained in the alert; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Sackville: The Department does not routinely issue written notices to patients concerning alerts or warnings relating to problems involving medical devices. The Department's policy in such cases is to issue safety warnings to aid clinicians in making informed decisions with respect to individual patients.

Pacemakers

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health from what sources her Department arrives at a figure for deaths of patients implanted with pacemaker lead models 1010T, 1050T and Prototype 93.

Mr. Sackville: Data relating to the number of patient deaths for individuals implanted with the pacemaker leads are obtained from the national pacemaker database located at the Royal Brompton National heart and lung hospital, London.

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how implant centres and follow-up centres are informed that pacemaker lead model 1010T includes prototype 93.

Mr. Sackville: Centres were informed of a fault in the Siemens pacemaker lead model 1010T by the Department of Health pacemaker technical note No. 48, which included the Siemens medical advisory as an attachment. Paragraph 5 of the attachment identified all associated leads and their prototypes, including the T93 prototype. Copies of the technical note are available in the Library.

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many people have been implanted with pacemaker lead models 1010T, 1050T and prototype 93.

Mr. Sackville: According to the National Pacemaker Registry a total of 4,675 pacemaker leads of models 1010T, 1050T and prototype T93 have been implanted in patients within the United Kingdom.

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the adequacy of the identification of pacemaker lead prototype 93 in Pacemaker note No. 48.

Mr. Sackville: Attention was drawn to the prototype T93 in two separate communications to all relevant clinicians. The details were contained in the manufacturer's advisory notice which was attached to the Department of Health technical note No. 48, and which had been issued previously by the company. Copies of the technical note are available in the Library.

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what recent guidance her Department has issued in respect of the identification of those deaths in patients fitted with pacemakers which may be due to faulty pacemaker leads.

Mr. Sackville: No guidance has been issued by the Department of Health. Identification of the cause of death is made by the relevant medical practitioner.

NHS Trusts

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will issue guidance to NHS trust hospitals on the practice of publicity advertising the private use of such hospitals on behalf of commercial organisations.

Mr. Sackville: No.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what guidance has been issued on the role and objectives of trust non-executive directors;

(2) what training non-executive directors receive on corporate governance on joining trust boards.

Dr. Mawhinney: Non-executive directors of national health service trusts are appointed by regional health authority chairmen and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. They are provided, on appointment, with guidance produced by the NHS Management Executive on their role and functions. It is for individual trust chairmen to ensure that non-executive directors receive any necessary induction and training. The corporate governance task force is expected to make recommendations before the end of the year to the chief executive of the Management Executive on the role and functions and induction-continuing development of chairmen and non-executive directors. Copies of the guidance will be placed in the Library.

Medical Devices Directorate

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what proposals she has to ensure the medical devices directorate has the power to require a response to a medical alert from those to whom it is issued;

(2) whether she will issue guidelines to the medical devices directorate on monitoring of centres receiving alerts;

(3) what monitoring the medical devices directorate carries out to ensure that all hospitals comply with medical alerts.

Mr. Sackville: We have no plans to issue guidelines to the medical devices directorate on monitoring of centres which receive alerts. The medical devices directorate currently has no powers to require a response to, or compliance with, safety warnings and we have no plans to grant such powers. The medical devices directorate does not monitor compliance with medical alerts sent to hospitals.

Medical Devices

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health who is responsible for assessing the effects of faults in medical devices.

Mr. Sackville: The Department, through the medical devices directorate is responsible for assessing the effects of faults in medical devices.

Royal Sussex County Hospital

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will provide details of current patient waiting times for the Brighton Health Care national health service trust and projected treatment waiting times when the Royal Sussex County hospital redevelopment is completed.

Dr. Mawhinney: Brighton healthcare trust was established in 1993 and information on their waiting times is not yet available centrally.

Brighton healthcare trust will continue to comply with both local standards and patients charter guarantees after the Royal Sussex hospital redevelopment is completed.

Pesticides

Mrs. Anne Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when she expects to publish the revised edition of the notes for the guidance of medical practitioners on pesticides.

Mr. Sackville: Work on the revision is underway. As soon as this is completed the notes will be sent for publication. The Department holds a small stock and can provide copies of the current book to doctors or hospitals if required.

NHS Employees

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what advice has been issued by her Department to national health service employers regarding the payment of unsocial hours allowances for staff.

Mr. Sackville: For staff whose pay and conditions are determined nationally, a variety of agreements have been reached for different staff groups as part of their overall pay and conditions of service package.

Smoking

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will estimate the total number of cigarettes smoked by children every year.

Mr. Sackville: Figures taken from the 1992 Office of Population Censuses and Surveys survey of smoking among secondary school children for the mean consumption of cigarettes per pupil, give an estimate of around 690 million cigarettes smoked every year by pupils aged 11 to 15 in England.

Drug Prescribing

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how much money in real terms would be saved from drug prescribing if the exemption for pregnant and nursing mothers were removed.

Dr. Mawhinney: There is no firm evidence to suggest that there would be a reduction in prescribing, and consequent savings in drugs bill expenditure, if prescription charge exemption for expectant and nursing mothers were to be removed.

Steroids

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans she has to ensure that a list of side effects are given whenever steroids are dispensed.

Mr. Sackville: Patient information leaflets are an important way for patients to receive easily understood information about the medicines that they use. We have recently implemented a European Community directive to take effect from 1 January 1994, one effect of which makes patient information leaflets compulsory for all medicines unless all the information is shown on the label. These leaflets will contain important information on how medicines should be used and useful information on side effects. Pharmaceutical companies will be implementing this requirement progressively over the next five years.

Maternity Leave

Mrs. Helen Jackson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations she has made to her colleagues in the Department of Employment on extending the right to maternity leave and allowance to mothers of newly adopted babies or young children.

Mr. Sackville: None.

Waiting Lists

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the latest available figures for the total number of patients on the waiting list in each EC country.

Dr. Mawhinney: Information on the number of patients on the waiting list in each country of the European Union is not available centrally. Information on waiting times for in-patient and day case treatment for England is given in "Hospital Waiting List Statistics: England" published twice yearly, copies of which are available in the Library.

Specialists

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans she has to increase the number of specialists in hospitals.

Dr. Mawhinney: Our policy is to encourage the shift towards a consultant-based service, envisaged in the agreements between the national health service and the medical profession set out in "Achieving a Balance", copies of which are available in the Library. This suggests a minimum consultant expansion rate of 2 per cent. per year. However, it is a matter for each employing body to determine the number of consultants needed in each specialty in the light of local needs and competing priorities. Between 1987 and 1992 the number of medical consultants working in NHS hospitals in England increased by 2,240, a rate of 3 per cent. per year.

Tobacco Advertising

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will support a tobacco advertising ban at the next European Health Ministers' meeting; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Sackville: The Government have made clear that they oppose the draft European Community directive banning tobacco advertising. We do not believe that it is necessary for the completion of the single market.

Leptospirosis

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list by regional health authority for the last five years, and this year to-date the number of people who have been infected by leptospirosis desease.

Mr. Sackville: The information is shown in the table.

Number of persons infected by Leptospirosis disease

Optic Neuritis

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list (a) by year for the last five years and the current year to date and (b) by regional health authority the number of cases of the disease optic neuritis that have been reported.

Mr. Sackville: This information is not available centrally.

Patient Relocations

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans she has to inform health authorities and trusts of the circumstances in which patients may be relocated in other parts of the country (a) if they are being treated under section 19 of the National Health Act 1983 and (b) otherwise.

Mr. Bowis: There are no plans to issue guidance on these cases. Clinicians refer all patients to units which most appropriately meet their needs. This applies equally to patients detained under the Mental Health Act and who are transferred under section 19.

Patients Charter

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list by regional health authority the hospitals that have currently been penalised financially for failing to treat patients within the waiting time limits set by the patients charter; and if she will make a statement.

Dr. Mawhinney: The information requested is not available centrally. Allocations from the waiting times fund are linked to regions performance on waiting times. Deductions are made for specific breaches of the patients charter guarantees. These deductions act as an incentive to good management and some regions therefore pass them on to the responsible provider units.

University College Hospital

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans she has for resolving the financial problems of University College hospital, London; and if she will make a statement.

Dr. Mawhinney: The University College London hospitals group reports directly to North East Thames regional health authority. The hon. Member may wish to contact Sir William Stavely, chairman of the regional health authority for details.

NHS Reforms

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what analysis she has made of the cost benefit of the national health service reforms.

Dr. Mawhinney: The benefits of the national health service reforms are tangible: more patients are now being treated than ever before; people are waiting shorter times for treatment; general practitioner fund holders are able to back their clinical judgment and local knowledge with national health service funds to the benefit of all patients; increased numbers of people are being treated as day cases without the need for a stay in hospital. These are some of the real and important benefits flowing from the reforms —which clearly illustrate we have achieved our main aims: improvements to the quality of care; responsiveness to individuals and value for money.

NHS Trusts

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans she has to ask the Audit Commission to investigate the payments to chairmen and non-executive directors of national health service trusts.

Dr. Mawhinney: The independent external auditors appointed by the Audit Commission examine payments to chairmen and non-executive directors as part of their routine audits.

Infant and Perinatal Mortality

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the infant mortality and perinatal mortality rate in each EC country in the latest available year.

Mr. Sackville: The information is shown in the table.

Infant and perinatal mortality rate in each European Community country for 1991

	Infant mortality rate[1]	Perinatal mortality rate[2]

GP Fundholders

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action she is taking regarding overspending by general practitioner fundholders in the Doncaster area in respect of drug prescribing; and if she will make a statement.

Dr. Mawhinney: General practitioner fundholders nationally are proving to be extremely successful in improving the cost effectiveness of their prescribing and can vire between the elements of their budgets to achieve the most appropriate care for patients. Regional health authorities are responsible for managing the GP fundholding scheme in their areas.

Mrs. Jane Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to her answer of 29 November, Official Report, column 307, about general practitioner surgery in Liverpool, South Sefton, Knowsley and St. Helens and Wirral health authorities, how many of the general practitioners are fund holders; and how many fund holding general practitioners are in single-handed practices, in each of the four health authorities.

Dr. Mawhinney: Regional health authorities are responsible for managing the general practitioner fundholding scheme in their areas. Detailed regional information is not available centrally.

Regional Health Authorities

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make it her policy to hold centrally, records of the revenue spending on (a) in-patients and (b) out-patients by regional health authorities; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Sackville: No. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced on 21 October her intention to abolish regional health authorities, subject to the approval of Parliament.

Coronary Care

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list the waiting times for each (a) regional health authority and (b) district health authority for coronary (i) artery bypass grafting and (ii) angioplasty.

Dr. Mawhinney: Information on waiting times by treatment or condition is not available centrally. Information for in-patient and day case treatment by specialty for district and regional health authorities is given in "Hospital Waiting List Statistics: England", published twice yearly since 1987, copies of which are available in the Library.

Clinics (Closure)

Dr. Spink: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what obligation there is on community care services and NHS trusts to inform or consult hon. Members about the closure of clinics in their constituencies.

Dr. Mawhinney: There is no obligation on national health service trusts to inform or consult hon. Members when considering changes to the service which they provide. We encourage trusts to develop good communications with local MPs. The precise arrangements are matters for individual trust boards.

Blood Donors

Mr. Spellar: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will ban the import of blood and blood products from countries which use paid donors.

Mr. Sackville: This country is self-sufficient in blood obtained from our voluntary, unpaid donors and we do not obtain supplies from other sources. It is our long-standing policy to pursue self-sufficiency in blood products made from voluntary, unpaid donations and to seek to maximise the use of those products. We nevertheless recognise the clinical freedom of doctors to prescribe other products if considered more appropriate for individual patients.

Community Care

Mr. Waterson: To ask the Secretary of State for Health by what method she intends to distribute the community care special transitional grant in 1994-95; and what conditions she intends to attach to its use.

Mr. Bowis: The special transitional grant for community care in England will amount to some £736 million in 1994-95. It will be distributed to local authorities on the basis of the personal social services standard spending assessment—PSS SSA. We have decided in the light of early experience of the new arrangements, and of a change to the way in which numbers of residents in independent sector care homes are reflected in PSS SSAs, that it is no longer necessary to base part of the distribution on historic patterns of income support spending on residential care.

There will be conditions attached to the use of the grant similar to those applied in 1993-94. Full details of the grant conditions will be announced separately.

Sir Michael Grylls: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information is available to elderly people about the variety of accommodation and services available to them under the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990.

Mr. Bowis: Local authorities must publish annual plans outlining the ways in which community care will operate in their area. We expect local authorities to build on these plans to provide their local population with comprehensive details of the services available. This way users of services will be able to make the informed choice which is central to our community care system.

Genetics Laboratories

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make a statement on the future of NHS funding for regional genetics laboratories.

Dr. Mawhinney: The Government remain committed to the research and development strategy. We have made it clear that the NHS Management Executive will continue to work closely with purchasers and providers to ensure that the high levels of services which are presently delivered, including those provided by the regional genetics laboratories, are maintained.

Gene Therapy

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the membership of her committee on the ethics of gene therapy; and if she will list each member's current professional position.

Mr. Sackville: The Committee on the Ethics of Gene Therapy was disbanded on 19 November 1993. It has been replaced by the Gene Therapy Advisory Committee, which met for the first time on 22 November 1993.

The new committee is chaired by Professor Dame June Lloyd DBE, MD, FRCP formerly Professor of Child Health at the Institute of Child Health, and a past-president of the British Paediatric Association.

The membership of the Gene Therapy Advisory Committee was announced on 15 November 1993.

The 16 members of the Committee are:

Dr. Elizabeth Anionwu, PhD, RGN, HV Tutor-Lecturer in Community Genetic Counselling, Institute of Child Health;

Mrs. Rosemary Barnes,—Director, "Wellbeing";

Professor Martin Bobrow, DSc, MB, BCh, FRCP FRCPath—Prince Philip Professor of Paediatric Research, United Medical and Dental Schools of Guy's and St. Thomas's Hospitals, University of London;

Professor Derek Crowther, PhD, MB, BChir., MA, MSc, FRCP, FRCR—Professor of Medical Oncology, Christie Hospital and Holt Radium Institute and University of Manchester;

Professor Anthony Dayan, MD, FRCP, FRCPath., FFPM, FIBiol. —Professor of Toxicology, University of London; Director, Department of Toxicology, St. Bartholomew's Hospital Medical College;

The Rev. Canon Dr. Keith Denison—Director of Education for Diocese of Monmouth and Vicar of Whitson, Newport;

Dr. Brenda Gibson, MB, ChB, MRCP, MRCPath., DFM—Consultant Haematologist, Royal Hospital for Sick Children, Glasgow;

Mrs. Rosemary Knights, RGN, OND, DN—Chief Executive, Warrington Hospital NHS Trust. Previously Regional Nursing Officer, Mersey RHA;

Professor Peter Lachmann, FRCP, FRCPath., FRS—Professor of Immunology, University of Cambridge;

NHS Estates

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will set out the date and the terms upon which NHS Estates took out a lease at 1 Trevelyan square, Leeds.

Mr. Sackville: The property occupied by National Health Service Estates at 1 Trevelyan square, Leeds is held on the property holdings common user estate by virtue of a lease dated 11 November 1992 and made between Nonpariel Securities Limited and the Secretary of State for the Environment. The area demised by the lease comprises the first, second and part of the third floors having a total area of 22,450 square feet together with 20 basement car parking spaces. The lease is held from the 11 November to 24 November 1992 and thereafter for a term of 25 years subject to a break in the tenant's favour only at the expiration of the 15th year.

The rent which is subject to five-yearly rent reviews is £370,425 per year effective from 14 May 1993, the landlord having granted a six months and three days rent free period. In addition the landlord made a capital contribution of £58,496 exclusive of value added tax towards the fitting out costs. The quarterly on account service charge is currently £14,100.

Mr. Ivan Biddle

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make a statement on the effectiveness of her code of practice in relation to the case of Ivan Biddle, who was sacked by Barnet general hospital, for expressing to his trade union his concern about the running of the hospital mortuary.

Dr. Mawhinney: Mr. Biddle was dismissed from his post as anatomical pathology technician at Barnet general hospital in October 1990. The National Health Service Management Executive's "Guidance For Staff On Relations With The Public And The Media" (EL(93)51) was issued on 8 June 1993, copies of which are available in the Library.

Redundancy Payments

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list for each year since 1988, and the first six months of 1993, the gross amount of redundancy payments given out by (a) region, (b) district, (c) special health authorities and (d) trusts.

Dr. Mawhinney: This information is not available centrally.

Spectacle and Contact Lenses

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will publish a table showing the average price of spectacle lenses and contact lenses for NHS patients, for each year since 1979.

Dr. Mawhinney: This information is not available in the form requested. Until 1986 national health service spectacles were available free of charge to children. Adults choosing NHS spectacles paid a contribution for their spectacle lenses which was determined by the complexity of the prescription. Since 1986 people who are entitled to help with the cost of spectacles and contact lenses have received a voucher which they can use towards the cost of these.

General Practitioners

Mrs. Jane Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Health, pursuant to her answer of 29 November 1993, Official Report, column 307, about general practitioner surgery in Liverpool, South Sefton, Knowsley and St. Helens and Wirral health authorities, what is (a) the largest list and (b) the smallest list size of general practitioner practices in the health authorities.

Dr. Mawhinney: The information is shown in the tables.

FHSA	Practice with smallest list size	Number of general practitioners in practice
Liverpool	1,131	1
St. Helens and Knowsley	504	1
Sefton	1,262	1
Wirral	1,060	1

FHSA	Practice with largest list size	Number of general practitioners in practice
Liverpool	13,158	6
St. Helens and Knowsley	14,161	6
Sefton	16,047	7
Wirral	15,464	8

The data relate to 1 April 1993.

All data relate to partnerships. Some partnerships may practice from more than one surgery.

Partnerships may include one or more general practitioners who are restricted principals. A restricted principal is a GP who either (a) provides the full range of general medical services but whose list is limited to the staff of one or more hospitals or institutions in which he is employed or to patients resident in one or more schools or institutions; or (b) provides maternity medical services and/or contraceptive services only.

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) what plans she has to increase the budgets of those hospital trusts whose chief executives are to receive a salary increase; and if she will make a statement;

(2) when she was first informed of recent increases in salaries for the chief executives of various hospital trusts; what her response was; what plans she has to take action to countermand these increases; and if she will make a statement.

Dr. Mawhinney: The salaries of chief executives and other directors of trusts are matters for the chairmen and non-executive directors. The budgets of national health service hospital trusts are established on the basis of contracts for services between them and national health service purchasing authorities.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State wrote to all chairmen on 12 November 1992 requiring settlements for 1993-94 to conform with the public sector pay restraint limits of 0-1·5 per cent.

Immunisation

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many deaths, occuring within 48 hours of immunisation, were reported on yellow cards or otherwise to the Department or to the Committee on the Safety of Medicines in each year from 1986 to 1992; and how many of these deaths occured after the injection of triple or pertussis vaccines.

Mr. Sackville: The total number of reactions or deaths that occur within 48 hours of immunisation is not available. Spontaneous reports of adverse drug reactions are received from doctors and dentists under the voluntary "Yellow card" scheme in the United Kingdom. In addition there is a statutory requirement for companies to report adverse reactions to their medicines. The receipt of a report does not necessarily indicate that a specific drug caused the reaction, merely that there was a suspicion that the drug is associated with the reaction specified, many other factors may contribute.

The table lists the number of deaths reported to the Committee on the Safety of Medicines in association to vaccines containing pertussis, from 1986 to 1993. Pertussis vaccine is usually given combined with diptheria and tetanus vaccine as a triple (DTP) vaccine starting at two months of age. It is therefore not possible to determine which one, if any of these vaccines causes a particular reported reaction.

Number of deaths reported to the CSM to a pertussis containing vaccine

Year	Number
1986	0
1987	2
1988	1
1989	0
1990	2
1991	[1]6
1992	[1]6
1993	[1]2

[1] In 1990, the age for routine immunisation was lowered, and coincided with the peak age for deaths due to sudden infant death syndrome. It was therefore anticipated that there would be an increase in sudden infant death syndrome coincidentally associated with vaccine administration. Research studies have demonstrated that the association is temporal and not causal.

Influenza Vaccine

Mr. Whittingdale: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many laboratories in the United Kingdom are currently engaged in the production of influenza vaccine for the NHS; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Sackville: One at Evans Medical's premises in Speke, Liverpool. Other distributors import supplies of influenza vaccine.

Mr. Whittingdale: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what is the current availability of influenza vaccine; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Sackville: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply I gave my hon. Friend the Member for Chorley (Mr. Dover) on 29 November at column 305.

Patient Hotels

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will give (a) the number and location of each patient hotel, (b) the number of deaths that have occurred in patient hotels, (c) the nursing to patient ratio in the hotels, (d) the percentage of non-qualified staff attending to patients in hotels, (e) the number of private companies contracted to provide patient services in hotels, (f) details of all ministerial discussions concerning the introduction of charges for facilities in hotels and (g) what consideration she is giving to changing the name patient hotel to convalescent unit.

Mr. Sackville: The information requested is not available centrally. No ministerial discussions concerning the introduction of charges for facilities in hotels have taken place nor are we currently giving any consideration to what these units should be called.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health to what purposes a district health authority which no longer manages the provision of health care is authorised to apply or spend charitable trust funds retained after health care was transferred to the trusts.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I have been asked to reply.

A district health authority is authorised to apply or spend charitable trust funds for all or any purposes relating to the national health service. In doing so, it acts as a charity trustee. Under section 90 of the National Health Service Act 1977 it is not necessary for the particular purpose to relate to health service provision made by that authority.

The purposes for which any particular fund is to be applied are to be gathered from the written instrument regulating that fund—failing which from the appeal literature. The authority is required to promote these purposes and no others in its use of the funds.

In circumstances where such purposes now fall within the responsibility of a NHS trust, the authority should consider asking the Secretary of State for Health for an order under section 92 of the National Health Service Act 1977 transferring the trust property from the authority to the NHS trust. Unless and until the funds are lawfully transferred under that section or otherwise to a new charity trustee, the authority remains fully responsible for the due application of the charitable trust funds.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Benefits Administration

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assessment he has made of the administration from Glasgow of Department of Social Service benefits to Ealing; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Burt: The administration of social security benefits is a matter for Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Mr. M. Bichard to Mr. Harry Greenway, dated 1 December 1993:

As Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency it is my responsibility to answer questions about relevant operational matters. I am therefore replying to your recent Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security, asking what assessment he has made of the administration from Glasgow of Department of Social Security benefits to Ealing.

Between August 1989 and June 1991 the processing work of 21 London offices was relocated to three Benefit Centres; at Glasgow, Belfast and Ashton in Makerfield. Both Euston and Ealing districts had their work relocated to Glasgow Benefits Centre. It was envisaged that the Benefits Agency's service to its customers would be improved by moving work which did not require face to face contact with the public away from hard pressed London offices.

Since the processing of claims from benefit customers in Ealing was relocated in 1991, there has been a general improvement in service delivery. As regards Income Support (IS), which is the most frequently claimed benefit, the number of days it takes to clear a claim have been reduced by half. Currently it takes, on average, seven days to clear an IS claim.

Furthermore, accuracy on IS claims has improved from 71 per cent. of claims being processed accurately, prior to relocation, to a rate of 85 per cent. currently.

Similar improvements have been achieved on claims to Sickness Benefits. Prior to relocation it took on average, 29 days to clear a claim, whereas now it takes nine days. The accuracy of processing these type of claims has improved from 92·7 per cent., prior to relocation, to 94·3 per cent. currently.

If you require any further specific information about the administration of benefit claims from Glasgow I would be happy to provide it.

I hope that you find this reply helpful. A copy will appear in the Official Report and a copy will also be placed in the Library.

Pensioner Incomes

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list those local authorities who disregard war pensions and war widow's pensions when pensioners claim (a) housing benefit, (b) council tax benefit and (c) other benefits.

Mr. Burt: The discretion to disregard up to the full amount of any war pension applies only to housing benefit and council tax benefit, which succeeded community charge benefit in April 1993.

The information requested with regard to housing benefit has been compiled from the latest information from local authorities for the financial year 1990-91 and is listed in the table. No details are available for council tax benefit.

Local authorities operating a local scheme in housing benefit to disregard an amount of war disablement or war widow's pension in addition to the £10 statutory disregard.

Income Support

Mr. Davidson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what percentage of people are living in a household dependent upon income support in (a) the Govan constituency, (b) Glasgow, (c) Strathclyde region, (d) Scotland and (e) the United Kingdom.

Mr. Burt: The information requested is not available for the Govan constituency, Glasgow, Strathclyde region or Northern Ireland.

The latest available information for Scotland and Great Britain is in the table.

2. Percentages are correct to one decimal place.
3. Beneficiaries are the number of claimants plus partners and dependents.
4. The population figures used are estimates of the resident population in mid-1992.

Mr. Davidson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what percentage of children under 15 years are living in families in receipt of income support in (a) the Govan constituency, (b) Glasgow, (c) Strathclyde region, (d) Scotland and (e) the United Kingdom.

Mr. Burt: The information requested is not available for the Govan constituency, Glasgow, Strathclyde region or Northern Ireland.

The latest available information for Scotland and Great Britain is in the table.

4. The population figures used are estimates of the number of children aged under 15 resident in Scotland and Great Britain in mid-1992.

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what changes will be made in the income support claim form B1 in the light of the comments made by the Social Security Commissioner in decision No. CIS/663/19[illegible]

Mr. Burt: The administration of income support is a matter for Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member with such information as is available.

Letter from Mr. M. Bichard to Mr. Paul Flynn, dated 1 December 1993:

As Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency it is my responsibility to answer questions about relevant operational matters. I am therefore replying to your recent Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security asking what changes will be made in the Income Support claim form B1 in light of the comments made by the Social Security Commissioner in decision No. CIS/663/1992.

The Benefits Agency is currently reviewing the wording on the Income Support claim form B1 and other Income Support claim forms in light of the Commissioner's decision No. CIS/663/1992.

Income Support claim forms are currently reviewed every 6 months and where necessary revised versions are issued. Any change required as a result of the Commissioner's decision will be incorporated into the current review. The amended forms resulting from this review will be available for use by customers from April 1994.

The Benefits Agency is committed to improving customer services and, therefore, welcomes any suggestions on how it can improve upon its forms.

I hope you find this reply helpful. A copy will appear in the Official Report and a copy will also be placed in the Library.

Lone Parents

Sir David Knox: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will publish a table showing the estimated numbers of lone parents in the United Kingdom in 1963, 1970, 1980, 1990 and 1992 or the nearest years to these for which figures are available, distinguishing where possible between lone fathers and lone mothers and between (a) widowed, (b) divorced or separated and (c) never married lone parents; and what were the numbers and percentages of lone parents in each year who were dependent on (i) supplementary benefit or income support or (ii) family income supplement or family credit.

Mr. Burt: The available information is in the tables. The figures given are for Great Britain as UK figures for the total number of lone parents are unavailable. The first year for which data is available is 1971; figures for the marital status of lone fathers are unavailable.

000s	Lone mothers				Lone mothers	Lone fathers	Total

Child Support Agency

Ms Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security under what circumstances an attachment of earnings order for the collection of child maintenance by the Child Support Agency can be served on an organisation which provides a training programme funded by the European social fund requiring the organisation to make deductions from either (a) a training allowance paid to the trainee or (b) a wage paid to the trainee; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Burt: A deduction from earnings order is made where the Secretary of State decides this is needed to secure the payment of child support maintenance by a liable person; it is an instruction to that person's employer to make deductions from earnings and to pay the amount direct to the Secretary of State. Earnings in this context include wages or salary, from whatever source, but do not include training allowances.

Ms Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security in what ways a full-time training allowance paid to a person participating in European social fund training course is taken into account by the Child Support Agency in assessing maintenance payments when the allowance is (a) paid to the parent with care or (b) paid to the absent parent; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Burt: The treatment of training allowances in the assessment of maintenance by the Child Support Agency does not depend on the source from which they are funded. Allowances under the youth training scheme are ignored. Other training allowances, net of additions such as those for travel or being away from home, are treated as part of the parent's income. These arrangements apply equally to parents with care and absent parents.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to instruct the Child Support Agency to ensure that maintenance payments are phased in over a reasonable period; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Burt: There are existing provisions for phasing in child support maintenance assessments. These provisions apply where an absent parent with a court order or written maintenance agreement has a second family and a new liability of less than £60. In these circumstances the amount of any increase will be limited to £20 for the first 12 months.

Benefit Statistics

Sir David Knox: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people and what percentages of the population, showing families with children, separately, were dependent on national assistance, supplementary benefit and income support in 1963, 1969, 1979, 1989 and the latest year for which figures are available.

Mr. Burt: The information requested is not available for 1963 and 1969. The latest year for which figures are available is 1992.

Information for 1979, 1989 and 1992 is in the tables.

Sir David Knox: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will update each part of the answer given to the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms Harman) of 15 December 1989, Official Report, column 855, showing the distribution of child benefit expenditure according to (a) the gross income bands, (b) the equivalised gross income bands and (c) the equivalised net income bands of recipient families using (i) each band of £5,000 up to £25,000 and (ii) over £25,000.

Mr. Burt: The information is in the tables.

Estimates are given for the combined years of 1990 and 1991. The figures relating to the distribution of gross and net income are calculated on the basis of sample survey data which are subject to normal sampling and response variations. The income levels are based on current weekly family income scaled up to an annual equivalent and may not therefore accurately reflect true annual income, which cannot be reliably measured from the Family Expenditure Surveys.

TOTAL	12,320	4,860

Notes:

1. Estimates do not all sum due to rounding.
2. Estimates are taken from the 1990 and 1991 FES. The second quarter of 1991 data is omitted due to data deficiencies related to the late receipt of revised community charge bills. The reply is based on data used for the "Households Above Average Income" (HBAI) publication. As a result the income and expenditure figures are those recorded at the time of the survey and unlike the previous answer no attempt has been made to project these forward.
3. Gross income is the family's total income from all sources including benefits before housing costs.
4. Equivalence scales are calculated giving a married couple a value of 1·00—the method used in the "HBAI" publication.

Unemployment Benefit

Ms Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his estimate of the number of unemployed people over a full operational year who would lose unemployment benefit if the length of entitlement were reduced from one year to six months; how many of them would be male or female; how many of those men and women would then be eligible for income support; what the net saving to the Exchequer would be; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Burt: An estimated total of 240,000 unemployed people at any one point in an operational year would lose unemployment benefit if the length of entitlement were reduced from one year to six months. Of the 170,000 men, 120,000 would be eligible for income support. Of the 70,000 women, 30,000 would be eligible for income support. Caseloads over a full year are not available. The full year net saving to the Exchequer in 1993-94 would be about £210 million.

All figures are based on an assumption of 2·8 million unemployed and the durational distribution of 1993-94. Rates of benefit are also at 1993-94 levels.

Payment Recovery

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what was the value of payment recovery, resulting from awards of compensation and other similar moneys to claimants, for each year from 1988.

Mr. Scott: The provision of statistical data concerning the amount of monies recovered under the compensation recovery scheme is a matter for Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Mr. M. Bichard to Mr. David Hinchliffe, dated 1 December 1993:

As Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency I am responsible for answering questions on relevant operational matters. I am therefore replying to your recent Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security, asking what was the value of payment recovery, resulting from awards of compensation and other similar monies to claiments, for each year from 1988.

Under the Compensation Recovery provisions, only benefits payable from 1 January 1989 are recoverable. The amounts recovered since that date are as follows:

Period	Amount recovered £ million
3 September 1990 to 31 March 1991	3·7
1 April 1991 to 31 March 1992	25·3
1 April 1992 to 31 March 1993	51·3
1 April 1993 to 31 September 1993 (first half of current financial year)	34·4

Family Credit

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is his current estimate of eligible households in (a) Inverclyde, (b) Strathclyde and (c) Scotland which do not claim family credit; what means are used to improve the take-up rate; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Burt: There have been family credit (FC) advertising campaigns every year since 1989 which have stimulated claims and increased awareness. As a result, the number of people receiving FC has increased from 280,000 in 1989 to around half a million now. The 1993 campaign has involved a major "Back to work" initiative aimed at the unemployed, with FC advertising on television and in the press playing an important part. In addition, the FC helpline was launched in April this year, fulfilling our manifesto pledge. It now receives over 30,000 calls a week.

An important aspect of FC awareness is the personalised message in the child benefit order book (or notification of ACT payment), which tells the family concerned how much earnings they can have and still be eligible for FC. We have also set special fast track procedures for people just starting work which enables the vast majority of urgent claims to FC to be cleared, and payment issued, within one week. And from October 1993, FC awards of £4 a week or less have been paid as a lump sum at the start of the award period. This provides one-off payments of up to £104, encouraging more people to claim and helping with back to work expenses.

The administration of family credit is a matter for Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member with details of the number of FC recipients in Inverclyde, Strathclyde and Scotland.

Letter from Mr. M. Bichard to Dr. Norman Godman, dated 1 December 1993:

The Parliamentary Under Secretary of State for Social Security has asked me to write to you with details of Family Credit recipients in (a) Inverclyde, (b) Strathclyde and (c) Scotland.

I should explain that take-up figures for Family Credit (FC) are not available on a regional basis. However, the latest Policy Study Institute figures (1991) for the take-up of FC for Great Britain, estimate that 71 per cent. of available benefit was claimed.

For your information, I have provided figures to show how many FC recipients there are in Inverclyde, Strathclyde and Scotland as a whole. The figures represent the number of recipients as at 29 October 1993 and are as follows:

	Numbers
Inverclyde	1,902
Strathclyde	24,617
Scotland	58,971

Cold Weather Payments

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security where is the weather station which provides the recordings to enable cold weather payments to be made to citizens resident in Inverclyde; what proposals he has to change the location of the weather station in relation to Inverclyde; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: The administration of the cold weather payments scheme is a matter for Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Mr. M. Bichard to Dr. Norman Godman, dated 1 December 1993:

As Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency, it is my responsibility to answer questions about relevant operational matters. I am therefore replying to your recent Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security, asking where is the weather station which provides the recordings to enable cold weather payments to be made to citizens resident in Inverclyde; what proposals he has to change the location of the weather station in relation to Inverclyde.

The weather station which provides the information used to determine Cold Weather Payments in Inverclyde is Glasgow Airport. There are no proposals to use another weather station for the Inverclyde area.

I home that you find this reply helpful. A copy will appear in the Official Report and a copy will be placed in the Library.

Benefits Agency

Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many disabled persons are employed on (a) a full-time basis and (b) part-time in Benefits Agency local offices in (i) Strathclyde, (ii) Scotland and (iii) elsewhere in Great Britain; what proportion of the staff these employees represent; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Burt: The responsibility for Benefits Agency staff is a matter for Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Mr. M. Bichard to Dr. Norman Godman, dated 1 December 1993:

As Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency it is my responsibility to answer questions about relevant operational matters. I am, therefore, replying to your recent Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security asking how many disabled persons are employed on (a) a full-time basis and (b) part-time in Benefits Agency local offices in (i) Strathclyde, (ii) Scotland and (iii) elsewhere in Great Britain; and what proportion of the staff these employees represent.

Attached at Annex A are the figures requested. I should explain that the figures quoted for disabled staff only relate to those who are registered as disabled. Information is not available for disabled staff who are not registered.

I have attached at Annex B a list of the Agency's local offices which have been included in the figures for Strathclyde.

I hope you find this reply helpful. A copy will appear in the Official Report and a copy will also be placed in the Library.

Student Incomes

Mr. Pickthall: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many students in 1992-93 on further education courses whose parents are on income support, lost the additional allowance and child benefit on achieving their 19th birthday part way through a course; and how many such students failed to complete their studies.

Mr. Burt: This information is not available.

Correspondence

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when the hon. Member for Walsall, North will receive a reply to his letter of 26 October (ref 6/3644/43) and to his letter of 25 October (ref 6/3644/55) and the two letters of 1 November concerning constituents; and if he will give the reason for the delay in answering and why no acknowledgments were sent for the last two letters.

Mr. Burt: I have now sent replies to the hon. Member's letters. Increased levels of correspondence on child support have meant that replies are in some instances taking longer than usual. The temporary lapse in the issue of acknowledgment cards resulted from a computer error.

WALES

Training and Enterprise Councils

Ms Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what powers training and enterprise councils have to switch their allocation of funds between various parts of their budgets; to what extent each TEC in Wales transferred funds from the budgets they were allocated for both youth training and employment training in 1992-93; for what purposes the funds were subsequently allocated; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The operating agreement between the Welsh Office and TECs provides that a TEC may increase or decrease its payment ceiling for youth training or training credits, training for work—which replaced employment training and employment action—compacts, education business partnerships and business and enterprise support by up to a maximum of 5 per cent. of the payment ceiling for each of the initial budgets agreed by the Secretary of State and set out in the business plan, provided that the payment ceiling for the sum of those budgets set out in the business plan shall not be exceeded. Such flexibility enables TECs to respond to local needs that develop in-year.

During the 1992-93 financial year, six of the seven TECs in Wales used this facility to transfer funds from youth training into employment training, employment action and business and enterprise support budgets. Details are shown in the table.

Switches from youth training

TEC	Amount (£)	Additional provision purchased
Gwent	594,226	Employment Training
Mid Glamorgan	702,761	Employment Training
North West Wales	241,959	Employment Training
Powys	140,074	Employment Training
South Glamorgan	68,850	Business and Enterprise Support
West Wales	724,424	Employment Training
		Employment Action
		Business and Enterprise Support

Ms Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what was the outturn expenditure given to each TEC in Wales in 1992-93 at 1993-94 prices; and what is the budget for each TEC in 1993-94 in total and broken down in the same way as given in the answer from the Secretary of State for Employment to the Member for Basingstoke (Mr. Hunter), of 18 February 1993, Official Report, column 335-38.

Sir Wyn Roberts: I will write to the hon. Lady and place a copy of my reply in the Library of the House.

Bomb-proofing

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what has been the cost, by location, of bomb-proofing the Department's premises.

Mr. Redwood: On security grounds, I do not propose to give this information.

Training Schemes

Ms Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many people were participating in (a) training for work (employment training/employment action), (b) community action, (c) learning for work, (d) the business start-up allowance and (e) youth training in each month since March; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The information requested on the numbers participating in the respective training schemes is provided in the table for the first five four-weekly periods of 1993-94.

Figures for learning for work figures are not available for these periods as it did not start until September 1993. Community action is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment.

Wind Power

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what recent communications he has received from the Council for the Protection of Rural Wales on wind power development in the Principality.

Mr. Redwood: The Campaign for the Protection of Rural Wales—CPRW—wrote to me on 22 November setting out its new statement of policy on wind power stations in Wales. The matter was also raised at a meeting I had with it on 23 November 1993.

Energy Policy

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on energy policy in Wales.

Mr. Redwood: As in the rest of the United Kingdom, the aim of the Government's energy policy in Wales is to ensure secure, diverse and sustainable supplies of energy in the forms that people and businesses want, and at competitive prices.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make it his policy to establish an energy policy advisory panel for Wales; and what discussions he has had with the President of the Board of Trade over energy provision in the Principality.

Mr. Redwood: I am satisfied that the Energy Advisory Panel containing representation from Welsh industry, recently set up by my colleague the Minister for Energy to advise the Government on the preparation of an annual energy Report, will cover Welsh interests. I am in frequent contact with the President of the Board of Trade about energy matters in Wales.

Weil's Disease

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list by regional health board for the last five years, and the current year to date, the number of people who have been infected by Weil's disease.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Notifications in Wales of leptospirosis—Weil's disease—for each of the last five years and the current year to date are shown in the table:

Wales	Number

Home Insulation

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what steps he has taken to encourage householders in Wales to install solid wall insulation; what grants are available to assist in such installation; and if he will estimate the amount of energy that could be saved by a major insulation programme on the Welsh housing stock.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: There are no grants for solid wall insulation.

A number of other, more cost-effective techniques, such as loft insulation and draught stripping have been actively promoted through campaigns such as the home energy efficiency scheme and "Helping the Earth begins at Home".

These schemes are being promoted because of the obvious advantages for energy savings and reduced expenditure while no specific estimate is available of the amount of energy that could be saved by a programme of insulation of the Welsh housing stock.

Waste-to-Energy Plants

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what amount of energy used in Wales is provided by waste-to-energy incineration plants; and what applications for such plants he is currently considering.

Mr. Redwood: The amount of energy used in Wales provided by waste-to-energy incineration plants is not readily available.

My colleague the Minister for Energy will be responsible for considering applications for such plants under the third order of the non-fossil fuel obligation which is due next year.

Non-elective Surgery

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the average waiting time for non-elective surgery at Ysbyty Gwynedd, Bangor, Gwynedd; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Patients who require non-elective or emergency surgery do not have to join a waiting list as they are admitted to hospital immediately.

Wales Tourist Board

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list each grant over £25,000 in value made by his Department and the Wales tourist board to tourism-related projects in the principality since 1979; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Wyn Roberts: This information is not readily available and cannot be obtained without disproportionate cost. However, since 1 April 1986 to date, the Wales tourist board has provided grant over £25,000 to 260 separate projects.

From 1987, the board's annual report lists all grant support over £10,000.

Arts Centre, Llandudno

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what proportion of the annual running costs of the new North Wales theatre and arts centre at Llandudno is to be met by his Department; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Wyn Roberts: None.

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what grants his Department has given towards the building of the new North Wales theatre and arts centre at Llandudno; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Wyn Roberts: No grant has been given. Aberconwy borough council was awarded supplementary credit approval of £2 million in 1992-93 towards the capital cost of this project.

Community Care Legislation

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what plans he has to amend the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990 in its application to Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: I shall be considering whether it will be necessary to amend the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990 in order to facilitate the merger of health authorities with family health services authorities. Other than this, I have no plans to propose amendments to the 1990 Act.

Appointments

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish the names of all persons appointed by him and the salaries paid to them; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood: The information requested is contained in "Public Bodies: Appointments made by the Secretary of State for Wales", available in the Library of the House.

Quangos

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the total annual cost of the quangos in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood: This information is shown in the annual publication "Public Bodies", copies of which are available in the Library of the House.

Local Authority Elections

Mr. Alex Carlile: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales on what date in May 1994 elections to existing district councils will take place in Wales; when the last such elections took place; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood: Elections to the four district councils in Wales which have elections by thirds will take place on Thursday 5 May 1994. The last such elections took place in May 1992. The Local Government (Wales) Bill will cancel the elections for all district councils which are due to be held in May 1995.

Health Service, Pembrokeshire

Mr. Ainger: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the review by Mr. Brian Jones, the chief executive of Clywd health authority and Mr. David Galley of the Macleod hospital trust, into the health service in Pembrokeshire; and to what extent the costs of that review are being borne by the Welsh Office.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: I refer the hon. Gentleman to my answer of 23 November 1993, Official Report, column 22.

EDUCATION

Independent Schools

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what is his policy on providing additional funding to independent schools seeking to attain grant-maintained status; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Robin Squire: An independent school cannot be established as a grant-maintained school without first closing. Any funding available to a new GM school could be used only for the purposes of that school. The Secretary of State's approval of applications to establish new GM schools will depend on a variety of factors, including evidence of need for places in the area.

Grant-maintained Schools (Nottinghamshire)

Mr. Hoon: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will identify all the specific purpose grants given to each grant-maintained school in Nottinghamshire for each financial year since 1991-92, including the current year; and if he will give the purpose of each grant.

Mr. Robin Squire: The following self-governing schools in Nottinghamshire have received special purpose grants (SPGs):

School	Amount paid (£) for each financial year 1992-93	1993-94
Greenwood Dale School, Nottingham
SPG (Transitional)	100	47,540
SPG (Development)	—	24,098
SPG (VAT)	—	891
SPG (Premises)	—	4,500
Ravensdale Grant Maintained Middle School, Mansfield
SPG (Transitional)	40,890	—
SPG (Development)	8,999	13,940
SPG (Restructuring)	6,763	—
SPG (VAT)	3,009	4,531
SPG (Premises)	—	2,438
The George Spencer School, Stapleford
SPG (Transitional)	34,410	23,670
SPG (Development)	—	39,780
SPG (Restructuring)	—	13,262
SPG (VAT)	—	12,242
SPG (Premises)	—	4,500

The purpose of each of the SPGs is as follows:

Special Purpose Grant (Transitional)
Available to help with the costs incurred as a result of the school's acquisition of self-governing status.

Special Purpose Grant (Development)
Available to fund management training, staff development and implementation of the national curriculum.

Special Purpose Grant (Restructuring)
Available to help with essential staff restructuring which involves costs arising from premature retirement, redundancy or voluntary severance of teaching staff.

Special Purpose Grant (VAT)
Compensates for the payment of VAT on supplies and services, which self-governing schools may not claim back.

Special Purpose Grant (Premises)
Assists self-governing schools with the additional cost of school premises insurance.

Government Car Service

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what is the annual cost to the Department of the car service for Ministers; and how many vehicles are involved.

Mr. Forth: In the financial year 1992-93, the Government car service for Ministers cost the Department £217,197·48. Five vehicles were involved for the majority of the year. In addition, this figure includes eight days' use of one further vehicle for the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State with responsibility for sport, whose portfolio fell within the remit of the Department for Education until 8 April 1992.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Fish Conservation

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, if she will make it her policy to take steps to suspend the Sea Fish Conservation Act 1993, and replace it with the proposals put forward by the National Federation of Fisherman's Organisations; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Jack: (pursuant to his reply 25 November 1993 c.117): The High Court has now delivered its judgment on the application for judicial review by the National Federation of Fishermen's Organisations. The court noted that there is total agreement between the applicants and the Government that there is a need to prevent overfishing of certain stocks of sea fish by the United Kingdom fleet. Nevertheless, it decided to refer the matter to the European Court of Justice. We are now urgently considering the implications of the judgment for days at sea and related policies, including decommissioning.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Rechar II

Mr. Clapham: To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether it is his Department's policy to support the Rechar II initiative proposed by the European Commission; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury: The future of European structural funds community initiatives has yet to be discussed by the Council of Ministers in Brussels.

Thermal Oxide Reprocessing Plant

Mr. Dafis: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what approval or guidance British Nuclear Fuels plc has been given regarding a delay of 50 years in the decommissioning of THORP following the plant's closure; and what additional financial provision would be required if the plant were to be decommissioned immediately following closure.

Mr. Eggar: The decommissioning of a nuclear facility is a matter for the operators, taking account of the requirements of the regulatory authorities.

Mr. Martyn Jones: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what (a) formal and (b) informal approaches have been made to Her Majesty's Government, from utilities with a contract with British Nuclear Fuels plc for the use of THORP, to cancel or vary the contract or its terms; and what steps have been taken to alert other departments.

Mr. Eggar: None.

Public Appointments

Dr. Marek: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will place in the Library details of all public appointments made by him to public bodies which are concerned exclusively with Wales, in the same form as the Secretary of State for Wales's list dated 1 September.

Mr. Eggar: The details of all public appointments made by my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade to the public bodies which are concerned exclusively with Wales will be placed in the Library of the House.

Company Registration

Mr. Redmond: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what are the current requirements of companies to be registered; with whom they must register; and how many companies are so registered.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: Most Great Britain companies are formed and registered under the Companies Act 1985. They are registered by the Registrar of Companies either in England and Wales or in Scotland

Under the Act there are a number of requirements to be met before a company is registered. The following documents must be delivered to the Registrar:—

the company's memorandum and articles;

particulars of its directors, secretary and intended registered office;

a statutory declaration that all the requirments of the Act in respect of registration have been complied with.

The Registrar may not register a company unless he is satisfied that all such requirements have been complied with, but he may accept the statutory declaration as sufficient evidence of this. He will then issue a certificate of incorporation.

At 31 March 1993 there were 1,136,400 registered companies in Great Britain, of which 175,800 were in liquidation, or in the course of being removed from the register.

Imported Coal

Mr. Redmond: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what are the sources of imported house coal in 1993.

Mr. Eggar: Data on imported coal by sector are estimated and it is assumed that about a quarter of imported steam coal, other than coal for electricity generation, is used in the home. In the first nine months of 1993 the major sources of imported steam coal, which includes imports for use in power stations and industry as well as the domestic sector, were Australia, Colombia, Poland, Russia, South Africa, and the USA.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the quantity and cost of imported (a) industrial and (b) house coal in each year since 1990 and 1993 to date.

Mr. Eggar: The split of imported coal between sectors are estimated, the figures for industrial users and house coal are as follows:

	Industrial[1]		House coal[2]
	Quantity thousand tonnes	Value[3] £ million	Quantity thousand tonnes	Value[3] £ million
1990	850	34	260	10
1991	1,600	57	500	17
1992	2,720	89	880	28
[4]1993	1,070	38	330	11

Source: HM Customs and Excise.

[1] Estimated as 10 per cent. of anthracite imports, plus 75 per cent. of steam coal imports other than coal for electricity generation.

[2] Estimated as 25 per cent. of steam coal imports other than coal for electricity generation.

[3] The value has been based on the average cost of the total steam coal and anthracite imports multiplied by the quantity.

[4] The 1993 figures also include some estimation for intra-EC trade based on information for extra-EC trade pending the availability of full monthly statistics for intra-EC trade from the Central Statistical Office.

European Regional Development Fund

Ms Walley: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what representations he has received concerning the restrictions on local authority capital spending in relation to ERDF funding; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury: Many local authorities in England, Scotland and Wales have written to me and to the Ministers responsible for local authority finance in England, Scotland and Wales. These Ministers have replied to such representations in view of their direct responsibility for the matter.

Enforcement Agencies

Mr. Steen: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the cost of publishing the 70,000 copies of "Working with Business: a code for enforcement agencies," referred to in his answer of 4 November, Official Report, column 345; and if he will list those 70 enforcement agencies which are aiming to publish their own code of practice by 1 January 1994.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: The cost of publishing the 70,000 copies of "Working with Business: a code for enforcement agencies" was £8,296·03. All 70 agencies listed in the code agreed that they were aiming to publish their own codes of practice by 1 January 1994.

Regulations (Impact Assessment)

Mr. Spearing: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list those topics he has so far identified where he believes current statutory Acts or regulations inhibit the operation of economic activity of benefit to the local community or nation stating in each case the relevant instrument, its date of introduction, or its predecessors, when it first came into effect and its general purpose.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: As part of the deregulation initiative, Government Departments are currently reviewing all legislation which impacts on business, considering whether the legislation remains necessary and, if so, whether it achieves its objective in a way which is proportionate and imposes the minimum burden on business. The reviews are scheduled to be completed by April 1994. In addition the Government have appointed eight task forces from business and the voluntary sector to make recommendations on priorities for amendment or repeal. These recommendations will be published in due course. The Deregulation Bill announced in the Gracious Speech will address changes which require primary legislation. Its contents will be published in the usual way when the Bill is introduced.

Brewery Industry

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what steps are being taken by his Department to ensure that individual brewers are making it possible for the lessees to sell a guest beer.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: The requirement to allow tenants to sell a guest beer is one of the provisions of the Beer Orders. Monitoring compliance with the Beer Orders is the responsibility of the Director General of Fair Trading. I have therefore written to him, asking that his office reply to your question as soon as possible.

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he will place in the Library the evidence available to his Department to show that the brewing companies have carried out their obligation under the Beer Orders (a) to free a certain percentage of public houses and (b) to allow a guest beer.

Mr. Neil Hamilton: Monitoring compliance with the Beer Orders is the responsibility of the Director General of Fair Trading (DGFT). Information which is supplied by the brewers to the OFT about the composition of their estates is commercially confidential. However, I have written to the DGFT, asking that his office write to you explaining the position as soon as possible.

EC Internal Market Council

Mr. Barnes: To ask the president of the Board of Trade, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Members for Gateshead, East (Ms Quinn) and for Blaenau Gwent (Mr. Smith) of 24 November, Official Report, column 92, what was the voting record of member states on (a) the adoption of food additive common positions and (b) its common position on equipment for use in explosive atmospheres at the meeting of the European Community's Internal Market Council held on 11 November; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin: On food additives, the framework directive and sweeteners common positions were adopted unanimously at the Internal Market Council on 11 November. The common position on colours was adopted by qualified majority with Netherlands and Luxembourg voting against and Germany and Denmark abstaining.

The common position on equipment for use in explosive atmospheres was agreed unanimously.

Coal Industry

Mr. Booth: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will make a statement on the legislation governing rights of access to coal and other minerals in the light of the privatisation of the coal industry.

Mr. Eggar: At present, under the Opencast Coal Act 1958, British Coal has access to special procedures governing the compulsory acquisition of rights to explore for and work opencast coal, and related matters. These procedures are not available to other mineral industries. The Government do not regard it as satisfactory in the longer term for the coal industry to have access to special procedures which are not generally available. However, a period of transition is needed before an alternative regime is put in place.

Under the Coal Industry Bill published today, the provisions of the Opencast Coal Act 1958 will continue to be available to coal operators, within a modified framework offering improved safeguards for the interests of landowners, up to 31 December 1999 but not thereafter. After the end of this transitional period, the Government intend that the procedures for opencast coal should be unified with the general regime for all minerals contained in the Mines (Working Facilities and Support) Act 1966 and 1974.

My Department will therefore be conducting a review of the general provisions contained in the Mines (Working Facilities and Support) Acts to determine what amendment, revision or reform to the legislation is appropriate to provide an integrated regime for the next century. The review will have regard to the need to exploit the country's mineral resources including coal, to the perception that current procedures under the Mines (Working Facilities and Support) Acts are expensive and time consuming, and to the need to protect the rights of land owners.

Following initial consideration of the issues, I intend to publish a consultative document in due course. I invite those interested in submitting representations or evidence for the preparation of the consultative document to write to me by 31 January 1994.

Mr. Duncan Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will announce the Government's proposals for British Coal pensions after privatisation.

Mr. Eggar: In September the Government published a consultation paper on proposals for British Coal pensions after privatisation. Comments have been received from the trustees of British Coal pension schemes, from the corporation, from industry unions and from over one thousand individuals.

Careful consideration has been given to all responses to the consultation paper. In the light of these responses, and taking full account of the recent recommendations of the Pension Law Review Committee, the Government have decided that:

Existing schemes

(i) all pensioners and deferred pensioners of the mineworkers pension scheme (MPS) and British Coal staff superannuation scheme (SSS) and all currently contributing members would be able to leave their past-service entitlements in the schemes at privatisation, if they so choose;

(ii) the MPS and SSS would be closed to new members at privatisation and the new private-sector owners of the industry would not participate in them;

(iii) the Coal Industry Bill would provide for both the MPS and SSS to be given a Government solvency guarantee that would ensure that pensions and deferred pensions are increased after privatisation in line with the retail price index (RPI) by reference to their level at privatisation;

(iv) beneficiaries would in addition be able to benefit from any fund surpluses through pension payment increases over and above RPI levels, but surpluses, and benefits from them, will not be subject to guarantee from the taxpayer;

(v) provision would be made for the beneficiaries and the Government, as guarantor, to receive equal shares of any distributable surplus;

(vi) in order to assist the management of the funds any share of surplus payable to the Government would only be receivable in equal installments over a 10-year period;

(vii) deficiency payments due under the guarantee would also be payable over 10 years;

(viii) existing obligations on British Coal to make 'additional contributions' in respect of early and enhanced pensions would be honoured in full by the Government;

(ix) there would be triennial valuations of the schemes, as at present, and if a valuation subsequent to a deficiency reveals a surplus, or vice versa, there should be an immediate settling of balances before further payments by or to Government are determined (including a safeguard to ensure that beneficiaries and Government have received equal shares of any unsustained surplus distribution);

(x) the Coal Industry Bill would provide for the rules of the MPS and SSS to be modified in order to give effect to the necessary changes;

(xi) the Bill would also safeguard the interests of the taxpayer, as ultimate guarantor, by providing for the Government to be able to secure that the trustees of the MPS and SSS have proper regard to the interest of the taxpayer in performing their fiduciary duties (the precise details of how this safeguard would operate in practice are still under discussion with the trustees and the Corporation and will be contained in Regulations and scheme documents which are yet to be published);

New industry-wide schemes

(xii) new pension schemes would be created for employees of British Coal and its subsidiaries who are transferred to employment in successor companies;

(xiii) the new schemes would follow on, separately, from the MPS and SSS and would be required by statutory regulations to provide the same package of benefits as the corresponding existing scheme;

(xiv) the Coal Industry Bill would provide protected person status for employees transferred to the new schemes and the schemes would contain measures regarding their maintenance, membership, use of surpluses and any eventual winding up;

(xv) the new schemes would operate on an industry-wide basis and the Coal Industry Bill would provide for all new employers of protected employees to participate in the schemes;

(xvi) continuing employees would be able to transfer their past-service entitlements to the new schemes if they so choose or they would alternatively be able to transfer them to another scheme operated by their new employer, depending on its terms, or to a personal pension scheme;

(xvii) the Coal Industry Bill would provide for the new Coal Authority to make pension provision for its employees, including any transferred from British Coal.

The Government believe that these proposals meet in full its commitment to protect MPS and SSS pensions. The proposals will provide security for pension entitlements earned from service with British Coal and will provide protection for pension entitlements from future service with successor companies. The Coal Industry Bill would provide the necessary statutory underpinning for all the safeguards proposed.

It is intended that drafts of the regulations giving statutory effect to the details of the new arrangements would be made available during Commons consideration of the Bill.

The consultation paper on British Coal pensions listed in an appendix a number of other pension schemes with which British Coal is involved. The Government will be assuming responsibility for the six unfunded pension arrangements listed in the appendix. From discussions with trustees and scheme representatives it appears that pension entitlements from all of the funded pension schemes listed in the appendix can be adequately safeguarded without direct Government involvement through guarantees or statutory protection. The Government are nevertheless taking a close interest in the future arrangements that are being proposed and will report to Parliament on them in due course.

Konver Programme

313. Mr. Simon Burns (Chelmsford): To ask the President of the Board of Trade, when he expects to announce his decisions on the bids for Konver funding by Essex county council and others; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury [pursuant to his reply 25 November 1993, column 112]: I am pleased to announce that grants totalling £15·6 million have been approved to 150 applicants under the United Kingdom's Konver programme, including grants of over £350,000 to Essex. There was keen competition for the grant available. The successful projects are of high quality. I expect them to bring real benefits to the areas which are dependent on defence spending.

I am placing a copy of the list of grants approved in the Library of the House.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Bomb-proofing

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Attorney-General what has been the cost, by location, of bomb-proofing the Department's premises.

The Attorney-General: On security grounds, I do not propose to give this information.

UDR Four

Mr. Davidson: To ask the Attorney-General what was the date of the Appeal Court hearing in Northern Ireland at which three of the UDR Four were released; what were the recommendations of the court about prosecutions of persons involved in the case; what action has been taken by the Director of Public Prosecutions for Northern Ireland; what matters remain upon which the Director of Public Prosecutions for Northern Ireland has yet to make a decision; and when the expects such decisions to be taken.

The Attorney-General: The Court of Appeal for Northern Ireland delivered its judgment in the appeal of R v. Neil Fraser Latimer, James Irwin Hegan, Noel Richmond Bell and Alfred Winston Allen on 29 July 1992.

The court made no recommendations in respect of prosecutions. The court directed that its judgment be sent to the Director of Public Prosecutions for Northern Ireland so that he could consider the bringing of prosecutions against officers who he considered had committed criminal offences in connection with the trial of the appellants.

On 5 August 1992, 10 February 1993 and 27 April 1993, the director issued interim directions to the Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary requesting that further reports, information and witness statements be obtained. When these had been received, the director considered all the facts and information before him. In Northern Ireland the test for prosecution applied by the director is that criminal proceedings are instituted where he is satisfied that the evidence which can be adduced in court is sufficient to provide a reasonable prospect of obtaining a conviction and that such proceedings are in the public interest.

The director concluded that the evidence in this case was sufficient to warrant prosecution of a number of individuals. Accordingly, on 26 July 1993, the director issued a direction to prosecute three serving and two former members of the Royal Ulster Constabulary for offences of perjury and doing acts with intent to pervert the course of public justice in connection with the trial of the appellants. The director further concluded that the evidence was insufficient to institute criminal proceedings in respect of any other police officers who had been the subject of report. There were a number of other matters in respect of which the director requested the Chief Constable to carry out inquiries. Additional papers have now been received from police and are presently being considered.

Subsequently, a solicitor acting on behalf of one of the persons in respect of whom prosecution had been directed, submitted a medical report. The director then arranged that this person be independently examined by a consultant physician and a further report obtained. When this report had been received and considered, the director concluded that the prosecution of that individual should not proceed. Accordingly, a direction of no prosecution was issued on 1 September 1993.

Roger Levitt

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Attorney-General if he will investigate the conduct of the case against Roger Levitt.

The Attorney-General: I have investigated the conduct of the case against Mr. Levitt and I am satisfied that the prosecution by the Serious Fraud Office was fairly, properly and vigorously conducted.

Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Attorney-General if he will refer the case of Roger Levitt to the Court of Appeal.

The Attorney-General: Rulings of the trial judge in the course of the trial related to matters within his discretion and are not matters of law which can be referred to the Court of Appeal under section 36 of the Criminal Justice Act 1972.

Sentencing is always a matter for the independent judiciary. The Attorney-General has power, under the Criminal Justice Act 1988, to refer unduly lenient sentences to the Court of Appeal in respect of offences which are triable exclusively on indictment. Fraudulent trading is an offence triable either on indictment or summarily and therefore, under the present law, sentences imposed for it cannot be referred to the Court of Appeal.

Written Answers to Questions

Friday 3 December 1993

LORD CHANCELLOR'S DEPARTMENT

Immigration Appeals Office

Mr. Madden: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what was the establishment of the immigration appeals office in London and (a) in each of the past five years and (b) in the current year; what plans there are to increase the staff establishment and the number of adjudicators in (i) London and (ii) Leeds.

Mr. John M. Taylor: Staff establishment levels in past years at the immigration appellate authorities—IAA—are available only for the IAA as a whole and not for individual centres. The figures in each of the past five years were as follows:

	Numbers
1989-90	77
1990-91	94½
1991-92	97
1992-93	95½
1993-94	117

The number of staff allocated to the centre at Thanet house in London for the year 1993-94 is 63.

There are currently no plans to increase either the staff establishment or the number of adjudicators at either Thanet house in London or in Leeds, although these will be kept under review in light of the current and projected workloads.

Mr. Madden: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department what is the total number of appeals awaiting processing by the immigration appeals office in London; what is the average time taken between the receipt of papers from British overseas posts and the listing of appeals before adjudictors, in (a) the United Kingdom and (b) Leeds: what action he is taking to expedite the hearing of appeals; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John M. Taylor: As of 31 October 1993 there were 19,074 appeals outstanding before the adjudicators within the IAA as a whole. As of 26 November 1993, there were 324 appeals which had been received at Thanet house in London and had not yet been processed.

Figures are not available for the average time taken between the receipt of papers from British overseas posts and the listing of appeals before adjudicators. However, upon receipt of the explanatory statement and notice of appeal from the post overseas, the IAA normally dispatches copies of the case papers to to the parties' representatives in the country within five days. The parties must then prepare the case for the hearing. The current average time between the IAA receiving a certificate of readiness from a party to the date of the hearing for (a) the United Kingdom and (b) Leeds is as follows:

	Short appointment	Long appointment
(a)	12 weeks	13½ weeks
(b)	9 weeks	12 weeks

Where an earlier hearing date is available at a different IAA centre, appellants are offered a hearing at that centre.

Departmental Files

Mr. Byers: To ask the Parliamentary Secretary, Lord Chancellor's Department how many files marked "not for National Audit Office eyes" are held by his Department.

Mr. John M. Taylor: There are 45 files in the Lord Chancellor's Department—out of a total of 90,974 files—marked "not for NAO eyes". These refer to individual file parts. For each NAO study a number of divisions may be involved and each may possess a file with a number of parts.

The marking "not for NAO eyes" is used in accordance with an agreement between the Treasury and the National Audit Office under which documents relating to the handling of relations between Departments and the NAO and Public Accounts Committee are not automatically available to the NAO while they are current.

EDUCATION

Advertising

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how much his Department spends annually on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising and (c) press advertising; and what were the corresponding figures for 1985 and 1979.

Mr. Forth: The latest estimate of expenditure on advertising in the current financial year and the corresponding figures for 1985-86 and 1979-80 are as follows:

	£000s 1993-94 (estimated)	£000s 1985-86	£000s 1979-80
Radio advertising	29·2	0	0

Press and Publicity Officers

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many press and publicity officers are currently employed in his Department; and how many were employed in (a) 1985 and (b) 1979.

Mr. Forth: The Department currently employs 27 permanent press and publicity officers. The comparable figures for 1985-86 and 1979-80 are 23 and 22.

Information Security

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Education whether he has incorporated the code of practice for information security management, published by the British Standards Institution, into relevant contracts with information technology suppliers.

Mr. Forth: The code of practice for information security management was developed by and established for use by commercial organisations and does not specifically address the requirements for the protection of official information. The security requirements for IT systems and services used by central Government Departments are stated in the Government's IT security policy document. The IT security policy is supported by use of the CCTA risk analysis and management method—CRAMM—and baseline security for IT systems—BSITS—risk analysis methods and by supporting advice and guidance published by the Government IT security authorities. These are regularly reviewed to ensure best practice, have been developed specifically for use within government and have been in operation for some time.

The Department for Education's IS security policy is in line with the Government's IT security policy and all major contracts with information technology suppliers follow the guidelines in Central Computer and Telecommunications Agency—CCTA—model agreements.

Teachers (Dress)

Lady Olga Maitland: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what guidelines he plans to offer to teachers about their form of dress.

Mr. Robin Squire: My right hon. Friend expects teachers to set a good example to their pupils in everything they do. How best to achieve that is for local determination. He has no plans to issue national guidelines.

School Meals Service

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Education if he will make a statement on the future of the school meals service.

Mr. Forth: Local education authorities and, where appropriate, governing bodies of self-governing—grant-maintained—schools have responsibility for providing school meals, and determine the appropriate level of service in the light of local priorities.

Departmental Files

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Education how many files marked "not for National Audit Office eyes" are held by his Department.

Mr. Forth: The Department has 39 files—out of a total of over 500,000—marked "not for NAO eyes".

This marking is used in accordance with the agreement between the Treasury and the National Audit Office under which documents relating to the handling of relations between Departments and the NAO and Public Accounts Committee are not automatically available to the NAO while they remain current.

Fitzherbert School, Brighton

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what has been the total cost of providing security at the former Fitzherbert school site in Brighton during the period it was in the ownership of the City Technology Colleges Trust and the Michael Faraday Trust.

Mr. Robin Squire: The cost of providing security at the former Fitzherbert school site in Brighton during the said period was some £233,000.

Student Loans Company

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Education what was the cost of acquiring the Student Loans Company from its previous owners.

Mr. Forth: The Government acquired the Student Loans Company in December 1989 at a cost of £10.

City Technology Colleges

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Education for each city technology college, what is the amount of Government grant received each year since establishment, the pupil roll for each year and the amount of private sector sponsorship received each year.

Mr. Robin Squire: Grants approved for payment by the Department to each city technology college for recurrent funding purposes in the current academic year are shown in the table, together with the numbers of funded pupils.

Amounts of grant include provision for diseconomies of scale during the build up of colleges to full capacity and for services provided by local education authorities to their schools.

As for all other schools, any additional funding by private sector sponsors for recurrent expenditure purposes is a matter for the schools and sponsors concerned.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Incitement to Racial Hatred

Mr. Shore: To ask the Attorney-General how many cases of incitement to racial hatred under the Public Order Act 1986 were referred to him by the Crown Prosecution Service in each year since 1987; how many were not proceeded with (a) through insufficient evidence, (b) because prosecution was judged not to be in the public interest and (c) for other reasons.

The Solicitor-General: I am causing inquiries to be made into the matters raised by the right hon. Member and I will reply as soon as possible.

Serious Fraud Office

Mr. Mates: To ask the Attorney-General if he has anything to add to his statement to the House on 30 June concerning the Serious Fraud Office.

The Attorney-General: Shortly after my statement to the House about the Serious Fraud Office on 30 June 1993 at column 965, Mr. Asil Nadir's former solicitor, Mr. Peter Knight of Vizards, wrote in response to a general invitation from the director of the Serious Fraud Office that those concerned about the working of the office should bring specific anxieties to his attention. Mr. Knight wanted the Serious Fraud Office to give further consideration, among other things, to its handling of privileged papers during the preparation of its case against Mr. Nadir.

The director has therefore looked into this matter again, in great detail, and has now written to Mr. Knight. I am placing the exchange of letters in the Library. The director's findings show that my statement, responding to the personal statement by my hon. Friend the Member for East Hampshire (Mr. Mates) on 29 June at column 823, was incomplete on the issue of privileged papers and therefore misleading. I am taking the earliest opportunity to correct this.

In April 1991 the Serious Fraud Office acknowledged to Mr. Nadir's solicitors that two sealed bags of documents subject to a claim for privilege had been opened in January and February in breach of an undertaking given to the solicitors on 5 December 1990. Documents, which the Serious Fraud Office understood and still believes were not privileged, had been copied to the administrators of Polly Peck International Plc—PPI. This breach of the Serious Fraud Office's undertaking, which it regretted, was acknowledged in my statement and in my predecessor's letter to my hon. Friend the Member for East Hampshire dated 20 October 1991 which is already in the Library.

However, it now appears that copies of privileged documents were circulated to the prosecution team on two occasions. The first occasion was on 26 November 1990, before the giving of the undertaking but after a general claim for privilege had been made by Mr. Nadir's solicitors. In error, copies of these privileged documents formed a small part of a very large distribution of documents routinely copied and circulated to the prosecution team after the search at PPI. The administrators of the company were entitled to access to the vast majority of these documents and were therefore given access to the circulated copy documents, including—apparently because the mistake was not then recognised—access to and copies of certain privileged material. The second occasion was on 10 January 1991 when copies of documents seized from Mr. Nadir on his arrest were circulated to the prosecution team in the apparent belief that the documents in question could not from their description be privileged, despite the fact that a claim had been made by Mr. Nadir's solicitors.

I regret that the fact that copies of privileged documents had been circulated was not acknowledged by the then case controller to Mr. Nadir's solicitors, and that no decisive attempt was made to retrieve them until December 1991, despite Vizards' frequently expressed concern about the matter and the fact that the then case controller appears to have recognised at least by January 1991 that copies of potentially privileged documents had been circulated. The reason is being pursued further by the director of the Serious Fraud Office. It is, however, right to say that the director of the Serious Fraud Office is not aware of any attempt to use the documents in conscious breach of privilege when preparing the prosecution case, although on two occasions privileged documents were used, apparently inadvertently.

A thorough check has been made of files of the prosecution team to seek to ensure that all copies of the privileged documents have now been retrieved. Remaining copy documents found on two master files have been secured. However, by reason of the system agreed between the parties, only Mr. Nadir's former solicitors knew precisely which documents had been adjudged by independent counsel to be privileged. Mr. Nadir's former solicitors are therefore being invited, at the Crown's expense, to provide full details to an independent counsel of all privileged documents taken from PPI and Mr. Nadir. The counsel will then be given full access to papers under the Serious Fraud Office's control to ensure that no privileged documents have been overlooked. The administrators will also be asked to co-operate in giving access to their documents.

Should Mr. Nadir believe that he has suffered prejudice as a result of what has occurred, he can raise this with the trial judge at the appropriate time. The prosecution would in any event bring the matter to the judge's attention.

Since my statement no futher evidence has come to light to substantiate any of the other allegations which have been made about the Serious Fraud Office's handling of Mr. Nadir's prosecution. I do not believe that the facts disclosed today, although regrettable, justify the independent investigation called for by my hon. Friend the Member for East Hampshire last June. Moreover, as I said in response to his personal statement there is no precedent for an independent inquiry in parallel to a trial. Mr. Nadir has already made the handling of his case by the authorities an issue in the case and the trial process itself is designed to deal with this. The right course remains for Mr. Nadir to return to this country to face trial; and, should he wish to make any complaints about the prosecution's handling of his case, to raise them with the trial judge.

TRANSPORT

Ashford International Station

Sir Keith Speed: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on the up-to-date funding position for Ashford international station.

Mr. Freeman: The position remains that we have made provision for expenditure by British Rail to cover the track, signalling, platform and other railway works which were inaugurated by the hon. Member on 20 October. The station buildings, car parking and other facilities will be provided by the private sector; British Rail has received bids and is now evaluating these. It hopes to make a statement shortly.

Public Sector Projects

Sir Keith Speed: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the public sector transport projects where he is looking to private sector funding in whole or part and their estimated cost.

Mr. Norris: My right hon. Friend has announced that the following projects are being considered for private sector funding in whole or in part. Private sector funding has already been secured for a number of major transport projects.

Project	Estimated cost £ million
Channel Tunnel Rail Link	3,000
Crossrail	3,000
Upgrading of west coast main line	400-600
Birmingham western orbital route	500
Croydon Tramlink	135
Midland Metro Line One	130
New Tamar crossing	100
Lower Thames crossing	[1]
Mersey crossing	100
New Scottish air traffic control centre	200

Seat Belts (Buses)

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many representations he has received on fitting compulsory seat belts in buses; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Key: The Department has received more than 200 letters from hon. Members and members of the public in the last three months calling for seat belts to be fitted in buses, coaches and minibuses. The Department is currently reviewing the full technical and cost implications of the compulsory fitment of seat belts in minibuses and coaches. It would not be right to take any decisions before we have considered the full reports of the recent tragic accidents and this work has been completed.

Coaches

Sir Dudley Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received on the effects of the 17-tonne gross vehicle weight limit on passenger coach manufacturers and operators in the United Kingdom; and when he plans to raise coach limit to 18 tonnes to conform with that of other EU countries.

Mr. Key: I have received a number of representations requesting an increase to the maximum permitted weight for coaches to 18 tonnes. Unfortunately, it is not practical to increase the gross weight without allowing for a higher weight on the drive axle. The Department is at present engaged on an exercise to assess and upgrade all the bridges in the United Kingdom to accept a heavier axle load. When this assessment is complete I shall be in a position to consider such an increase.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what proposals (a) he and (b) the EC has to introduce seat belts in all new coaches as a legal requirement; what is his estimate of when such a new law is likely to be applied; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Key: The Department is currently reviewing the full technical and cost implications of the compulsory fitment of seat belts in new coaches. Until this work has been completed and we have considered the full reports of the recent accidents we do not feel that it would be right to take any decisions on this question.

To date, there has not been the support necessary from member states for the EC to make seat belt fitment on all seats a mandatory requirement.

Spofforth Bypass

Mr. Robert Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether tenders have been submitted for the construction of the Spofforth bypass, near Harrogate; and when he expects the work to commence.

Mr. Key: These are matters for the highway authority concerned—North Yorkshire county council.

Port of London Authority

Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what arrangements he has made for the financial reconstruction of the Port of London authority following the privatisation of the port of Tilbury.

Mr. MacGregor: I have concluded with the Port of London authority—PLA—an agreement under which the PLA has paid my Department £1·851 million from its capital reserve. PLA will in addition make further payments to my Department, at the end of each financial year ending on 31 December, of sums representing both the profits of the PLA's property management company, Port of London Properties Ltd.—POLP—and the net proceeds from their disposal of specified properties owned by the PLA and its subsidiaries. These properties were valued at some £35 million at December 1992. A sum of £951,000 has been paid to my Department in respect of the year ending 31 December 1992.

These payments will be taken in payment of the repayable grants totalling some £147 million made to the PLA under the Ports (Financial Assistance) Acts of 1980 and 1981. The PLA's outstanding liability in respect of these repayable grants will be progressively reduced as these payments are made to my Department. When all of the specified properties have been disposed of, POLP will be wound up and the Department will relinquish its rights to any remaining repayable grants.

This agreement has advantages for both parties over the previous arrangements for the repayment of the repayable grants. For the Government, it has provided a more certain prospect of substantial receipts than under the time-limited conditions attached to those arrangements. For the PLA, it has removed a substantial contingent liability, which was a disincentive to sound financial management of the business.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Family Credit

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what assessment he has made of the extent of the delays currently affecting applications for family credit; and if he will take steps to ensure that all outstanding claims can be dealt with and completed before Christmas.

Mr. Ancram: Responsibility for the subject in question has been delegated to the Social Security Agency under its chief executive, Mr. Alec Wylie. I have asked him to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Mr. A. Wylie to Mr. Seamus Mallon, dated 30 November 1993:

The Secretary of State has asked me to reply to your Parliamentary Question about delays affecting Family Credit claims and if the outstanding claims can be cleared before Christmas.

From April 1993 to October 1993 some 34,000 claims to Family Credit were received of which 89% were successful. The number of claims represents an increase of 21% over the same period last year. At the same time a new computer system for processing claims was introduced which brings a certain amount of disruption to the work and inevitably causes a slowdown in output during the first few months.

A recovery programme has been introduced to deal with the outstanding claims and I am confident that by 31 January 1994 we will have brought the situation back to normal.

I hope this explains the position for you and I am sorry for any inconvenience that has been caused to our customers.

Prison Officers

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans he has to review the employment status of prison officers in Northern Ireland.

Sir John Wheeler: I have reviewed the employment status of prison officers in Northern Ireland in the light of the temporary injunction granted to the Home Secretary against the calling of industrial action in the Prison Service in England and Wales. I have concluded that the employment status of prison officers in Northern Ireland should match that in England and Wales.

Legislation will therefore be introduced this Session confirming that it is unlawful for organisations representing prison officers in Northern Ireland to call for industrial action. This will also apply to organisations representing prison officers in the rest of the United Kingdom. At the same time the legislation will extend normal trade union status to organisations representing prison officers in Northern Ireland. It will also extend to prison officers the appropriate elements of employment protection legislation, including access to industrial tribunals, on a basis comparable to that for other workers. There will also be provision for regulations to be made to establish procedures for settling the remuneration of the staff concerned.

My officials will be in discussion with representatives of prison officers in Northern Ireland about these provisions.

NATIONAL HERITAGE

Departmental Files

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for National Heritage how many files marked "not for National Audit Office eyes" are held by his Department.

Mr. Sproat: My Department, which was established in April 1992, has not yet reviewed the full range of files inherited from former parent Departments and it is not possible to give a figure for those bearing a marking "not for NAO eyes". Since April 1992 DNH has opened a very small number of new files with this marking.

The marking "not for NAO eyes" is used in accordance with an agreement between the Treasury and the National Audit Office under which documents relating to the handling of relations between Departments and the NAO and Public Accounts Committee are not automatically available to the NAO while they are current.

WALES

Government Car Service

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is the annual cost to the Department of the car service for Ministers; and how many vehicles are involved.

Mr. Redwood: The estimated cost of providing a car service for Ministers during the 1993-94 financial year is £161,000. There are four official cars, including two based in Cardiff.

Coal Industry

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will publish a table showing for each year since 1979 the number of operating deep-mine coal pits, the annual output of mined coal, and the amount of coal exported from and imported into Wales; and if he will estimate the total value to the Welsh economy of the coal mined from deep pits over the period since 1979.

Mr. Redwood: The number of deep-mine coal pits and their annual output for each year since 1979 is shown in the following table.

The remainder of the information is not readily available.

Year (to 31 March)	Number of deep mines in Wales	Output (thousand tonnes)
1979	39	8,415
1980	38	8,304
1981	36	8,356
1982	35	8,240
1983	35	7,625
1984	30	7,237
1985	30	628
1986	19	7,310
1987	15	7,062
1988	12	5,460
1989	10	5,530
1990	6	4,040
1991	5	3,740
1992	4	2,300

Public Appointments

Mr. Gareth Wardell: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many of the persons currently serving on non-departmental public bodies in Wales as appointed by him had not been included in the register held by the Welsh Office for public appointments.

Mr. Redwood: The information is not collected centrally and could be supplied only at disproportionate cost.

Direct Service/Labour Organisations

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many contracts awarded to Welsh local authority direct service/labour organisations have not been subject to the issuing of a section 13 or 14 notice, alleging anti-competitive behaviour under the terms of the Local Government Act 1988; and on how many occasions such actions have been taken.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Information on the total number of contracts awarded is not held centrally. Only one authority has received a section 13 notice and section 14 direction. One other authority has received a section 13 notice.

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) how many local authority direct service/labour organisations operating contracts in Wales under the terms of the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980 have achieved the required rate of return since 1988;

(2) if he will list, by authority, the surplus achieved since 1988 on trading accounts for (a) refuse collection, (b) street cleaning, (c) building cleaning, (d) schools and welfare catering, (e) other catering, (f) vehicle maintenance, (g) grounds maintenance and (h) sports and leisure management services delivered by direct service/labour organisations, under the terms of the Local Government Act 1988;

(3) if he will list, by authority, the surplus achieved since 1988 on trading accounts for (a) general highways work, (b) construction and maintenance of sewers, (c) works of new construction and (d) maintenance work delivered by direct service/labour organisations in Wales under the terms of the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980;

(4) if he will list by authority and service area, as defined by the Local Government Act 1988, the surpluses achieved by local authority direct service/labour organisations in Wales;

(5) if he will list by authoity and service area, as defined by the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980, the surpluses achieved by local authority direct service/labour organisations in Wales since 1988;

(6) how many local authority direct service/labour organisations, operating contracts in Wales under the terms of the Local Government Act 1988, have achieved the required rate of return since 1988.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: I shall write to the hon. Gentleman and place a copy of my letter in the Library of the House.

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many contracts awarded to Welsh local authority direct service/labour organisations have not been subject to the issuing of a section 19A or 19B notice, alleging anti-competitive behaviour under the terms of the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980; and on how many occasions such actions were taken.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: Information on the total number of contracts awarded is not held centrally. Only one authority has received a section 19A notice and section 19B direction.

Local Government Administration

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list the authorities that have been challenged by his Department, in relation to their internal arrangements for establishing client-contractor splits in order to meet the requirements of the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980 and the Local Government Act 1988.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: None.

Surcharged Councillors

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales (1) how many councillors in Wales have been surcharged or prosecuted as a consequence of taking decisions in relation to the Local Government Act 1988;

(2) how many councillors in Wales have been surcharged or prosecuted as a consequence of taking decisions in relation to the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980.

Mr. Gwilym Jones: None to my knowledge.

Departmental Files

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how many files marked "not for National Audit Office eyes" are held by his Department.

Mr. Redwood: There are 97 files in my Department marked "not for NAO eyes". These figures refer to individual jackets—file parts. For each NAO study a number of divisions may be involved and each may possess a file with a number of parts.

The marking "not for NAO eyes" is used in accordance with an agreement between the Treasury and the National Audit Office, under which documents relating to the handling of relations between Department and the NAO and Public Accounts Committee are not automatically available to the NAO while they are current.

DUCHY OF LANCASTER

Press and Publicity Officers

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how many press and publicity officers are currently employed in his Department; and how many were employed in (a) 1985 and (b) 1979.

Mr. David Davis: The Office of Public Services and Science employs seven members of the Government information service in its information division. The Department did not exist in any comparable form before 1992. Figures for earlier years are not therefore available.

Departmental Files

Mr. Byers: To ask the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster how many files marked "not for National Audit Office eyes" are held by his Department.

Mr. Davis: The marking "not for NAO eyes" is used in accordance with an agreement between the Treasury and the National Audit Office—NAO—under which documents relating to the handling of relations between departments, the NAO and the Public Accounts Committee —PAC—are not automatically available to the NAO while they are current; 122 Cabinet Office and Office of Public Service and Science files are so designated.

ENVIRONMENT

Housing

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received in the last three years in relation to housing problems in England (a) from local authorities, (b) from housing associations and (c) from other sources; and if he will make a statement.

Sir George Young: My Department regularly discusses housing problems and successes with local authorities, housing associations and others. We value their contribution to policy development. Local housing authorities discuss their strategies and expenditure priorities each year with Ministers and with departmental officials as part of the annual housing investment programme resource allocation process; developing housing associations have similar discusions with the Housing Corporation. Twice a year I discuss local authority housing issues with representatives of the local authority associations in the Housing Consultative Council. In addition, we receive responses to consultation papers, and there is a wide range of formal and informal contact with local authorities and housing associations, and with Members of Parliament, members of the public, voluntary organisations and the private sector.

Green Belt

Mr. Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment on how many occasions since 1960 he has used his powers under section 5(1) of the Green Belt (London and Home Counties) Act 1938 to refuse his consent to the disposal by a local authority or parish council of green belt land to which the section applies; and what are his criteria for refusing consent in the future.

Mr. Baldry: This information is not avilable, except at disproportionate cost. Consent has been refused on one occasion since January 1991. In that case the land was not designated as metropolitan green belt in a development plan. My right hon. Friend's primary concern in determining applications is to ensure that the land continues to fulfil the objectives of the 1938 Act and of green belt policy as set out in planning policy guidance note 2.

Council Tax Arrears

Ms Short: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment under what circumstances an attachment of earnings order for the recovery of council tax or community charge arrears can be served on an organisation which provides a training programme funded by the European social fund requiring the organisation to make deductions from (a) a training allowance paid to the trainee or (b) a wage paid to the trainee; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Baldry: A billing authority may serve an attachment of earnings order in respect of arrears of community charge or council tax on an employer following the issue of a liability order by a magistrates court. Deductions may be made from the net earnings as defined in regulation 32 of the Council Tax (Administration and Enforcement) Regulations 1992 and regulation 27 of the Community Charge (Administration and Enforcement) Regulations 1989.

Market Franchise Rights, Doncaster

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has had from Doncaster metropolitan district council in regard to proposals on market franchise rights; what reply he has sent; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Baldry: We have received representations from the council objecting to our proposal. All representations, both for and against the proposal, will be fully considered before any decision is made.

Bomb-proofing

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what has been the cost, by location, of bomb-proofing the Department's premises.

Mr. Gummer: On security grounds, this information is not available.

Housing Revenue Accounts

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer to the hon. Member for Hastings and Rye (Mrs. Lait) of 19 November 1993, Official Report, column 1, what considerations led to his proposal to increase housing revenue account subsidy guideline rents by 7.5 per cent. and management and maintenance allowance by 4 per cent.

Sir George Young: My right hon. Friend took into account a number of considerations including the constraints on public expenditure; the need to move gradually towards income-related subsidies and a more market-related pattern of local authority rents which better reflects the value of accommodation provided in different parts of the country; the need to make further progress on the targeting of management and maintenance allowances by guaranteeing all authorities at least 95 per cent. of their target scores; and general movements in prices and earnings. The proposals are subject to consultation.

Housing Investment

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the gross aid net level of investment in housing proposed by his Department for 1994-95.

Sir George Young: Information on the Government's public expenditure plans for housing is contained in the Financial Statement and Budget Report, copies of which are available in the Library. More detailed information will be contained in my Department's annual report, to be published in the new year.

Peat Bogs

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the locations of raised peat bogs in England; and if he will make a statement as to their protection.

Mr. Baldry: A list of raised peat bogs in England is being prepared by Scottish Natural Heritage as part of work on a national peatlands resource inventory. This inventory will also summarise information on those sites designated as sites of special scientific interest—SSSIs. It is expected to be published during 1994 and a copy will be placed in the Library.

Government Car Service

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what has been the response to date of advertisements placed in British and overseas journals in respect of bids to take over the financial management of the Government car service; what classified information on the location of classified bids was given in these advertisements; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Gummer: The market test relates to the routine book-keeping work provided for the Government car service—GCS—and the Interdespatch service—IDS. Financial management will remain the responsibility of the GCS and IDS management.

Eight firms responded to the advertisement placed in the European Journal for the market-tested work. No classified information was given in this advertisement. Two tenders have been received and are now being evaluated. The decision should be announced shortly.

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the annual cost to the Department of the car service for Ministers; and how many vehicles are involved.

Mr. Gummer: The annual cost to the Department of Environment for their Ministers' car service was estimated at £265,00 in 1992-93. Six cars are provided by the Government car service with drivers and full back-up service.

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the annual cost of the Government car service in each of the last three years; what was the comparable cost in 1979-80; how many vehicles form the Government car service; and what were the categories of cost in 1992-93.

Mr. Gummer: The current cost of the Government car service—GCS—for the last three financial years is:

	£ million
1990-91	6·95
1991-92	6·99
1992-93	7·19

The 1990-91 figure includes an estimate for pension contributions that were paid centrally at that time. These contributions are included in the 1991-92 and 1992-93 figures.

Information on the comparable cost in 1979-80 is not available.

There are currently 190 vehicles in the Government car service fleet.

In 1992-93 approximately 75 per cent. of costs were staff and 15 per cent. were vehicle costs.

"London, Making the Best Better"

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many tenders for the publication of "London, Making the Best Better" were received from Asian businesses.

Mr. Gummer: It is neither possible nor desirable to group tenders according to the ethnic origin of their owners.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment on what day, date and times the two photographs that appear on page 10 of "London, Making the Best Better" were taken.

Mr. Gummer: Both photographs were taken between 2 pm and 3 pm on Thursday afternoons. The precise dates are not known but the "before" photograph was taken in late November or early December 1990 and the "after" photograph in late October or early November 1991.

London Boroughs

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the full range of activities for which London boroughs (a) are currently responsible and (b) were responsible in 1979.

Mr. Baldry: The statutory activities of London Boroughs are described in the document entitled "The Functions of Local Authorities in England" published by my Department last year. As this was the first occasion on which a comprehensive review had been carried out, I regret that there is no equivalent for 1979.

Press and Publicity Officers

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many press and publicity officers are currently employed in his Department; and how many were employed in (a) 1985 and (b) 1979.

Mr. Gummer: There are currently 31 press and publicity officers employed by the Department of the Environment's information directorate.

Before 1989, the information directorate of this Department was part of the common services of DOE and Department of Transport and separate figures for the resources for each Department are not available. Global information for this period is published each year within the management information system for Ministers—MINIS—dating back to 1979 and is available in the Library.

Durham (Boundaries)

Ms Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what has been the cost (a) overall, (b) to the Local Government Commission, (c) to Durham county council and (d) to the district councils of Durham to date of the inquiry into local government boundaries in the county of Durham.

Mr. Baldry: Expenditure by the Local Government Commission and by local authorities in the area is a matter for them.

Ms Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what guidance he is issuing regarding a timetable for the reconsideration of the Boundary Commission's final proposal regarding local government boundaries in the county of Durham.

Mr. Baldry: My right hon. Friend has directed the Local Government Commission to start its further review of County Durham on 13 December 1993 and to report to him by 30 December 1994. The review will be conducted in accordance with the revised procedure guidance issued to the commission on 22 November. We will agree a target date for the report with the commission.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer of 29 November 1993 to the hon. Member for Erewash (Mrs. Knight), Official Report, column 380, whether he envisages that the same organisations and individuals will be consulted in the new review of County Durham as in the original review.

Mr. Baldry: On 22 November my right hon. Friend issued revised procedure guidance to the Local Government Commission for England. Annexe A to this revised guidance sets out the organisations which the commission is required to consult in conducting its review of an area. Except for the addition of the chief inspector, magistrates courts service, and the Lords Lieutenant for the area, this list is unchanged from that annexed to the procedure guidance issued to the commission in July 1992. The commission should also consult representative local organisations, including voluntary organisations. Others will be welcome to express their views, which will be taken fully into account by the commission.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer of 29 November 1993 to the hon. Member for Erewash (Mrs. Knight), Official Report, column 380, which local authorities in County Durham made representations about fresh proposals on the basis of the new guidance.

Mr. Baldry: Four district councils—Derwentside, Easington, Sedgefield and Wear Valley—have asked for the revised policy guidance issued to the Local Government Commission on 2 November to be applied to County Durham and have indicated their willingness to consider fresh options for change.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer of 29 November 1993 to the hon. Member for Erewash (Mrs. Knight), Official Report, column 380, what weight he will now give to local views in determining the future structure of local government in Darlington.

Mr. Baldry: It is for the Local Government Commission to conduct a further review of County Durham and make recommendations to my right hon. Friend. The Government have said that they attach great importance to local consensus and that the commission will wish to measure proposals from local authorities against expressed views from those outside local government. Once the final report has been published, there will be an opportunity for interested parties to make representations before we take decisions about the implementation of any recommendations for change.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer of 29 November 1993 to the hon. Member for Erewash (Mrs. Knight), Official Report, column 380, what has been the cost to date of the Local Government Commission's review of local government in County Durham.

Mr. Baldry: Expenditure on the review of County Durham is a matter for the Local Government Commission.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer of 29 November to the hon. Member for Erewash (Mrs. Knight), Official Report, column 380, whether the same commissioners will be reviewing County Durham.

Mr. Baldry: This is a matter for the Local Government Commission.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer of 29 November 1993 to the hon. Member for Erewash (Mrs. Knight), what are the expected costs of his decision further to review County Durham.

Mr. Baldry: The resources which we are making available to the commission, £5·124 million in 1993-94 and £8·300 million in 1994-95, should be adequate to enable it to complete all the reviews of local government structure in the shire counties of England by the end of 1994.

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answer of 29 November 1993 to the hon. Member for Erewash (Mrs. Knight), if he will make a statement on his reasons for not exempting Darlington from further review.

Mr. Baldry: My right hon. Friend has directed the Local Government Commission, under section 15(6) of the Local Government Act 1992, to conduct a further review of County Durham because he is not at present satisfied that the commission's recommendations for the area meet the criteria in section 13(5) of that Act. He did not want to limit the possible options available for consideration in the further review, and there would also have been difficulties in implementing changes for part of the county in advance of the remainder. He therefore concluded that it would not be right to exclude Darlington from the area to be covered by the further review.

Surcharged Councillors

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how many councillors in England have been surcharged or prosecuted as a consequence of taking decisions in relation to the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980;

(2) how many councillors in England have been surcharged or prosecuted as a consequence of taking decisions in relation to the Local Government Act 1988.

Mr. Gummer: None, to my knowledge. The Department does not keep records of such actions.

Direct Labour Organisations

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) what was the total number of contracts awarded to English local authority direct service or labour organisations which have not been subject to the issuing of a section 19A or 19B notice, alleging anti-competitive behaviour under the terms of the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980; and on how many occasions such actions were taken;

(2) what was the total number of contracts awarded to English local authority direct service or labour organisations which have not been subject to the issuing of a section 13 or 14 notice, alleging anti-competitive behaviour under the terms of the Local Government Act 1988; and on how many occasions such actions have been taken.

Mr. Gummer: To date, 55 notices and 28 directions relating to anti-competitive behaviour have been issued under sections 19A and 19B of the 1980 Act or sections 13 and 14 of the 1988 Act. Information on the total number of contracts is not held centrally.

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how many local authority direct service or labour organisations, operating contracts in England under the terms of the Local Government Act 1988, have achieved the required rate of return since 1988;

(2) how many local authority direct service or labour organisations, operating contracts in England under the terms of the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980, have achieved the required rate of return since 1988.

Mr. Gummer: For the financial year 1990-91, my Department recorded just over 2,000 accounts for direct service or labour organisations under the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980 and Local Government Act 1988, 1,670 of these accounts—83·5 per cent.—recorded that the DLO or DSO had met the statutory financial objective.

For 1991-92, 2,260 accounts were recorded of which 1925—85·2 per cent.—recorded that the financial objectives had been met.

Information on accounts for 1992-93 is not yet complete. Information on accounts for 1988-89 and 1989-90 is not readily available and could only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Straw: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the authorities that have been challenged by his Department in relation to their internal arrangements for establishing client-contractor splits in order to meet the requirements of the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980 and the Local Government Act 1988.

Mr. Gummer: To date, none of the statutory notices or directions given to local authorities under the Local Government, Planning and Land Act 1980 or the Local Government Act 1988 has concerned internal arrangements for establishing client-contractor splits.

Mineral Planning

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to conclude his consultations on changes to mineral planning guidance note 3; when he expects to announce any changes to MPG 3; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Baldry: My right hon. and learned Friend the then Secretary of State for the Environment announced on 25 March Official Report, columns 714-15, that we intended to proceed to consultation on revised planning guidelines as soon as possible. This is still our intention.

Departmental Files

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many files marked "not for National Audit Office eyes" are held by his Department.

Mr. Gummer: The only category of files not available for NAO view are those which relate to relations between the Department and the NAO and the Public Accounts Committee. This is fully in accordance with the standing agreement between the Treasury and the NAO. This applies to 214 files out of 1·4 million.

Docklands Light Railway

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what Government contribution will be made towards the joint venture proposals for the extension to the docklands light railway to Lewisham, announced in his Budget speech; and what help Ministers will give in assembling the private finance needed for the project.

Mr. Baldry: No Government grant or subsidy will be made towards the costs of the extension to Lewisham of the docklands light railway. The joint venture will be taken forward by the London Docklands development corporation—owners of the railway—and Docklands Light Railway Ltd. My Department's private finance unit will provide advise and expertise where necessary to support their work.

Climate Change Convention

Mr. Booth: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will make a statement about ratification by the United Kingdom of the climate change convention.

Mr. Yeo: The United Kingdom's instrument of ratification will be deposited with the United Nations very shortly. This will fulfil our commitment to ratify the framework convention of climate change by the end of this year.

Following the Budget statement by my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and in particular the commitment to future real terms increases in transport fuel duties, we now have in place all the elements to complete the United Kingdom's national programme under the convention. The programme, which includes measures aimed at returning United Kingdom emissions of carbon dioxide and other greenhouse gases to 1990 levels by 2000, will be published early in the new year. Publication of this programme will put the United Kingdom at the forefront of global efforts to implement the convention, which was signed by the Prime Minister at the Earth summit in Rio last year.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

English Industrial Estates Corporation

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the total budget allocated by his Department to the English Industrial Estates Corporation for expenditure in 1992-93 in (a) the northern region and (b) the United Kingdom as a whole.

Mr. Sainsbury: Total capital expenditure by English Estates in the northern region in 1992-93 was £17·5 million out of a total capital expenditure in England of £54·3 million.

Press and Publicity Officers

Mr. Grocott: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many press and publicity officers are currently employed in his Department; and how many were employed in (a) 1985 and (b) 1979.

Mr. Eggar: The Department's information division employs 19 press officers and 24 publicity officers. The figures do not include administrative support staff. Comparable details for 1985 and 1979 are not available.

Advertising

Mr. Grocott: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how much his Department spends annually on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising and (c) press advertising; and what were the corresponding figures for 1985 and 1979.

Mr. Eggar: The details are as follows:

£000's

	1979-80	1985-86	1992-93
Television advertising	20	2,212	—
Radio advertising	5	—	1
Press advertising	1,529	2,805	1,138

The figures relate to centrally managed budgets and include expenditure by the former Department of Energy.

Regional Assistance

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the total amount spent by his Department on (a) regional enterprise grants (b) enterprise initiative schemes, (c) regional development grants and (d) regional selective assistance in 1992-93 in (i) the northern region and (ii) the United Kingdom as a whole.

Mr. Sainsbury: The total amount spent by my Department on these schemes in 1992-93 is set out below together with the amount spent in the northern region.

DTI expenditure in 1992-93

£ million

	Northern region	Total expenditure
Regional enterprise grants	1·5	5·8
Enterprise initiative (including the SMART and SPUR schemes)	2·4	58·6
Regional development grants	8·3	11·0
Regional selective assistance	28·1	71·1

Expenditure on the enterprise initiative covers the whole of the United Kingdom whereas DTI expenditure on the other three schemes was paid in support of projects in England only.

Angling Products

Mr. William Ross: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what was the value of the manufacture of angling products in the United Kingdom in each of the last three years, the number of persons employed in such manufacture, the number of persons engaged in the sale of angling products in the United Kingdom, and the value of the retail sales of such products in those years; and if he will divide his figures into income for England, Scotland, Wales and Northern Ireland.

Mr. Sainsbury: The value of sales of fishing reels, rods and tackle—including hooks—by manufacturers in the United Kingdom was £13·5 million in 1990, £17·8 million in 1991 and £14 million in 1992. The other information requested is not available.

Nuclear Reactors

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will list the nuclear reactors designated for inspection, and the period of inspection in each case, under the terms of the United Kingdom/Euratom/International Atomic Energy Agency safeguards agreement—Cmnd. 6730—since it came into force.

Mr. Eggar: The prototype fast reactor at Dounreay was designated and subject to joint International Atomic Energy Agency/Euratom inspections from 1980 until 1982 under the terms of the United Kingdom/Euratom/IAEA safeguards agreement.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the President of the Board of Trade which United Kingdom nuclear facility was the latest to be designated by the International Atomic Energy Agency for safeguards inspection under the terms of the United Kingdom/Euratom/IAEA safeguards agreement—Cmnd. 6730.

Mr. Eggar: The most recent United Kingdom nuclear facility to be designated by the IAEA for inspection, under the United Kingdom/Euratom/IAEA tripartite safeguards agreement, was the thermal oxide reprocessing plant receipt and storage pond at Sellafield; the facility was designated on 1 January 1993.

Departmental Files

Mr. Byers: To ask the President of the Board of Trade how many files marked "not for National Audit Office eyes" are held by his Department.

Mr. Eggar: No central record is kept by my Department of files marked "not for NAO eyes". For each NAO study, a number of divisions in different locations may be involved and each may possess in its registries a file with a number of parts—that is, individual jackets. The information requested is therefore not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

The marking "not for NAO eyes" is used in accordance with an agreement between the Treasury and the National Audit Office, under which documents relating to the handling of relations between Departments and the NAO and Public Accounts Committee are not automatically available to the NAO while they are current.

Coal Industry

Mr. Kevin Hughes: To ask the President of the Board of Trade what figures he has on the costs per gigajoule of coal imports into the United Kingdom.

Mr. Eggar [holding answer 30 November 1993]: The average prices of coal imported into the United Kingdom from January to September 1993—based on prices at the port of entry—are estimated from data available for Customs and Excise. This data provide information in £ per tonne and this has been converted to £ per gigajoule using a conversion factor of 26 gigajoules per tonne. The resulting prices of all coal imports and steam coal imports are as follows:

Coal type	Cost per gigajoule (£)
Steam coal imports	1·31
All coal imports	1·44

These prices are averages for coal of different grades and different calorific values with a variety of industrial and domestic uses. They include cost of transhipment from other EC ports. The data cannot be used to distinguish the price of imports to power stations. But in the European Community as a whole the overall price of imports to power stations from extra-EC countries was £1·08/gigajoule for the first quarter of 1993.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Petrol

Sir Malcolm Thornton: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what would be the net gain to the Exchequer of increasing the excise duty on unleaded petrol so as to eliminate the differential between leaded and unleaded petrol.

Sir John Cope: Had my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer increased the excise duty on unleaded petrol in the Budget to eliminate the differential with leaded petrol this would have raised a further £1,050 million in 1994-95 beyond the figures shown in the Financial Statement and Budget Report.

Information Security

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has incorporated the code of practice for information security management, published by the British Standards Institution, into relevant contracts with information technology suppliers.

Sir John Cope: The security requirements for IT systems and services used by central Government Departments are stated in the Government IT security policy document. This document is supported by use of the CCTA risk analysis and management method—CRAMM—and baseline security for IT systems—BSITS—risk analysis methods and by supporting advice and guidance published by the Government security authorities. These are regularly reviewed to ensure best practice, have been developed specifically for use within government and have been in operation for some time. The code of practice for information security management was developed by and established for use by commercial organisations and does not specifically address the requirements for the protection of official information.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will make a statement about the operation of his Department's sensitive documents unit; how many staff are employed in its operation; and approximately how many documents per annum come within its purview.

Sir John Cope: The Treasury does not have a sensitive documents unit. Sensitivity checks are carried out on records being considered for release to the Public Record Office. In the period from October 1992 to October 1993, 97 linear feet of records were checked for sensitivity by 3·5 staff.

Customs Searches

Mr. McFall: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer how many people were stopped and searched by customs officers at each port of entry during 1992, broken down by ethnic origin.

Sir John Cope: The information requested is not available. Her Majesty's Customs and Excise has recorded the ethnic grouping of persons selected for search of their person only since 1 January 1993.

Customs Local Offices

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 29 November, Official Report, column 338-40, if he will list the counties covered by each customs local office.

Sir John Cope: Customs group local offices to form collections. The counties covered by each collection are as follows:

Value Added Tax

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, pursuant to his answer of 29 November, Official Report, columns 338-40, if he will adjust the figures on VAT registrations and deregistrations to run from September each year.

Sir John Cope: As Customs only holds such information for calendar quarters, revised registration and deregistration figures, by year, from October 1987 to September 1993 are:

SCOTLAND

Government Car Service

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the annual cost to the Department of the car service for Ministers; and how many vehicles are involved.

Mr. Lang: The cost to the Scottish Office of the car service for Ministers in 1992-93 was £224,163. The number of vehicles involved is three in London and four —part-time—in Scotland.

Bomb-proofing

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what has been the cost, by location, of bomb-proofing the Department's premises.

Mr. Lang: On security grounds, I do not propose to give this information.

Training Schemes

Ms Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many people were participating in (a) training for work—employment training/employment action—(b) community action, (c) learning for work, (d) the business start-up allowance and (e) youth training in each month since March; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stewart: Information relating to the community action programme is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Employment. The learning for work programme started in August and consequently it is too early for reliable management information to be available. Information on the numbers of people participating in training for work, the business start-up scheme and youth training in Scotland in each month since March, based on the latest returns available for publication, is set out in the table:

	Training for work[1]	Business start-up scheme	Youth training[2]
1993
March	18,267	4,782	35,198
April	15,585	4,311	34,045
May	15,202	4,298	32,897
June	14,482	4,202	33,651
July	13,908	4,167	32,724
August	13,058	3,812	31,232

[1] Training for work replaced employment training and employment action on 1 April 1993; the March 1993 training for work figure comprises figures for employment action (3,407) and employment training (14,860).

[2] Youth training figures include participants on youth credits schemes.

Wrongful Arrest

Mr. Bates: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the wrongful arrest of Lorraine Alison Brown of Marske-by-the-Sea, Cleveland.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Miss Brown was arrested upon a warrant issued by the sheriff at Kirkcaldy in relation to certain road traffic offences, and escorted by the police from Redcar to Kirkcaldy to answer the charges against her. It was then discovered, however, that her case had already been dealt with. Miss Brown had earlier been fined. The warrant should have been withdrawn on that previous occasion. Miss Brown was accordingly released without any further appearance in court.

The procurator fiscal at Kirkcaldy has written to Miss Brown's solicitors, apologising for the error. He paid all the expenses of her unnecessary appearance, and the Crown Office has accepted that compensation should be paid.

Enterprise Companies

Ms Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many parliamentary questions he has referred for answer to the chief executives of Scottish Enterprise and Highlands and Islands Enterprise; how many of these questions have then been passed on to individual local enterprise companies; how many questions in each category have subsequently received replies; how long those replies have taken; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Stewart: It is not my right hon. Friend's practice to refer parliamentary questions to the chief executives of Scottish Enterprise and Highlands and Islands Enterprise. It is the intention that all questions are answered by the chairmen, although in one instance a question was passed on by Scottish Enterprise to an individual local enterprise company. Since the responsibility for ensuring that questions are answered rests with the enterprise bodies I have asked the chairmen to respond to the hon. Member on the relevant aspects of her question.

Scottish Agricultural Wages Board

Dr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will place in the Library the responses to the consultation on the future of the Scottish Agricultural Wages Board.

Sir Hector Monro: Yes.

Dr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many submissions he has received to the consultation on the future of the Scottish Agricultural Wages Board; and how many of those were in favour of the abolition of the board.

Sir Hector Monro: Fifty-two. Four favoured abolition.

Farmed Salmon

Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will place in the Library a copy of his most recent recommendation to the European Commission on the reference price for farmed salmon.

Sir Hector Monro: It is the responsibility of the European commission to set a reference price for salmon, based on criteria set out in article 23 of regulation 3759/92. The Scottish Office has submitted background information to the Commission on production costs and prices over the last three years.

Sheep

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many applications there have been for sheep quotas from the national reserve; if he will give the number of successful applications as a proportion of all applications; and if he will provide a breakdown of the statistics for each region in Scotland.

Sir Hector Monro: An announcement will be made shortly giving details of the category of producer eligible to apply for an allocation of sheep annual premium quota from the national reserve. The announcement will also explain how and when producers should apply. Until applications have been received and processed it will not be possible to say how many have been successful.

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has received regarding the administration and operation of the national sheep reserve of sheep quotas; what discussions have taken place regarding altering or estending the scheme; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Hector Monro: We carried out an extensive public consultation exercise earlier this year concerning the operation of the sheep quota system and received representations from a broad cross section of the industry. Discussions have continued since then and we shall make an announcement shortly explaining how producers eligible for an allocation of quota from the national reserve can submit their application.

Prison Officers

Mr. Raymond S. Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what plans he has to alter the status of prison officers in Scotland.

Mr. Lang: The precise legal position of Scottish prison officers and governors is different from that of similar staff in England and Wales. I consider it appropriate that as they carry out similar duties to those in England and Wales they should have the same status.

I therefore intend to legislate this Session to place Scottish prison officers and governors on the same footing as those in the rest of the United Kingdom: they should have in substance the same powers, within the Scottish legal framework, and the position of the trade unions which represent them should be the same. As it will in consequence be unlawful for those trade unions to call industrial action, appropriate procedures will be established for settling the remuneration of the staff concerned.

My officials will be in discussion with the Scottish Prison Officers Association and others affected.

Health Service Salaries

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the total salary costs for (a) administrative and clerical staff, (b) managerial staff and (c) nursing and midwifery staff employed in the NHS in each year since 1989.

Mr. Stewart [holding answer 25 November 1993]: The information is set out in the table. Details have been taken from health boards' annual accounts. General and senior managers costs are not separately identified but are included within the administration and clerical staff category. Costs are at outturn level and therefore increases are explained in part by annual pay awards. The figures for 1992-93 are provisional.

Year	Administration and clerical (£000's)[1]	Nursing and midwifery (£000's)
1989-90	130,055	778,921
1990-91	152,546	834,093
1991-92	175,718	910,326
1992-93	191,979	925,130

[1]This figure includes those senior nurses and clinicians who have transferred to general/senior manager pay scales, particular in latter years.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Prisoners (Escapes)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will list for the West Yorkshire police area for the past 12 months (a) the number of prison movements to and from courts and (b) the number of prisoner escapes from (i) the police, (ii) the Prison Service, (iii) Group 4 custody in transit to and from courts and from custody at court, (c) the number of deaths, including suicides, by prisoners at court or in transit from court, (d) the number of assaults on (iv) the police, (v) the Prison Service and (vi) Group 4 officers while escorting prisoners to and from courts and (e) the number of prisoners arriving at court more than one hour late while in the care of (vii) the police, (viii) the Prison Service and (ix) Group 4 officers;

(2) if he will list for the North Yorkshire police area for the past 12 months (a) the number of prison movements to and from courts, (b) the number of prisoner escapes from (i) the police, (ii) the Prison Service and (iii) Group 4 custody in transit to and from courts and from custody at court, (c) the number of deaths, including suicides, by prisoners at court or in transit from court, (d) the number of assaults on (iv) the police, (v) the Prison Service and (vi) Group 4 officers while escorting prisoners to and from courts and (e) the number of prisoners arriving at court more than one hour late while in the care of (vii) the police, (viii) the Prison Service and (ix) Group 4 officers;

(3) if he will list for the Humberside police area for the past 12 months (a) the number of prison movements to and from courts and (b) the number of prisoner escapes from (i) the police, (ii) the Prison Service and (iii) Group 4 custody in transit to and from courts and from custody at court, (c) the number of deaths, including suicides, by prisoners at court or in transit from court, (d) the number of assaults on (iv) the police, (v) the Prison Service and (vi) Group 4 officers while escorting prisoners to and from courts and (e) the number of prisoners arriving at court more than one hour late while in the care of (vii) the police, (viii) the Prison Service and (ix) Group 4 officers;

(4) if he will list for the South Yorkshire police area for the past 12 months (a) the number of prison movements to and from courts and (b) the number of prisoner escapes from (i) the police, (ii) the Prison Service and (iii) Group 4 custody in transit to and from courts and from custody at court, (c) the number of deaths, including suicides, by prisoners at court or in transit from court, (d) the number of assaults on (iv) the police, (v) the Prison Service and (vi) Group 4 officers while escorting prisoners to and from courts and (e) the number of prisoners arriving at court more than one hour late while in the care of (vii) the police, (viii) the Prison Service and (ix) Group 4 officers.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for these matters has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Mr. D. Lewis to Mr. Martin Redwood, dated 3 December 1993:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Questions about court escort work in the South Yorkshire, North Yorkshire, West Yorkshire and Humberside force areas.

Little of the information requested is routinely collected. Of that which is collected much is not in the format you requested and could only be obtained at disproportionate cost. The information which is readily available relates mainly to the East Midlands and Humberside area, where responsibility for prisoner escort and court custody work has largely been contracted out to Group 4. The area covered by the contract with Group 4, known as Area 7, covers the police force areas of Derbyshire, Lincolnshire, Humberside, Nottinghamshire, Leicestershire, South Yorkshire and part of North Yorkshire. Group 4 have been operating the contract since 5 April 1993.

Between that date and 31 October 1993 Group 4 were responsible for a total of 61,459 prisoner movements. This includes taking prisoners to court, guarding them at court and taking them to prison from court. 2,152 prisoners delivered by Group 4 arrived at court after the start of court business, including those delivered to courts outside the contract area where the length of the journey precludes timely delivery.

Between 1 November 1992 and 31 October 1993 in the Prison Service areas which are equivalent to the police force areas covered by your Questions and in Area 7 there were a total of 38 escapes from Prison Service or Group 4 custody and a total of 8 assaults on Prison Service or Group 4 staff by prisoners in transit to or from court. Specifically within Area 7 there were 26 escapes from Group 4 custody and 7 assaults on their staff between the start of the contract and 31 October. These figures are not comparable, since the majority of the work taken on by Group 4 was previously performed by the police. The great majority of the escapes from Group 4 custody have been from escorts which would previously have been carried out by the police. Police forces in the area have been unable to provide any data on escapes from escort and assaults during escort.

Between 1 November 1992 and 31 October 1993 there were no deaths of prisoners whilst at court or in transit to or from court whilst in the custody of the Prison Service or the police forces in the areas covered by your Questions. There has been one such death within Area 7 since the start of the contract with Group 4.

Prison Service

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the current year's budget for the Prison Service; what proportion (a) was earmarked for and (b) will have been spent on projects in each London prison; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Mr. D. Lewis to Mr. Tom Cox, dated 3 December 1993:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about the Prison Service budget and projects in London prisons.

The Prison Service budget for the financial year 1993-94 is £1,524·5 million.

Expenditure on major capital works and building repair projects at London prisons in 1993-94 is as follows:

Prison	Planned expenditure £'000	Current forecast of actual expenditure £'000
Belmarsh	300	334
Brixton	5,096	3,002
Holloway	712	249
Pentonville	2,608	2,563
Wandsworth	2,561	2,358
Wormwood Scrubs	20,124	18,375

Crime (Clear-up Rates)

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list in rank order the crime clear-up rates for each police authority in each of the past 10 years, and the current year to date.

Mr. Charles Wardle: The requested information is contained in the table.

Government Car Service

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the annual cost to the Department of the car service for Ministers; and how many vehicles are involved.

Mr. Michael Howard: The Home Secretary has three cars supplied by the Home Office. The average annual cost, inclusive of maintenance, is £98,000. Other Home Office Ministers use four cars supplied by the Government car service. In addition, the GCS supplies cars for the transport of ministerial dispatch boxes. The estimated cost of these cars for 1993-94 is £247,000.

Prisons

Mr. Llwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement about the Government's prison building programme.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to a question from the hon. Member for Dover (Mr. Shaw) on 25 November at column 574.

Data Protection

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will make a statement on the status of the current discussions on the data protection directive, and in particular the current state of agreement or disagreement between member states on articles 2, 6, 7, 8, 10, 11 and 12 as published in COM(92)4.22.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The Council working group has completed its first reading of the revised text of the draft directive. A second reading has started. It would not be right for me to disclose the extent of agreement or disagreement on any particular article. In general, the range of views expressed is very wide.

Information Security

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has incorporated the code of practice for information security management, published by the British Standards Institution, into relevant contracts with information technology suppliers.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The security requirements for IT systems and services used by central Government Departments are stated in the Government IT security policy document. This document is supported by use of the CCTA risk analysis and management method—CRAMM—and Baseline Security for IT systems—BSITS—risk analysis methods, by the Communications Electronic Security Group—CESG—memorandum No. 10 where appropriate and by supporting advice and guidance published by the Government IT security authorities. These are regularly reviewed to ensure best practice, have been developed specifically for use within government and have been in operation for some time. The code of practice for information security management was developed by and established for use by commercial organisations. It is currently not a British standard, and does not specifically address the requirements for the protection of official information.

Mr. Amanullah Khan

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, pursuant to his reply of 26 November, Official Report, column 230, what consideration was given to complying with the request from the Indian national central bureau of Interpol that Mr. Amanullah Khan be arrested on the occasion of his arrival at Manchester airport; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Charles Wardle: None. Mr. Khan was not seeking admission to the United Kingdom at Manchester airport on 15 October 1993. He was in transit to another country. The police officers who spoke to him were not aware of the request from the Indian national central bureau of Interpol that he be arrested with a view to extradition.

Work Permits

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department (1) if he will notify Billingham Bombers Ltd. that Igor Slavinsky, Ref. S80 79 56, can now have a work permit to play ice hockey;

(2) if he will approve a work permit for Igor Slavinsky, Ref. 9320830/FHY, to play ice hockey for Billingham Bombers.

Mr. Charles Wardle: I wrote to my hon. Friend on 30 November informing him that I had decided to grant Mr. Slavinsky's application to remain and work exceptionally outside the immigration rules.

Prison Accommodation

Ms Ruddock: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what plans he has to use any floating facility on Humberside to accommodate prisoners.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Mr. D. Lewis to Ms Joan Ruddock, dated 3 December 1993:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about the use of a floating facility on Humberside to accommodate prisoners.

The use of floating vessels to accommodate prisoners is one option being considered as part of our contingency plans to deal with increases in the prison population. No final decisions have been taken to use this option or on possible locations.

Departmental Files

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many files marked "not for National Audit Office eyes" are held by his Department.

Mr. Howard: No central record of files marked "not for NAO eyes" is maintained. The information could be obtained only by examining individually each of the 1·5 million extant files in my Department, and could therefore only be obtained at disproportionate cost.

The marking "not for NAO eyes" is used rarely and in accordance with an agreement between the Treasury and the National Audit Office, under which documents relating to the handling of relations between Departments and the NAO and Public Accounts Committee are not automatically available to the NAO while they are current.

Police Cells

Mr. Hoyle: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prisoners are detained in police cells (a) nationally and (b) in the north-west; at what locations; and for how long they have been there.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Responsibility for this matter has been delegated to the Director General of the Prison Service, who has been asked to arrange for a reply to be given.

Letter from Mr. D. Lewis to Mr. Doug Hoyle, dated 3 December 1993:

The Home Secretary has asked me to reply to your recent Question about prisoners detained in police cells (a) nationally and (b) in the North West; and what locations; and for how long they have been there.

On Tuesday 30 November, the latest date for which complete information is available, a national total of ten prisoners were detained in police cells, all in Manchester. They arrived there on that day and were received into prison custody on the following day.

Criminal Justice Act 1993

Sir Ivan Lawrence: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, when he expects to implement the remaining provisions of the Criminal Justice Act 1993.

Mr. Howard: The following miscellaneous provisions brought into force on 1 December by means of commencement order No. 3: sections 20 to 23, 34 and 35, 44 to 46, and 73.

A further announcement about the implementation of the remainder of the Act will be made in due course.

Police (Performance Indicators)

Sir Ivan Lawrence: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will select and make known a first set of objectives and performance indicators for policing, as proposed in the White Paper on police reform.

Mr. Howard: The following is the text of a letter which I am sending today to all police authority chairmen and chief constables. I am writing in similar terms to the commissioners of the Metropolitan and City of London police forces, and to the chairman of the City of London police committee.

Key objectives for policing 1994-95

The White Paper on Police Reform contains a commitment that the Home Secretary will publish each year a brief statement of key objectives for the police service. This will explain the tasks which the Government consider that the police should be tackling as matters of priority across the country. The key objectives, which are centred on the principles of the citizens charter, will provide a framework for the assessment of police performance.

I am writing now to set out the Government's key objectives for policing in 1994-95. These are based on the objectives provisionally set out in the White Paper, refined in discussion with the police, with local authority associations and with Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary. The objectives will be further refined in the light of experience gained during the coming year.

I intend to treat 1994-95 as a trial run. This should provide useful experience which will help to ensure that the system of setting objectives and measuring progress is soundly based. Once the necessary legislation is in place, police authorities and chief constables will be required by statute to have regard to the key objectives for policing.

In setting particular objectives the Government is well aware of the wide nature of the police role. This is encapsulated in the guidelines laid down by the first joint Commissioners of the Metropolitan Police:

"The primary object of an efficient police is the prevention of crime; the next that of detection and punishment of offenders if crime is committed. To these ends, all the efforts of the police should be directed. The protection of life and property, the preservation of public tranquility, and the absence of crime, will alone prove whether these efforts have been successful, and whether the objects for which the police were appointed have been attained."

While proposing that particular effort should be directed towards improving the performance of certain tasks, the Government reaffirms the importance which it attaches to other essential policing duties such as the maintenance of public order, the fight against drugs and terrorism and the prevention of crimes against children. In certain areas theft of and from vehicles is a major probem requiring action by the police as well as others. You are, I know, already contributing towards wider Government objectives such as the reduction of the number of road traffic accident casualties by one-third by the year 2000. All these tasks, together with others which I have not mentioned, remain important.

It is precisely because the role of the police is so varied that the Government believes that performance can best be improved by focusing more sharply each year on a small number of areas of concern to the public. The aim of the key objectives is to encourage progress in these areas in addition to maintaining the good levels of service which the police are providing in response to other demands.

The key objectives for 1994-95 will be:

1. to maintain and if possible increase the number of detections for violent crimes;
2. to increase the number of detections for burglaries of people's homes;
3. to target and prevent crimes which are a particular local problem in partnership with the public and other local agencies;
4. to provide high visibility policing so as to reassure the public;
5. to respond promptly to emergency calls from the public.

Progress towards each of these objectives will be measured by the key performance indicators set out in the Appendix to this letter. In all cases this information is already being gathered by the police for other purposes, such as the Audit Commissioner's performance indicators. They should therefore not add to the paperwork burden on the police. I expect Chief Constables to publish the information collected for the full range of performance indicators in their Annual Reports.

In future years police authorities and Chief Constables will be required to set targets for making progress towards the key objectives. You may, in 1994-95, wish to experiment with setting local targets related to the various key objectives.

I would encourage the publication of the key objectives locally in the context of the Citizen's Charter initiative and in tandem with any existing local policing charters or statements of service standards.

The Association of Chief Police Officers has already undertaken considerable work in defining national standards for the police. The Government welcomes this work which complements the proposals for setting key objectives and targets set out in the White Paper on Police Reform.

APPENDIX

Key performance indicators are:

1. The number of violent crimes detected per 100 officers.
2. The number of burglaries of dwellings detected per 100 officers.
3. No high level indicator is currently available. Work on developing such an indicator for 1995-96 will be taken forward over the next year, aimed at measuring the effectiveness of crime prevention initiatives.
4. Public satisfaction with levels of foot and mobile patrols.
5. (i) The percentage of 999 calls answered within the local target time.
   (ii) The percentage of responses within the local target time to incidents requiring immediate response.

Prison Officers (Industrial Action)

Sir Ivan Lawrence: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what action he now intends to take following the injunction he obtained against the calling of industrial action by the Prison Officers Association.

Mr. Howard: On 18 November the High Court issued an interim injunction requiring the general secretary of the Prison Officers Association to call off its planned industrial action which would have resulted in some 1,700 prisoners being held in police cells. The court made it clear that the calling of industrial action by the POA was unlawful.

I recognise that matters cannot be left there. I intend to introduce legislation this Session which, while maintaining the position that it is unlawful for the POA to call industrial action, also extends normal trade union status to organisations representing staff who currently have the powers of a constable.

The legislation will also extend to prison officers the appropriate elements of employment protection legislation, including access to industrial tribunals, and enable regulations to be made to establish procedures for setting the remuneration of the staff concerned. There will need to be discussions with the POA and others about those provisions.

These measures will provide a much needed and firm foundation for the development of constructive industrial relations in the special context of the Prison Service.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Information Security

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he has incorporated the code of practice for information security management, published by the British Standards Institution, into relevant contracts with information technology suppliers.

Mr. Goodlad: The security requirements for IT services and systems used by central Government Departments are stated in the Government IT security policy document. This document is supported by use of the CCTA risk analysis and management method—CRAMM—and baseline security for IT systems—BSITS—risk analysis methods and by supporting advice and guidance published by the Government IT security authorities. These are regularly reviewed to ensure best practice, have been developed specifically for use within government and have been in operation for some time. The code of practice for information security management was developed by and established for use by commercial organisations and does not specifically address the requirements for the protection of official information.

Publicity

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how much his Department spends annually on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising and (c) press advertising; and what were the corresponding figures for 1985 and 1979.

Mr. Goodlad: Total expenditure by the Foreign and Commonwealth Office on advertising in 1992-93, the last financial year for which information is available, was:

	FCO Diplomatic Wing £	FCO ODA Wing £
TV advertising	nil	nil
Radio advertising	nil	nil
Press advertising	72,000	283,033

The 1979 and 1985 figures cannot be disaggregated between television, radio and press advertising and other promotional material without incurring disproportionate cost.

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many press and publicity officers are currently employed in his Department; and how many were employed in (a) 1985 and (b) 1979.

Mr. Goodlad: The number of press officers employed in the FCO news department for the years in question is:

Year	Number
1979	11
1985	11
1993	9

The Overseas Development Administration operates a separate information service. The number of information officers employed by the ODA is as follows:

Year	Number
1979	9
1985	12
1993	7

Secondments

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list for each of the last five years the number of secondments (a) into and (b) out of his Department; and if he will give details of which Departments were involved.

Mr. Goodlad: Tables I to V contain details of inward and outward secondments between other Government Departments and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office over the last five years. Secondments between the Overseas Development Administration and the diplomatic wings of the Foreign and Commonwealth Office are shown separately in these tables, as are secondments to the Cabinet Office. Overseas Development Administration exchanges to and from other Government Departments are listed separately at table VI.

In addition to exchanges with other Whitehall departments, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office has an interchange programme with the private sector and other foreign ministries. The Overseas Development Administration also has officers on secondment to the World bank and regional development banks.

Departmental Files

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many files marked "not for National Audit Office eyes" are held by his Department.

Mr. Goodlad: The information requested is not readily available. To provide it would require consultation with all overseas posts. This could be done only at disproportionate cost. The marking "not for NAO eyes" is used in accordance with an agreement between the Treasury and the National Audit Office, under which documents relating to the handling of relations between Departments and the NAO and Public Accounts Committee are not automatically available to the NAO while they are current. The Foreign and Commonwealth Office's internal audit unit regularly checks to ensure that the marking is not abused.

There is no marking "not for PAC eyes".

Council of Ministers

Mr. Nigel Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will publish a statement on the forthcoming business in the European Community's Council of Ministers.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The information is as follows:

Enhanced Structural Adjustment Facility

Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether the United Kingdom will contribute to the enhanced structural adjustment facility operated by the International Monetary Fund.

Mr. Hurd: The United Kingdom will contribute £50 million to the next phase of the enhanced structural adjustment facility of the International Monetary Fund. ESAF supports economic reform programmes in low-income countries, particularly in sub-Saharan Africa. This brings the United Kingdom contribution to about 11 per cent. of the total fund.

Our new contribution will be made in 1994-95 from resources released by an underspending of EC aid. It will not add to planned levels of public expenditure. ESAF adds to the effectiveness of our bilateral aid programme and complements our Trinidad terms initiative to relieve the debt burdens of the poorest countries pursuing economic reform. Our new contribution underlines Britain's position at the heart of the international effort to promote sustainable recovery and growth in the developing world.

China

Mr. Jon Owen Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what the Government are doing to enforce the law forbidding the import of products of forced prison labour from China.

Sir John Cope: I have been asked to reply.

The prohibition on the importation of foreign prison made goods is enforced by HM Customs and Excise. Under the provisions of the Foreign Prison-Made Goods Act 1897 the prohibition can only be enforced when evidence is supplied to customs proving the foreign prison-made origin of the goods. Customs has received no evidence to date which would prove import into the United Kingdom of specific goods made in Chinese prisons, but it is willing to act upon any adequate evidence supplied to it.

DEFENCE

Vitez Garage, Bosnia

Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence by which units the site known as Vitez garage, Bosnia, is currently being used for accommodation purposes; how many personnel are involved; whether improvements planned to be made to facilities, including the provision of ablution and sanitation units, have been effected; whether the 35 four-man accommodation units on an adjacent site have yet been commissioned and occupied; what plans he has for expanding or improving accommodation on these sites; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Hanley: The site is currently being used for accommodation purposes by part of the logistic support element of 1 Coldstream Guards, a light aid detachment of REME, a forward recovery group of REME and a forward ordnance team of Royal Logistic Corps, a total of 131 personnel. Occupied and in use are 39 four-man accommodation units, two rest rooms, three shower blocks, three toilet blocks and one laundry block. In addition, there are three toilets in the existing garage. One fire-damaged portacabin is to be replaced and there are plans to provide portacabin kitchen facilities to enable the present kitchen area to revert to its original use.

Low Flying

Dr. Marek: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence pursuant to his oral answer of 23 November, Official Report, column 314, if he will place in the Library details of the intensity of low flying in each affected area.

Mr. Hanley: For administrative purposes, the United Kingdom is divided into a number of low-flying areas. Records are maintained of the amount of low flying conducted in each LFA but it is not my Department's practice to release this detailed information. Information is not available on the amount of low flying conducted within LFAs over particular locations, such as national parks. Low flying is conducted in areas of low population but, consistent with our policy of dispersing the activity as widely as possible, national parks are not specifically targeted for low flying.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will supply the hon. Member for Don Valley with a current copy of the map showing the structure of the (a) day and (b) night low-flying system.

Mr. Hanley: I have arranged for a copy of the map showing the structure of the day low-flying system to be placed in the Library. A copy of the map showing the structure of the night low-flying system is already in the Library.

Radar Surveillance

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the locations and dates where radar surveillance of transit areas has been carried out during the last five years; and what are the current requirements before his Ministry carries out such operations.

Mr. Hanley: Locations for Skyguard low-flying monitoring are decided having regard to a number of factors, including exercise activity and reports of disturbance. Priority is given to locations where flying down to 250 ft may take place. There have been no deployments to monitor low flying in transit areas during the last five years.

Search and Rescue

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many operational incidents the RAF's search and rescue helicopters have been called out to deal with from each search and rescue base during 1992 and 1993.

Mr. Hanley: The total number of callouts from RAF stations was:

	1992	[1]1993
Boulmer	134	135
Brawdy	158	115
Chivenor	174	123
Coltishall	106	76
Leconfield	160	119
Leuchars[2]	131	43
Lossiemouth	241	201
Manston	162	128
Valley	187	168
Aldergrove	22	14
Total	1,475	1,122

[1]Up to and including 31 October 1993.
[2]Flight disbanded 1 April 1993.

Pilot Training

Mr. Harvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what assessment he has made of the prospects of increasing the pilot flying training undertaken by the RAF in the United Kingdom for air forces of other countries.

Mr. Hanley: In line with normal policy, the provision of pilot flying training in the United Kingdom for air forces of overseas countries is dictated by the availability of surplus training capacity within the RAF. Opportunities presently exist for such training and potential customers have been informed accordingly.

Nuclear Weapons

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make it his policy to initiate a nuclear weapons convention along the lines of the chemical weapons convention with the aim of a verifiable global plan on the design, manufacture and deployment of nuclear weapons.

Mr. Hanley: The United Kingdom's nuclear policy was set out in my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Defence's speech to the centre for defence studies on 16 November, a copy of which has been placed in the Library.

Iraq

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what information he possesses on the role of the Ibn Al Haytham centre in Iraq.

Mr. Hanley: The Ibn Al Haytham missile research and development centre was established by the Iraqis in March 1992 and is located 15 km north-east of Baghdad. Its primary purpose is to conduct research and development on missiles with ranges of up to 150 km. This work is permitted under UN SCR 687 (1991). The establishment has been visited by six UNSCOM inspections.

Mr. Llew Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many experts his Department has contributed to the United Nations special commission missions to Iraq since May 1991.

Mr. Hanley: Some 50 personnel from my Department have participated in support of United Nations special commission missions to Iraq since May 1991.

Sri Lanka

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what evidence he has that British military equipment transported in 1990-91 for use in the Gulf war was subsequently directly or indirectly purveyed to the warring parties in Sri Lanka.

Mr. Hanley: I am not aware that any British military equipment transported in 1990-91 for use in the Gulf conflict was subsequently transferred to the warring parties in Sri Lanka.

Departmental Files

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how many files marked "not for National Audit Office eyes" are held by his Department.

Mr. Hanley: The precise number of files held by my Department marked "not for NAO eyes" could be established only at disproportionate cost.

The marking "not for NAO eyes" is used in accordance with an agreement between the Treasury and the National Audit Office, under which documents relating to the handling of relations between Departments and the NAO and the Public Accounts Committee are not automatically available to the NAO while they are current.

Political Advisers

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the political advisers employed in his Department during 1993.

Mr. Hanley: During 1993 Mr. Perry Miller was employed as special adviser to my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Defence from 1 January to 14 February and Mr. Crispin Blunt has been employed since then.

HEALTH

Prescription Budgets

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will place in the Library tables showing (a) indicative prescription budgets and (b) the prescription element of general practitioner fund-holder budgets for 1991-92 and 1992-93 in each family health services authority area and for each NHS region showing (i) planned expenditure, outturn expenditure in cash terms and standard price terms, (ii) the percentage expenditure, (iii) actual expenditure per head of population served each year both in cash and standard price terms and (iv) the percentage increase between years.

Dr. Mawhinney: The available information will be placed in the Library. Information for actual expenditure per head of population and the percentage increase between the years is not available centrally.

Administration Expenditure

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will publish a table showing the total amount spent on administration by (a) regional health authorities, (b) district health authorities, (c) family health service authorities and (d) the Department of Health/NHS management executive, in (i) 1989-90, (ii) 1990-91, (iii) 1991-92 and (iv) 1992-93 and her expectation of expenditure in those categories for 1993-94.

Dr. Mawhinney: Administration expenditure is shown in the table.

The information requested for 1993-94 is not available for regional and district health authorities and family health services authorities.

Expenditure on Adminstration

	1989-90 £000s	1990-91 £000s	1991-92 £000s	1992-93 £000s	1993-94 £000s current allocation

Department of Health[3]	174,681	216,785	240,267	276,280	264,608

[1] These figures cover the total revenue expenditure on the pay and accommodation costs of staff of all disciplines and their support staff employed at health authority headquarters level together with the costs of the purchaser function. They exclude administrative support in the hospital departments and at other local levels which is regarded as operational.

[2] The figures for 1989-90 and 1990-91 are not comparable with the figures for 1991-92. This is because of the introduction of capital charges and changes to accounting policies following the introduction of the internal market.

[3] Costs for the national health service management executive are included in the Department of Health figures.

Hospital Services

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if she will list, for 1992-93, by regional health authority (a) the average daily number of beds available and (b) new accident and emergency cases during the year; (2) if she will list, for 1992-93, by regional health authority per 1,000 population (a) the average daily number of beds available and (b) new accident and emergency cases during the year.

Mr. Sackville: The information is shown in the table.

Influenza Vaccine

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make a statement as to the reasons given by the National Institute of Biological Standards and control for rejecting supplies of the influenza vaccine from the company Duphar; and what alternative arrangements have been made for this coming winter.

Mr. Sackville: The decision which prevented the marketing of the Duphar vaccine was made by the Medicines Control Agency—MCA—of the Department of Health after receiving advice from specialist advisers and the National Institute of Biological Standards and Control.

Duphar was originally granted a product licence for influenza vaccine in early August 1993. During late September the company applied to the MCA to make a major change to its manufacturing process.

Information provided by Duphar, however, gave inadequate reassurance of the safety and efficacy of the product proposed for marketing since clinical studies being carried out by the company were far from complete.

Other manufacturers have stepped in to fill the gap caused by the loss of Duphar influenza vaccine this year, and already more vaccine has been distributed than in previous years.

Mental Health

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the number of medium and long-stay beds available in NHS psychiatric hospitals and trusts in England and by region in each year from 1984-85 to 1991-92.

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many (a) short-stay, (b) medium-stay and (c) long-stay psychiatric beds were available in each region in each year from 1982.

Mr. Bowis: The available information will be placed in the Library. Beds are classified as either short stay or long stay, and are shown in total prior to 1987-88. Information for 1992-93 is provisional.

Dr. Lynne Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many short and long-stay beds are provided for patients in private and NHS other hospitals illustrated in figure 2 of the Yates report.

Mr. Bowis: The breakdown between long and short-stay beds is not available for the private sector. In 1991-92 there were 12,600 mental illness beds in privately registered nursing homes or hospitals and 22,000 short-stay and 27,000 long-stay beds in mental illness wards in national health service hospitals in England.

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what response she has given to the Royal College of Psychiatrists recommendation that the closure of mental hospitals should not go ahead until alternative services are in place.

Mr. Bowis: This is in line with Government policy.

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidelines exist on levels of community provision for people with mental health problems required in an area before a mental hospital can be closed.

Mr. Bowis: The mental illness key area handbook gives guidance on the range of service provision needed for adult psychiatric services in the community, copies of which are available in the Library.

NHS Trusts

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidance she issues to NHS trusts about the salaries of chief executives; and if she will make a statement.

Dr. Mawhinney: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Bristol, South (Ms Primarolo) on 5 November at column 535.

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make a statement on the NHS status of trust hospitals and where their ownership lies.

Dr. Mawhinney: Trusts remain fully part of the national health service. They are accountable through the NHS management executive to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health. They are also accountable to NHS purchasers through contracts for service delivery. Each NHS trust is a body corporate and has ownership of its land, buildings and other property.

Pacemakers

Mrs. Bridget Prentice: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the interval between her Department's receipt of a warning from Siemens in respect of certain pacemakers and the issue of pacemaker technical note No. 48; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Sackville: Twenty-five working days elapsed between the Department of Health first being advised of the Siemens pacemaker lead problem and the issue of pacemaker technical note No. 48.

The pacemaker technical note was a follow-up to the medical advisory notice issued by Siemens on 4 February 1993 to all relevant clinicians notifying them of the problem. The action was dependent on Siemens advising the Department of the publication of its advisory notice. Eleven working days elapsed between receipt of this information and the publication of the pacemaker technical note. Copies of both documents are available in the Library.

Community Health Councils

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what plans she has to change the role of management of community health councils.

Dr. Mawhinney: Community health councils have an important role in representing the views of users and we support a strong role for them now and in the future. The future arrangements for establishing and funding CHCs will need to be considered in the context of the announcement by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to the House on 21 October at columns 398-412.

Orthodontics

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what limits there are to providing orthodontic care for children under the national health service.

Dr. Mawhinney: The national health service provides all the treatment necessary to secure and maintain oral health.

Maternity Services

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if her Department has currently set up a review committee reviewing maternity services; when her Department last set up a committee reviewing maternity services; what was its conclusions; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Sackville: A review of national health service maternity care during childbirth has recently been completed by the expert maternity group. The group was established as part of the Government's response to the House of Commons Health Select Committee report on maternity services, published in 1992.

The expert group's report, "Changing Childbirth," was published on 5 August. A consultation period, to enable interested parties to comment on the report, ended on 29 October. Ministers are currently considering the comments received before deciding on future action. Guidelines will be issued to the NHS in due course.

Earlier reviews of particular aspects of NHS maternity care have been conducted on behalf of the Department by the maternity services advisory committee. Three reports were published between 1982 and 1985, covering antenatal care, care during childbirth, and care of the mother and baby.

Copies of these documents and reports are available in the Library.

St. Bartholomew's Hospital

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make a statement on the future of St. Bartholomew's hospital, London.

Dr. Mawhinney: The St. Bartholomew's/Royal London/London Chest Trust application is currently out to consultation. A decision on this will be made in the new year.

Winter Deaths

Ms Walley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make a statement relating to the excess winter deaths in the west midlands region.

Mr. Bowis: The number of excess deaths in the west midlands region during the winter of 1991-92—the latest available figures—was 3,373.

Doncaster Health Authority

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make a statement setting out the current conditions of service and remuneration of (a) executive and (b) non-executive directors of Doncaster health authority.

Dr. Mawhinney: The current conditions of service for executive members of Doncaster health authority are those of all other national health service general and senior managers. The chief executive is paid within the range set for district general manager grade 2—£45,710 to £66,030. Executive members of health authorities are paid on the senior manager pay spine, which ranges from £14,940 to £46,600 per year.

Non-executive members of health authorities hold a statutory office under the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990, and their appointment and tenure of office is governed by the National Health Service Regional and District Health Authorities (Membership and Procedure) Regulations 1990. Non-executive members of health authorities receive an annual remuneration of £5,000.

Low Birthweights

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research her Department has funded in response to the proposals of the Audit Commission report "Children First" on data about the outcome of health care in childhood and the prevalence of disability among very low birthweight babies who survive into childhood; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Sackville: The publication, earlier this year, of the report of the Audit Commission's study into hospital services for children was welcomed by the Government, particularly the emphasis which it placed on monitoring health outcomes. The vital importance placed by the Government on evaluating both the short-term and long-term impact of neonatal intensive care interventions had been acknowledged at paragraph 2.7.10 of their response to the second report from the Health Committee, 1991-92—Cm 2018—in July 1992. This also referred to a number of population-based studies which had been commissioned to look into the long-term effects on survivors of care.

Since then, the Medical Research Council, which receives its grant in aid from the office of my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, has helped to fund a study of the outcomes for babies weighing less than 1,500 gm at a number of different hospitals and examining a range of different risk factors, including birthweight, which make up the clinical risk index for babies. This study is being extended on a national basis and the results are expected later next year.

The national perinatal epidemiology unit, a centrally funded Department of Health research unit based in Oxford, has done some preliminary pilot work with Action Research into the detection of trends in morbidity and disability in seven-year-old children of different birthweights. The Department has been closely involved in this exercise which may lead to the development of a national monitoring system.

Queen Elizabeth Hospital, Hackney

Ms Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will make a statement on the future of Queen Elizabeth hospital, Hackney.

Dr. Mawhinney: East London and City health authority is currently reviewing the future provision of children's services in east London. Its findings will be considered alongside the outcome of consultation by North East Thames regional health authority on the "Making London Better" proposal that the management of the Queen Elizabeth and the Homerton hospitals should merge.

Death Statistics

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list the total number of deaths for each year since 1990, and the current year to date from (a) tuberculosis, (b) malignant neoplasm of the cervix, (c) Hodgkin's disease, (d) chronic rheumatic heart disease, (e) all respiratory diseases, (f) asthma, (g) appendicitis, (h) abdominal hernia, (i) cholelithiases and cholecistitis and also (j) maternal deaths, for each regional health authority.

Mr. Sackville: This information will be placed in the Library.

Health Charges

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when she will announce changes in prescription, sight test or dental examination charges for the coming financial year.

Dr. Mawhinney: Judgments are made each year about how finite health resources can be best targeted for maximum health gain. Prescription and dental charges are one aspect of these considerations. Any announcements will be made at the appropriate time. Patients are not charged for national health service sight tests.

NHS Trusts (Salaries)

Mr. Raynsford: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will publish a table setting out the total estimated salary bill for each trust within the Greater London area, identifying separately the totals for (a) management and administrative staff, (b) medical staff, (c) nursing staff and (d) ancillary staff, in the current financial year, and indicating the percentage change over the previous 12 months.

Dr. Mawhinney: This information is not available until national health service trusts submit their accounts after the end of the financial year.

Medical Records

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health why the non-statutory code of practice concerning the confidentiality of medical records, promised after the draft National Health Service Functions (Preservation of Confidentiality) Regulations were withdrawn in 1987, has yet to be published.

Mr. Sackville: The Department is firmly committed to producing guidance on the confidentiality, use and disclosure of personal health information and intends to do so as soon as possible. We are seeking clarification of the law in relation to confidentiality, and as soon as this has been resolved, draft guidance will be issued for consultation.

Waltham Forest District Health Authority

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if the proposed new larger regional health authority will restore the funding cut to Waltham Forest district health authority made by the current regional health authority; and if she will make a statement.

Dr. Mawhinney: Under the weighted capitation funding system, health authorities are funded for their resident population. Departmental guidance gives regional health authorities discretion to use their judgment about the precise distribution of funds which suits their districts' needs, based on the analysis of local information. The present allocation for Redbridge and Waltham Forest health authority is a matter for North East Thames regional health authority and the hon. Member may wish to contact Sir William Stavely, the chairman, for details.

Residential Care

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will list for each local authority the maximum payments made towards the cost of (a) residential care and (b) nursing care.

Mr. Bowis: This information is not available centrally.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proposals she has to amend current legislation to give a statutory right to community health councils to visit nursing and residential homes and to provide additional resources to community health councils to carry out this role; and if she will make a statement.

Dr. Mawhinney: Community health councils already have a statutory right under the law to visit premises controlled by district health authorities. We have no plans to introduce legislation to give CHCs the statutory right to visit residential homes.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the current guidelines to local authorities for the provision of residential care when an elderly relative lives in a different local authority to his or her family and wishes to be located in accommodation within that family's local authority area.

Mr. Bowis: We have issued a statutory direction requiring local authorities to place people in the home of their choice in England and Wales subject to certain practical limitations such as costs, suitability and availability. The original direction was contained in circular LAC (92) 27 which was issued on 23 December 1992. Circular LAC (93) 18, was issued in August 1993. Copies of the two circulars are available in the Library.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what representations she has received from the Audit Commission concerning payments made by health authorities and trusts to private nursing and residential care homes relating to the provision of nursing and care to former hospital in-patients.

Mr. Sackville: Earlier this year the Audit Commission brought to the attention of the national health service management executive concerns raised by a number of appointed auditors that payments made by some health bodies may not be in accordance with their legal powers. Those cases are being investigated, and where appropriate the executive will ensure that the position is regularised.

Industrial Relations

Ms Lynne: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what guidelines exist governing the conduct of industrial relations in NHS trusts.

Dr. Mawhinney: National health service trusts are expected to follow good industrial relations practice, for example as outlined by the Advisory Conciliation and Arbitration Service and in guidance issued by the NHS management executive. Additionally, Whitley council agreements should be observed for those staff employed on centrally agreed conditions.

Regional Funding

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will estimate the difference in funding health services in each region as a result of the change from RAWP to weighted capitation.

Mr. Sackville: The use of resource allocation working party (RAWP) targets was discontinued in 1990, when weighted capitation was introduced. Consequently, no RAWP targets are currently available for comparison with weighted capitation shares. Comparisons would not be meaningful. Under the old system, health authorities were funded for their "catchment population", whereas now they are purchasers of services for their resident population, with cross-boundary flows of patients being covered by payments under national health service contracts.

Health Service Staff

Mr. Milburn: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will provide the latest available figures on NHS staff numbers by region in the form of her answer of 4 November, Official Report, column 457.

Dr. Mawhinney: The information is shown in the table.

Notes:
1. All figures are independently rounded to the nearest 10 whole-time equivalents.
2. The decrease in nursing and midwifery numbers is almost entirely due to Project 2000 learners who are not included in the work force.
3. Nursery and midwifery figures exclude agency nurses and medical and dental figures exclude locum doctors.
4. The increase in general and senior managers is mainly due to the extension of those terms and conditions to other staff groups.
5. The increase in administrative and clerical staff is largely due to the strengthening of administrative functions, and increased support for clinical services.
6. The figures for all regions include both directly managed units and NHS trusts.
7. The figures for others include the London ambulance service, family health service authorities and other statutory authorities.
8. Some totals differ from those given in my reply to the hon. Member on 4 November at column 457 where figures for the South Yorkshire paramedical services have been transferred from the Yorkshire to Trent region and NW Thames and RHA figures have been adjusted to include the Bedfordshire and Hertfordshire ambulance service.

Departmental Files

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many files marked "not for National Audit Office eyes" are held by her Department.

Mr. Sackville: The marking "not for NAO eyes" is used in accordance with an agreement between the Treasury and the National Audit Office, under which documents relating to the handling of relations between Departments and the NAO and Public Accounts Committee are not automatically available to the NAO while they are current.

The usual practice in the Department is to assign the marking to individual documents rather than to files. Information on the number of documents so marked could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Nicotine Patches

Mr. Cousins: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if she will publish a table showing the numbers of prescriptions, the expenditure and the expenditure per head on nicotine patches in each family health service authority area and NHS region in 1992.

Mr. Sackville [holding answer 30 November 1993]: This information will be placed in the Library.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Claimants, Doncaster

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people in the Doncaster area are currently receiving (a) income support, (b) family credit and (c) housing benefit; what percentage of the Doncaster population this represents; and what were the figures (i) 12, (ii) 24, (iii) 36 and (iv) 48 months ago.

Mr. Burt: The administration of income support is a matter for Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member with such information as is available.

Letter from Mr. M. Bichard to Mr. Martin Redmond, dated 2 December 1993:

As Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency it is my responsibility to answer questions about relevant operational matters. I am therefore replying to your recent Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security asking how many people in the Doncaster area are currently receiving (a) Income Support (b) Family Credit and (c) Housing Benefit; what percentage of the Doncaster population this represents; and what were the figures (i) 12 (ii) 24 (iii) 36 and (iv) 48 months ago.

Regrettably, all of this information is not readily available. This is because some Income Support (IS) records for 1989 and 1990 have been destroyed in accordance with routine procedures. Also Agency District boundaries do not correspond with those of local authorities. In fact a small part of the Doncaster area is covered by the Mexborough Benefit Office within the Agency's Rother and Dearne District. Family Credit (FC) is administered centrally from Blackpool and Housing Benefit (HB) by Doncaster Metropolitan Borough Council.

I am therefore able to provide some information on IS customers of the Agency's Doncaster District—to obtain details of those covered at Mexborough would incur disproportionate cost. FC and HB details, however, relate to the Doncaster area as a whole. The details provided are covered in the attached appendixes and have been obtained from The Office of Population and Censuses, Family Credit Unit, the Analytical Services Division and the IS Management Information Statistics.

For the purpose of calculating relevant percentages, Doncaster has been defined as the Metropolitan District of Doncaster. The Office of Population and Census advise that the latest figure available for the population was 288, 854 at April 1991. For the reasons given above, it is not possible to provide a percentage figure related to IS.

I hope this information is helpful. A copy will appear in the Official Report and a copy will also be placed in the Library.

Income Support
May 1989	22,513
May 1990	22,332
November 1991	26,216
November 1992	28,771
August 1993	29,241

Housing benefit		Percentage
1988-89	24,500	8·4
1989-90	24,000	8·3
1990-91	23,000	7·9
1991-92	22,500	7·7
1992-93	24,000	8·3

It should be noted that these figures are averages of the quarterly counts for each year quoted and have been rounded to the nearest 500. Some of the recipients of Housing Benefit may also be in receipt of Family Credit or Income Support.

Family Credit		Percentage
24 November 1989	1,491	0·5
2 November 1990	1,657	0·5
31 October 1991	1,769	0·6
30 October 1992	2,415	0·8
29 October 1993	2,888	0·9

It should be noted that the above percentages show claimants as a percentage of the Doncaster population in receipt of each benefit. Dependants are not included in the calculation.

Cold Weather Payments

Mrs. Ewing: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list those meteorological stations which have registered an average of 0 deg C for (a) three nights, (b) four nights, (c) five nights, (d) six nights and (e) seven nights during 1993; and if he will list the total amounts of severe weather payments triggered by area as a result of recorded temperatures during 1993.

Mr. Scott: The administration of the cold weather payments scheme is a matter for Mr. Michael Bichard, the chief executive of the Benefits Agency. He will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Mr. M. Bichard to Mrs. Margaret Ewing, dated 2 December 1993:

As Chief Executive of the Benefits Agency it is my responsibility to answer questions about relevant operational matters. I am therefore replying to your recent Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security, asking about Cold Weather Payments.

Data provided by the Meteorological Office does not include information on those meteorological stations which have registered an average of 0 degrees Centigrade for three, four, five and six nights. The regulations relating to Cold Weather Payments define a period of cold weather as a consecutive period of seven days during which the average mean daily temperature is 0 degrees Centigrade or less.

Information relating to Cold Weather Payments made up to the end of March 1993 is held in the Library. Payments made since that date are shown by Benefits Agency District, and are attached as Annex A.

A list of those weather stations which have averaged 0 degrees Centigrade for seven consecutive days during the period from the end of March 1993 to 27 November 1993 is also attached as Annex B.

I hope you find this helpful. A copy of this letter will appear in the Official Report and a copy will also be placed in the Library.

Child Support Agency

Mrs. Jane Kennedy: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) in how many cases of the total number of cases where the Child Support Agency have assessed maintenance as payable maintenance has been collected; and how many of those cases where maintenance has been collected were transferred to the CSA from the liable relatives section of his Department;

(2) what is his latest estimate of the number of parents with care who have requested that the Child Support Agency collect maintenance on their behalf; and what percentage of these have had maintenance successfully collected;

(3) what percentage of the total number of maintenance assessments made by the Child Support Agency in the first six months of its operation, excluding those cases inherited from the liable relatives section of his Department, have resulted in maintenance payable by the absent parent;

(4) how many maintenance assessments were made by the Child Support Agency in the first six months of its operation, excluding those cases inherited from the liable relatives section of his Department; and how many of these are for parents with care who are working and not in receipt of income support, family credit or disability working allowance.

Mr. Burt: The administration of the Child Support Agency is a matter for Ros Hepplewhite, the chief executive. She will write to the hon. Member.

Letter from Ms R. Hepplewhite to Mrs. Jane Kennedy, dated 2 December 1993:

I am replying to your recent Parliamentary Question to the Secretary of State for Social Security asking various questions about the Agency's operations.

The Agency does not collect information that identifies maintenance assessments according to the status of the parent with care, nor whether an assessment relates to an existing case which was previously dealt with under the liable relatives provisions before taken on by the Agency. In relation to the total number of cases assessed in the first six months of operations, the absent parent was assessed as liable to pay more than the statutory minimum in over 26,000 cases. By the end of October 1993, a total of 57,000 assessments had been completed, and 40,000 were for more than the statutory minimum.

You also asked about the collection of maintenance. Information on maintenance being collected is not currently available, but will be later in the financial year.

I hope you will find this reply helpful. A copy will appear in the Official Report and a copy will also be placed in the Library.

Benefit Statistics

Sir David Knox: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will publish a table similar to table 9a in "The Growth of Social Security", but showing claimant numbers instead of expenditure in 1978-79, 1982-83, 1988-89 and 1992-93, for each of retirement pension basic, retirement pension earnings related, widow's benefit, unemployment benefit, sickness benefit, statutory sick pay, invalidity benefit age 65 years plus, invalidity benefit age 60 to 64 years, invalidity benefit age under 60 years, supplementary benefit/income support age 65 years plus, supplementary benefit/income support age 60 to 64 years, supplementary benefit/income support age under 60 years, child benefit, one-parent benefit, family income supplement/family credit, rate rebate, rent allowance, rent rebate and community charge benefit.

Mr. Scott: The information is in the tables.

Community charge benefit	—	—	—	6,655,000

[1] These figures are underlying the expenditure information given in table 9a of the Growth of Social Security Expenditure. They reflect average numbers of beneficiaries in receipt of Housing Benefit/Community Charge Benefit: Domestic rates were abolished and Community Charge introduced in Scotland in 1989 and the rest of Great Britain in 1990.

Sir David Knox: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will amend the figures for child benefit expenditure and expenditure on families in tables 9a, 9b, 10, 11a, 11b and 12 of "The Growth of Social Security," so that the cost of residual child tax allowances in 1978-79 is included; and if in table 12 he will also distinguish between the growth in expenditure on two-parent families and one-parent families.

Mr. Burt: The amended figures are as follows:

	£ million

Sir David Knox: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will publish a table tabulating the costs of administering the social security benefit system in 1978-79, 1982-83, 1986-87, 1990-91 and the latest year for which figures are available, at current and constant prices, and as percentages of benefit expenditure; and what were the costs of administering (a) basic retirement pension, (b) earnings-related retirement pension, (c) child benefit, (d) unemployment benefit and (e) supplementary benefit/ income support in the same years at current and constant prices and as percentages of relevant benefit expenditure.

Mr. Scott: The available information is in the table. Information on earnings-related and basic retirement pension is not held in the form requested.

Bomb-proofing

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what has been the cost, by location, of bomb-proofing the Department's premises.

Mr. Scott: On security grounds, I do not propose to provide this information.

Government Car Service

Mr. Alan Williams: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the annual cost to the Department of the car service for Ministers; and how many vehicles are involved.

Mr. Hague: There are five cars and the projected annual cost for the current financial year is £209,196.

Occupational Pensions

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether he is yet in a position to publish the discussion papers on occupational pensions issues to which he referred in his statement to the House on 3 November, Official Report, columns 354-65.

Mr. Hague: The first five papers in a series of discussion papers on non-state pensions have been published today as a basis for detailed discussions with interested parties. The results of this exercise will help to formulate our detailed policy proposals. Copies of the papers have been placed in the Library.

Benefits

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what are the most recently available figures to show the cost of benefits paid to unemployed persons (a) male and over 60 years, (b) male aged 55 to 60 years and (c) female aged 55 to 60 years.

Mr. Hague: Unemployed people may receive any or all of the following major benefits: unemployment benefit, income support, housing benefit, council tax benefit and family credit. They may also receive help with NHS charges. The amount of all benefits paid to unemployed people is not kept according to age grouping and cannot be obtained.

The latest statistics relating to the numbers of claimants for the two most common of the major benefits—UB and IS—for the age and sex groups specified in the question, are given in the tables.

Claimants receiving benefit as at 13 May 1993

		Number receiving benefit
Unemployed males aged 60 and over
Number receiving	UB and IS	4,060
Number receiving	UB only	26,140

Occupational Pension Schemes

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what assessment he has made of the proportion of women in employment who are within occupational pension schemes.

Mr. Hague: In 1991, the latest year for which figures are available, 37 per cent. of all women in employment —including those in part-time employment—were members of occupational pension schemes.

Mobility Allowance

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) how many people currently receive mobility allowance;

(2) how many people receive the mobility component of the living allowance at (a) the higher rate and (b) the lower rate; and if he will break the figures down by (i) age, (ii) sex, (iii) whether the recipient holds a driving licence and (iv) whether payment is made to an appointee.

Mr. Scott: Mobility allowance was replaced from April 1992 by the mobility component of disability living allowance.

Information is not available about recipients of the mobility component who hold a driving licence. Information about payments to appointees could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Data about the two rates of mobility component broken down by age and sex are shown in the table.

Departmental Files

Mr. Byers: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many files marked "not for National Audit Office eyes" are held by his Department.

Mr. Scott: The marking "not for NAO eyes" is used in accordance with an agreement between the Treasury and the National Audit Office, under which documents relating to the handling of relations between Departments and the NAO and Public Accounts Committee are not automatically available to the NAO while they are current.

To provide information on the number of files marked "not for NAO eyes" which are held by this Department would involve a large trawl exercise which could be carried out only at disproportionate cost.

EMPLOYMENT

Training

Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what new training initiatives will be announced in the near future.

Miss Widdecombe: In his Budget speech, my right hon. and learned Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer announced the Government's plans to introduce modern apprenticeships.

By offering young people high-quality work-based training leading to technician, supervisor and similar level qualifications, modern apprenticeships will have the potential to make a significant contribution to our economic competitiveness. We aim to increase to over 40,000 the number of young people achieving national vocational qualifications at level 3 through training in England—roughly tripling the current number.

Mr. Rooker: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many unemployed persons on the training for work programme achieved recognised qualifications in the latest period for which figures are available.

Miss Widdecombe: Training for work replaced employment training in April 1993 and it is still too early to say how many leavers have gained a qualification. The latest period for which figures are available is April 1992 to December 1992. In that period 36 per cent. of all employment training leavers in Great Britain gained a qualification or credit towards one.

Stonemasons and Woodcarvers

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what plans he has to fund the training of apprentices to ensure sufficient stonemasons and woodcarvers are available to maintain buildings of the National Heritage.

Miss Widdecombe: The prime responsibility for ensuring sufficient availability of vocational skills rests with employers in a particular sector, and training and enterprise councils enable employers to manage Government training initiatives in a way which supports local priorities. Funding from youth training and youth credits already supports some apprenticeships which might not otherwise exist, and the modern apprenticeships announced in the Budget will be an opportunity for a major increase in the number of apprenticeships available across the economy as a whole.

Employers of stonemasons are in scope to the Construction Industry Training Board—CITB—a statutory body which is empowered to levy employers to enable collective funding of training. From its income, the CITB disburses training grants to employers to ensure that high-quality training takes place.

Career Development Loans

Ms Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many people (a) are currently on a course which has been supported by a career development loan, (b) are repaying a career development loan, (c) have had recovery action taken against them because they have defaulted on the loan and (d) have had to defer repayments on their career development loan because of hardship for each region and for Great Britain as a whole; what is the average amount of loan taken out; and if he will make a statement.

Miss Widdecombe: Information by region on the number of people currently in training supported by a career development loan—CDL—and the number of people currently repaying a loan is shown in the table.

Details of the number of people who have had recovery action taken against them because they defaulted on the loan are not available.

No information is held on the number of trainees who have had to defer repayment on loans due to hardship.

At the end of October 1993, the average loan amount for loans taken out in the current financial year was £2,812.

Social Fund

Ms Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the contribution from the European social fund and the proportion of programme expenditure that represented to (a) youth training/youth training scheme, (b) training for work/employment training/employment action and the previous programmes they replaced, (c) business start-up allowance/enterprise allowance scheme, (d) non-advanced further education, (e) high technology national training, (f) employment rehabilitation centres and (g) jobstart allowances and other employment subsidy schemes in each year since 1987; what amount of support the ESF will be providing to each programme in 1993-94; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The information available about European social fund—ESF—support for Government training programmes between 1990 and 1993 is provided in the table. European Commission regulations do not require information about individual programmes to be retained after three years from the date of the final claim. Information is no longer available prior to 1990 for specific programmes. The total amount claimed for the three-year period is £558·62 million. The information in the period 1987 to 1991 inclusive relates to ESF support for programmes operating in Great Britain, for 1992 in England and Wales and for 1993 in England.

Government programmes designed to give the young and long-term unemployed the skills they need to compete for jobs have received a valuable contribution from the ESF.

Training and Enterprise Councils

Ms Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the outturn expenditure given to each training and enterprise council in England in 1992-93 at 1993-94 prices; and what is the budget for each TEC in 1993-94 in total and broken down in the same way as given in his answer of 18 February to the hon. Member for Basingstoke (Mr. Hunter), Official Report, column 341.

Miss Widdecombe: Total 1993-94 budgets for each training and enterprise council—TEC—broken down by programme and management fee are shown in the table.

I will write to the hon. Member about the outturn expenditure given to each TEC in England.

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what was the total budget allocated by his Department during 1992-93 to (a) Cumbria TEC, (b) Durham TEC, (c) Northumberland TEC, (d) Teesside TEC, (e) Tyneside TEC and (f) Wearside TEC; and what was the total amount spent by his Department on training and enterprise councils in the United Kingdom as a whole for the same period.

Miss Widdecombe: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given to the hon. Member for Darlington (Mr. Milburn) on 6 November 1992, Official Report, column 434. This provides details of the total budget allocated to each training and enterprise council—TEC—including Cumbria, Durham, Northumberland, Teesside, Tyneside and Wearside.

The total amount spent on TECs in England during 1992-93 was £1·291 billion.

Expenditure relating to Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland is the responsibility of the respective Secretaries of State.

Bomb-proofing

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what has been the cost, by location, of bomb-proofing the Department's premises.

Miss Widdecombe: On security grounds, I do not propose to give this information.

Departmental Papers

Ms Short: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list for the last 12 months the titles of papers published by his Department and by the Employment Service.

Miss Widdecombe: As the reply consists of a long list of information, I will write to the hon. Member.

Advertising

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how much his Department spends annually on (a) television advertising, (b) radio advertising and (c) press advertising; and what were the corresponding figures for 1985 and 1979.

Miss Widdecombe: The Department's overall advertising and publicity budget for 1993-94 is £10·8 million. Breakdown by media category will not be available until the end of the financial year. In 1992-93 expenditure by media category was as follows:

	£ million
Television	Nil
Press/Radio	4·3
Other Promotional	3·9

Expenditure on advertising and promotional material by the Department in 1985-86 was £1·2 million and in 1979-80 £70,000. Figures for television, radio and newspaper advertising and other promotional material are not available separately for those years. The figures for 1985-86 and 1979-80 refer only to Employment Department expenditure. They do not cover expenditure by the former Manpower Services Commission.

Press and Publicity Officers

Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many press and publicity officers are currently employed in his Department; and how many were employed in (a) 1985 and (b) 1979.

Miss Widdecombe: A total of 90·5 press and publicity staff are currently in post in the Employment Department's information branch. Available figures do not go back further than 1989 when the information branch was formed by the merger of the Employment Department's information division and the Training Agency's information services branch.

Figures for information branch staff in post since 1989 are as follows:

	Number
1989-90	118
1990-91	120
1991-92	119
1992-93	104·5

Industrial Tribunals

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many industrial tribunal members are allocated to (a) Nottingham and (b) Leicester.

Miss Widdecombe: Nottingham region has 128 lay members. Of these, 76 mainly sit at Nottingham and 52 at Leicester. There are also four full-time chairmen, of whom three normally sit at Nottingham and one at Leicester. In addition, there are eight part-time chairmen who may sit in more than one location.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what estimate he has made of the additional travelling costs of applicants to industrial tribunals following the transfer of the industrial tribunal to Nottingham from Leicester.

Miss Widdecombe: The location of the industrial tribunals is a matter for the president and I understand that estimates of the savings and costs, including travelling cost, of the various accommodation options are not yet available.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what representations he has received in relation to the proposals to move the industrial tribunal from Leicester to Nottingham.

Miss Widdecombe: None. This is a matter for the President of the Industrial Tribunals (England and Wales).

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment whom he has consulted about the proposed relocation of the industrial tribunal from Leicester to Nottingham.

Miss Widdecombe: The location of the industrial tribunals is a matter for the President of the Industrial Tribunals to determine.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what are the estimated costs for the relocation of the industrial tribunal from Leicester to Nottingham.

Miss Widdecombe: I understand that no decision has yet been taken to relocate the Leicester office and that an estimate of possible costs is not yet available.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what plans he has to move the industrial tribunal office in Leicester to Nottingham; and if he will make a statement.

Miss Widdecombe: Under the regulations governing the industrial tribunals, it is for the President of the Industrial Tribunals to determine where tribunals shall sit. However, I understand that the existing accommodation in both Nottingham and Leicester is unsatisfactory and that the president is considering a number of options for the future provision of tribunal facilities in the Nottingham region.

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many cases the industrial tribunals in (a) Nottingham and (b) Leicester have heard in each of the last 10 years.

Miss Widdecombe: I regret that figures are only available for 1985 onwards. The details are as follows:

	Nottingham	Leicester
1985-86	357	304
1986-87	358	324
1987-88	412	290
1988-89	362	314
1989-90	346	298
1990-91	412	475
1991-92	624	520
1992-93	1,006	684

Labour Statistics

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many persons were registered as unemployed, on the last available date, who were (a) male and over 60 years, (b) male aged 55 to 60 years and (c) female aged 55 to 60 years.

Miss Widdecombe: In October 1993 unadjusted unemployment among men aged over 60 years was 43,794. For men and women aged 55 to 59 years, the figures were 153,248 and 47,166 respectively.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what proportion of men aged 60 years and over were in (a) full-time employment, (b) part-time employment and (c) unemployed on 1 November in each year from 1983 and at the latest available date.

Miss Widdecombe: Available information for Great Britain based on estimates from the labour force survey—LFS—is given in the table:

Proportions of men aged 60 years and over in

Spring each year	Full-time employment Per cent.	Part-time employment Per cent.	ILO unemployment Per cent.
1984	17·0	4·8	2·4
1985	16·1	4·7	2·3
1986	15·1	4·4	2·1
1987	14·7	4·7	2·3
1988	14·5	5·1	2·0
1989	14·6	5·5	1·9
1990	14·0	5·8	1·7
1991	14·1	5·3	1·8
1992	13·5	5·7	1·8
1993	12·0	5·3	2·3

Source: LFS. Not seasonally adjusted.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what assessment he has of the proportion of women of working age who are currently in employment.

Miss Widdecombe: Estimates from the labour force survey—not seasonally adjusted—show that, in Great Britain at spring 1993, 65 per cent. of women of working age were in employment. A detailed analysis of the characteristics of women in employment is provided in an article in the November 1993 Employment Gazette—pages 483-502—entitled "Women in the Labour Market", a copy of which is held in the Library.

Disabled Employees

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how an employer's contribution of 50 per cent. for access for work services is expected to affect employers' willingness to recruit disabled persons.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Access to work will increase employment opportunities for people with disabilities through helping more people with disabilities to obtain and retain jobs and making a much wider range of help available. We are currently finalising details of the changes with these aims in mind.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT ADMINISTRATION

Burundi

Mr. Worthington: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what is his policy on committing United Kingdom Government funds to the UN voluntary fund for the Organisation of African Unity's peacekeeping mission to Burundi.

Mr. Goodlad: We have no plans to contribute to the UN voluntary fund for an Organisation of African Unity peacekeeping mission to Burundi. We have already committed $1 million to the UN trust fund for Liberia and we anticipate that other European partners, which did not contribute to that fund, will take the lead on Burundi.

British assistance in Burundi is focused on the appalling problem of refugees and displaced persons. We have already contributed £350,000 to a United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees appeal and £100,000 to the International Red Cross. In addition, we are considering urgently other non-governmental organisations requests for humanitarian assistance to refugees within Burundi. We support discussions between the OAU and the European Union on ways in which more systematic help can be given to African conflict resolution mechanisms.

Somali Refugees

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with the Kenyan Government on the subject of assistance for the refugees from Somalia who are now in Kenya.

Mr. Goodlad: We have advised the Government of Kenya that we are prepared to continue to help them to cope with the refugees in the north, more than 85 per cent. of whom are Somalis. My noble Friend the Minister for Overseas Development hopes to discuss this issue with President Moi during her forthcoming visit to Kenya in early January.

Aid Projects

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress is being made with other aid donors in agreeing economic and social indicators against which the progress of aid projects can be judged.

Mr. Goodlad: The Development Assistance Committee of the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development—OECD—provides a forum for co-ordination between aid donors. Following discussions in the Development Assistance Committee, the OECD published in 1992 a manual, "DAC Principles for Effective Aid", copies of which are in the House of Commons Library. These principles cover, among other things, economic and social issues relating to the appraisal of aid projects. They are being incorporated into the Overseas Development Administration's procedures for managing aid projects.

Nepal

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement regarding the expected environmental impact of the proposed World bank-funded Arun II dam project in Nepal.

Mr. Goodlad: I refer the hon. Member to the reply given by my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs to the hon. Member for Southampton, Itchen (Mr. Denham) on 29 November, at columns 313-14.

The World bank's ongoing discussions with non-governmental organisations and other interested parties include consideration of the environmental impact of the proposed project. We shall consider the environmental aspects of the project when the World bank has completed its appraisal.

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list all bilateral aid projects located in the Arun valley of Nepal.

Mr. Goodlad: The following United Kingdom bilateral aid projects are located in the Arun Valley of Nepal:

1. Pakhribas agricultural centre;
2. Koshi hills seeds and vegetable project;
3. Community forestry project;
4. Eastern region road maintenance project; and
5. Eastern region primary health care project.

In addition, some work is carried out in the Arun valley under the forestry research project and the Gurkha Welfare Trust scheme.

Uganda

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the involvement of the United Kingdom Government in the Uganda forestry rehabilitation programme, initiated by the World bank in 1987.

Mr. Goodlad: The forestry rehabilitation programme in Uganda is being co-financed by the World bank and the European Community. We are not providing any support for the project through our bilateral assistance programme to Uganda.

Privatisation Advice

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many of his officials are currently advising east European countries on privatisation policies.

Mr. Goodlad: None.

Know-how Funds

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what has been the total amount of money allocated to the Government know-how fund since its introduction.

Mr. Goodlad: Expenditure under the fund from 1989 to March 1993 was £112,262,000. The expenditure for this financial year is expected to be approximately £53 million.

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list the current advisory board members of each of the United Kingdom know-how funds.

Mr. Goodlad: A list has been placed in the Libraries of the House.

Kenya

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on Government policy towards aids projects to Kenya; and if he will list the projects and the amount of financial help given as of 22 November.

Mr. Goodlad: At the consultative group meeting on 22 and 23 November Britain pledged programme aid grants up to a possible £15 million in support of Kenya's economic recovery. This new assistance acknowledges the economic and political reforms undertaken since November 1991 and will help support the further economic reform programme to be agreed with the World bank and the International Monetary Fund.

The first £5 million will be made available when spending arrangements have been agreed: the further £10 million will be dependent on a satisfactory review by the IMF in mid-1994 of the new economic reform agenda, and the further development of an overall acceptable political environment. We will be looking particularly for effective action to improve open and accountable government including action to deal with corruption, to reduce tribal tensions and strengthen law and order in the affected areas, and to enhance press freedom.

Our longer-term development assistance programme continues; provisional bilateral expenditure for 1992-93 was over £32 million. I have placed a list of current projects, involving financial assistance and know-how in the Libraries of the House.

World Bank

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the World bank will engage in official celebrations for its 50th anniversary.

Mr. Goodlad: A conference to mark the 50th anniversary of the Bretton Woods institutions to be held jointly by the World bank and the IMF, is planned to be held in Madrid on 29 and 30 September 1994, immediately before the annual meetings of the World bank and the International Monetary Fund.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Essex Coast Environmentally Sensitive Area

Dr. Spink: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when she expects to implement the Essex Coast ESA; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Jack: We plan to launch this ESA in March of next year.

Land Statistics

Mr. Welsh: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if she will publish in the Official Report the figures in hectares for (a) set-aside, (b) pulses, (c) oil seed rape and (d) cereals for 1989, 1990 and 1991 which were used to calculate the base area in England.

Mr. Jack [holding answer 29 November 1993]: The figures used to calculate the base area in England are as follows:

Base Area (ha)	1989	1990	1991	Three-Year average
Cereals	3,280,95	3,109,432	2,967,283	3,122,222
Sweetcorn	1,303	1,322	1,530	1,378
Oilseeds	283,479	343,052	388,308	388,280
Proteins	209,063	210,730	198,437	206,077
Set-aside	38,577	80,537	104,280	74,465

The figure for oilseeds is mostly oilseed rape but includes small areas planted to sunflowers and other minor crops. The figure for protein crops has been revised to exclude the area planted to vining peas following its withdrawal from the list of eligible crops. For the purposes of determining the base area for the arable area payments scheme, the set-aside areas submitted to the EC Commission were based on actual set-aside agreements for the years 1989, 1990 and 1991.

Woodlands

Mr. Bayley: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if she will list each privately owned wood in Yorkshire that has received special management grants to provide for public access under the woodland grant scheme; and what is the area of each of these woods and the size of the grant.

Mr. Jack: Special management grants are paid for work in those woodlands which are of special value for nature conservation, landscape, public recreation or a combination of these. The provision of public access, by itself, does not qualify for payment of a grant.

Special management grants have been paid in respect of 20 woodlands or estates in Yorkshire the owners of which have indicated that facilities for public recreation or public access would be provided. These are as follows:

Woodland	Area (hectares)	Grant £
Amenity Trust Woodland	37·2	1,435
Bella Wood	23·2	812
Bilton Beck and Rudding Bottoms	10·7	375
Broad Lane Wood	1·9	67
Cliff Wood	38·6	1,351
Cod Beck Reservoir	87·3	3,056
Escrick Estate	9·3	382
Haw Park Wood	57·2	2,002
Newmillerdam Country Park	89·7	3,140
Notton Wood	38·8	1,356
Shibden Park	6·9	311
Skipton Wood	15·4	539
Skipwith Common	168·0	5,873
Spoilbank Wood	4·2	191
Stanley Marsh	3·2	146
Studley Royal (North)	62·5	2,300
Sutton Park	10·7	385
Tong Garden Centre	1·3	59
Washburn Valley	298·0	11,083
Wentworth Estate Woodlands	32·7	1,150

Diseased Cattle

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the effectiveness of the safeguards instituted under the EC single market against the import of diseased cattle, with particular reference to warble fly, brucellosis and foot and mouth disease; and what representations she has had saying that cattle imported into the United Kingdom should now be cleared by her Department's veterinary officers before any movement is permitted on to farms or to dealers.

Mr. Soames: I refer the hon. Member to my reply to the hon. and learned Member for Burton (Sir I. Lawrence) on 1 December at column 590.

Warble Fly

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations she has had about the safety of the use of organo-phosphorus based products to treat warble fly infections; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Soames: I have received a small number of representations about the safety of use of organophosphorus—OP—products to treat warble fly infections, and I understand that some farmers are reluctant to treat their animals using these products. Provided the label instructions are carefully followed, the use of such warblecides poses no hazard to human health. If, however, anyone is in doubt as to how the product should be used, they should seek expert advice from their veterinary surgeon or the manufacturer. OP products should not be used for this purpose between 30 November and 15 March.

Farmers who have cattle which may have been exposed to warble fly infestation, including those within the 3 km treatment zones of known affected premises, may choose to have blood samples from their cattle tested for signs of infestation. Anyone wishing to pursue this possibility should contact his local divisional veterinary officer for details of the arrangements. Where results are negative, treatment of cattle will not be required.

Wildlife Units

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if she will list the locations of her wildlife units that are currently based at Ministry of Defence establishments; what is the nature of the work being conducted by each unit; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Soames: The work of the only wildlife unit based at a Ministry of Defence establishment was outlined in the answer given to the hon. Member on 26 October at column 564.

Food Surpluses

Mr. Davidson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many tonnes of beef and butter were supplied to pensioners and those on benefits throughout the United Kingdom in each of the last five years.

Mr. Jack: In the United Kingdom, the following amounts of produce were distributed to eligible groups, including those pensioners that meet the qualifying criteria, under the EC surplus food scheme:

	Butter (tonnes)	Beef (tonnes)
1989-90	3,000	3,000
1990-91	3,800	3,000
1991-92	3,800	3,000
1992-93	3,700	3,000

For 1993-94, 12,200 tonnes of beef is being made available.

Wages

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether the minimum agricultural wages applied to those working for agricultural gangmasters in each year since 1991.

Mr. Jack: Yes, provided that the work undertaken is within the statutory definition of agriculture.

Potatoes

Mr. Tyler: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when she expects the Council of Agriculture Ministers to discuss the proposed European Community potato regime; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Jack: The Commission's draft proposal was last before the Agriculture Council in May. It has not been on the agenda since then, nor is it on the agenda for December.

Badgers

Mr. Redmond: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what results have been achieved to date by her wildlife unit at royal air station, Aston Down in its investigations of badgers spreading bovine tuberculosis to cattle; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Soames: The wildlife unit has an operational, not a research, role.

Set-aside Scheme

Sir Cranley Onslow: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what consultations her Department has had with interested parties about the inclusion of riverside buffer zones in the set-aside scheme; and if she will make a statement.

Mr. Jack: The management conditions for set-aside under the arable area payments scheme were the subject of a consultation document issued in March 1993. The 1993-94 arable area payments guide advises that set-aside placed next to sites such as rivers and streams can act as a buffer to protect those areas and help reduce run-off of fertilisers and pesticides.

Another consultation document issued in March 1993 contained proposals to create or improve a range of wildlife habitats by taking them out of production for 20 years. Water fringes are one of the targeted habitats, with the objective of protecting the water and its flora and fauna, as well as creating a wildlife habitat on the waterside banks. Our decision to go ahead with this new habitat scheme was announced on 10 August 1993 and the scheme will open for applications in 1994.

Sheep Quota

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many applications there have been for sheep quotas from the national reserve; if she will give the number of successful applications as a proportion of all applications; and if she will provide a breakdown of the statistics for the United Kingdom.

Mr. Jack: Before applications to the national reserves can be invited, the necessary legislation must be laid before Parliament. This will be done shortly. At the same time, I shall give details about the arrangements for making applications.

Departmental Files

Mr. Byers: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many files marked "not for National Audit Office eyes" are held by her Department.

Mr. Jack: The marking "not for NAO eyes" is used in accordance with an agreement between the Treasury and the National Audit Office, under which current documents relating to the handling of relations between Departments and the NAO are not automatically available to the NAO.

There are unlikely to be a great number of such files but no central file record is kept in MAFF, and to obtain this information by a departmental inquiry to all the various registries would be very time consuming and costly.

Wages Board

Dr. Strang: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food how many submissions she has received to the consultation on the future of the Agricultural Wages Board; and how many of those were in favour of the abolition of the board.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: When the consultation period closed on 1 November 1993, some 3,566 responses had been received and 14 petitions. A further 32 responses have been received since the end of the consultation period. The vast majority were in favour of retention of the board.

INDEX TO THE

PARLIAMENTARY DEBATES

OFFICIAL REPORT

SIXTH SERIES VOLUME 233

SESSION 1993–94

18th November, 1993—3rd December, 1993

SCOPE OF THE INDEX, ARRANGEMENT AND ABBREVIATIONS

This index is derived from the House of Commons Library's Parliamentary On-Line Information System (POLIS), and the subject terms used are based on those used in POLIS. There are often changes in column numbering, etc, between the daily part or weekly Hansard (which simply collects together the daily parts without revision) and the bound volume. The index for the bound volume is revised to take account of these changes and cannot therefore, be used in connection with the daily part or weekly Hansard. For these versions use the Fortnightly Index.

Scope and arrangement of the Index

Oral and Written Parliamentary Questions are indexed under subject headings and the names of Members asking and Ministers replying to them. Questions are not listed under the names of Departments replying. Departmental listings can be arrived at indirectly by looking under the names of the Minister(s) of that Department. There are, however, the headings 'Northern Ireland', 'Scotland', and 'Wales' under which one can find not only most Questions answered by the Northern Ireland Office, Scottish Office, Welsh Office but also Questions about these areas of the United Kingdom which are answered by other Departments. Ministerial statements are indexed under subject headings, under 'Ministerial statements' and the names of Ministers making them and Members speaking on them. General debates are indexed under broad subject headings and under the names of all Members and Ministers taking part. Debates on legislation (Bills, Orders, Regulations etc.) are indexed under the name of the Bill, Statutory Instrument etc, under subject headings and under the names of those taking part.

Rulings and Statements by Speaker and deputies are brought together under the heading Speaker's rulings and statements.

Other contributions by Speaker and deputies appear under the heading Speaker.

Opposition Day Debates, Estimates Day Debates and Standing Order No. 10 applications are listed under those respective headings and under subject headings too.

The date of each item except Parliamentary Questions is inserted immediately before the reference.

Members' names are given in the form by which they prefer to be known and are printed in bold italics. Under their names, entries are arranged under one of the two headings Debates etc (to include interventions on statements, points of order and so on) or Questions.

Abbreviations

Bills 1R=first reading, 2R=second reading, Money res=money resolution, Com=Committee stage, Rep=Report stage, 3R=third reading, amendt/amendts=amendment/amendments, *=matter taken formally, without debate.

Column numbers followed by the letter W refer to Written Questions. These appear at the end of each daily part or volume with their own sequence of column numbers printed in italics.
